DEAR MISS EAGER: On rainy days I light my candles and make sealing-wax baskets. Sometimes on rainy days I take a cardboard box and cut windows in it. I bend back the two cardboard pieces and make shutters. I cut doors so that they can open and shut. Then I stick a small tack in the door, leaving the head sticking out for the knob, and I color the house one color and the shutters another.

Then I make rags with fringes. I cut furniture out of the cardboard too and cover it with some material. After it's finished it makes a very cute doll house.

BETTY MISHLER.

DEAR EDITOR: Here is something to do on a rainy day. Take a piece of chalk and make two circles. Take a bean-bag and with your eyes shut, try to throw the bag in a ring, keeping track of the circle that gets the most. The one that gets the most, wins. When I play this game alone I color the house and name the circles. One I name Joan and the other Fred.

DRAGON-FLY

The Third Insect Play in Tommy Tiptoe's Theater

CHARACTERS

TOMMY TIPTOE
MISS DRAGON-FLY
MR. WATER-SKATER
LITTLE GRAY DRAGON

(If you need more parts, have as many other dragon-flies as you like flitting about on the pond, and let them repeat the words of MISS DRAGON-FLY after her.)

DIRECTIONS

This is supposed to be the top of the pond. Spread greenish-blue cheesecloth over the floor, and for the shore, pile big stones along at the back, or lay brown-and-green rugs over sofa cushions. Cut leaves two and three feet long from big sheets of brown paper, paint some green, leaving others brown, curl up the edges and scatter them over the "water." TOMMY TIPTOE sits on a leaf at the left.

Set a very big stone in the water, at the left (three big sofa cushions covered with something gray will do), and let LITTLE GRAY DRAGON hide behind it until time to come up. Choose your own dance tunes, but if you need help with music or costumes, write to "Dragon-fly Play, THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y."

THE PLAY

When the play begins, TOMMY TIPTOE is sitting on a big dried leaf, hugging his knees and looking about frightened.

TOMMY TIPTOE: It's magic! Why, why, I'm sitting on a LEAF! I—I must have turned one inch high. Am I really Tommy Tiptoe? (He pinches himself.) Ouch! Yes!

Enter MISS DRAGON-FLY. She is slender and graceful but haughty. She darts here and there about the water on airy wings, dancing to soft music behind the scenes. As she flits by the leaf, TOMMY grabs her wing.

MISS DRAGON-FLY (angrily): Oh! Oh! Let me go! Let me go! Insect, don't you realize who I am?

TOMMY TIPTOE: No, but please come sit on my leaf. It's so lonesome being one inch high.

MISS DRAGON-FLY (sneering and trying to pull away): How high do you expect to be, silly bug?

TOMMY TIPTOE (crossly): I'm not a bug, I'm a boy and I'm three feet—seven in—er, usually. Only, well, I was watching the dragon-flies on the pond and wishing I could turn one inch high, and bing!—I did!

Enter MISS DRAGON-FLY. She is slender and graceful but haughty. She darts here and there about the water on airy wings, dancing to soft music behind the scenes. As she flits by the leaf, TOMMY grabs her wing.

MISS DRAGON-FLY (angrily): Oh! Oh! Let me go! Let me go! Insect, don't you realize who I am?

TOMMY TIPTOE: Please, pretty, pretty lady!

(MISS DRAGON-FLY smiles a little and sits down, but seems ready to fly away at any moment.)

TOMMY TIPTOE (stroking her wings): Who are you? Where did you come from?

MISS DRAGON-FLY (proudly): I? I am the beautiful Miss Dragon-fly. I am the Lovely Lady of the Pond. I was born in the rainbow, and my mother was a soap bubble, and I have always been beautiful, beautiful, beautiful!

(She flits off the leaf and flutters about over the water, chanting, while music plays):

Oh, I, Oh, I am the dragon-fly,
Here I fly, there I fly, very high, very high;
See me flit, see me flutter to the sky, sky, sky.

Voice of the WATER-SKATER (outside, very loud and funny): Haw! Haw! Haw, Haw! That's a good one! Haw! Haw! Haw! Haw!

(Enter MR. WATER-SKATER, running very fast with bent knees, in comical zig-zags over the water). TOMMY shrinks away frightened as he passes and starts to jump off the leaf, but thinks better of it. MISS DRAGON-FLY stops angrily, hands on her hips.)

MR. WATER-SKATER (moving fast all the time he talks): Haw! Haw! Haw! Haw! That was a good one! (To TOMMY):

Sky, sky, sky,
Oh, I, Oh, I am the dragon-fly,
Watch me fly, watch me fly, very high, very high,
Watch me flitter, flutter, flutter, to the sky, sky, sky.

Voice of the WATER-SKATER (outside, very loud and funny): Haw! Haw! Haw, Haw! That's a good one! Haw! Haw! Haw! Haw!

(Enter MR. WATER-SKATER, running very fast with bent knees, in comical zig-zags over the water). TOMMY shrinks away frightened as he passes and starts to jump off the leaf, but thinks better of it. MISS DRAGON-FLY stops angrily, hands on her hips.)

MR. WATER-SKATER (moving fast all the time he talks): Haw! Haw! Haw! Haw! That was a good one! (To TOMMY):

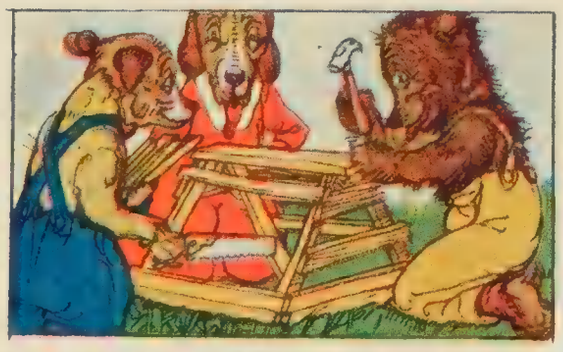
Sky, sky, sky,
Oh, I, Oh, I am the dragon-fly,
Watch me fly, watch me fly, very high, very high,
Watch me flitter, flutter, flutter, to the sky, sky, sky.



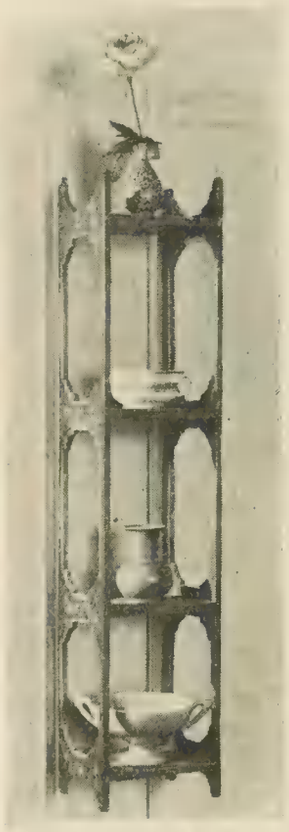
DELI-BEAR'S EASTER BUNNIES

"Oh, Deli-dear," says Mother Bear, "run, mail this note for me."
And Deli gives his solemn word—forget it? No, not he!

"Hey! Come on out!" call Deli-dogs and Deli runs to play,
And brag about the bunnies he will get on Easter Day.

So Deli-dogs and Deli-bear are helping one another
To build a coop to hold the rabbits promised by his mother.

Alas! What's this? It's Easter Day, and not a rabbit's there!
Nor hair nor hide of one can Del discover anywhere!



"I'm sorry, dear," says Mother Bear. "I wrote two weeks ago,
To order you the rabbit pair. I don't—Oh! Oh! Oh! Oh!"

Oh, Deli-bear, what's this? The note you promised her to post.
It pays to keep your promises! It doesn't pay to boast!

The Charm of Painted Furniture

By
MRS. CHARLES BRADLEY SANDERS
Head of the Department of House Decoration

A COLORFUL WALL RACK

"IS PAINTED furniture just a fad, or has it come to stay?" people often ask. Unquestionably painted furniture is popular in these modern days; and it can hardly be said to be of passing favor, for it has been widely used ever since the eleventh century. Not only the famous English cabinetmakers, but the French, Dutch and Chinese masters as well, helped to develop the ancient art. Since color and its application is an important influence in our lives, it can be easily understood how men came to decorate the drab woods with pleasing tints.

A generous amount of painted furniture was made in England and France during the eighteenth century. Quantities of lacquered articles had been imported by the East India Company, and these served as inspiration for the Adam brothers, Heppelwhite, Sheraton and some of the French cabinetmakers. These craftsmen made no pretense of doing real lacquer work, however. They simply applied paint and artistic motifs to their furniture.

In England, during the nineteenth century, the vogue for painted furniture fell off somewhat, but interest in it increased in France earlier in the same century under the influence of a famous coach-painter named Martin. Commodes, beds, tables, chairs, bookcases, needle-cases and snuff-boxes were painted an exquisite soft green. These pieces were sometimes decorated with dainty garlands of gay flowers, and sometimes they were treated in a solid color only. Original pieces signed by Martin are especially prized to-day and may be seen in museums here and abroad.

Chippendale, the Adam brothers, Heppelwhite and Sheraton allowed themselves more variety in coloring their furniture, and used shades of gray, green, rose and soft reds. Many examples of the work of these men were brought to America during the eighteenth century.

Chests, hutches, boxes and chairs were among the first examples of American painted furniture. These, for the most part, were done by New England cabinetmakers, and were more simple in construction and decoration than their English and French originals. The body of each piece was generally a solid color simply adorned with some conventional design of flowers, fruit or baskets. Often the decoration consisted of a stencil painted in black or gilt across the wide top rail of a chair or on the vertical slats of a settee.

The modern home-maker should be sure to include in her scheme of furnishing some articles of modern painted furniture. But she should be careful not to stress the bizarre or the crude by using furniture painted in cheap, harsh colors. She should choose carefully from some reputable manufacturer, or else paint furniture of good lines herself. She can then select a soft shade of gray, green, blue, mulberry or rose which will blend with her room.

There is no charm more permanent than that of a satisfying color scheme, and painted furniture serves as a practical means to this end. It fills too deep a need to be ever considered a fad. Of course, as in all things, the cheap and gaudy will pall and be discarded, but the really beautiful will last, giving service and pleasure to the home-maker and her family.

If among the large assortment of painted furniture on the market the home-maker can not find a color to blend with the individual scheme of decoration, manufacturers are always glad to paint furniture any shade which may be desired. Also there is a large quantity of unpainted furniture being manufactured just now. This comes in a wide assortment of designs, from which one may choose individual pieces. It is much less expensive than already painted furniture, and it is not a difficult process to paint these pieces at home.

PAINT YOUR OWN FURNITURE

There's your old porch furniture, the worn set in your guest-room, the charming but battered antique you relegated to the garret. They are still good—and with a coat of bright paint, you can give them new life and usefulness. Paint them yourself—entertainingly, easily. Just follow the directions in THE DELINEATOR'S new booklet, "Paint Your Own Furniture," and you can't go wrong. If you have a longing to wield a paint-brush, send twenty-five cents to the Department of House Decoration, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and the booklet will be mailed to you directly

PAINTED BEDROOM FURNITURE IS APPROPRIATE IN HOUSE OR APARTMENT

THERE IS FRESHNESS AND CHARM IN THIS CREAM-WHITE DINING-ROOM

THIS EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY CHAIR IS AS ATTRACTIVE AS WHEN FIRST DECORATED

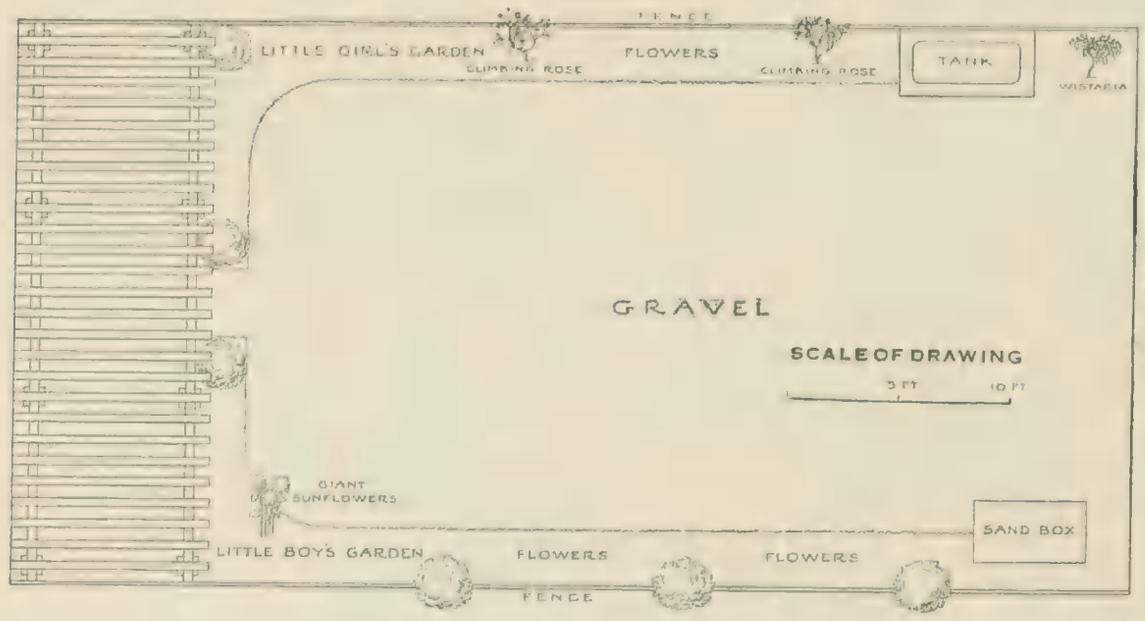
Any furniture worth painting at all is worth painting well, whether it be previously painted or varnished, old unpainted or new unpainted. The amateur will be more than repaid if she uses only good paint and brushes and gives each coat plenty of time to dry. She will find it easier if she elevates the articles she is planning to paint on a board or table.

A good grade of paint-remover or varnish remover should be applied to all previously varnished or painted furniture. Follow the directions printed on the can. Varnish-remover is very strong and should not be allowed to touch the clothing, draperies, any other furniture, or a painted or varnished floor. As it is "messy" work to remove paint or varnish it should, if possible, be done outdoors or in a shed or cellar. A painter's scraper costs but a few cents and saves energy and time in removing the gummy mass made by the varnish-remover.

After the first coat of varnish-remover has been scraped off, apply another coat of it to take off any especially stubborn spots, scraping the surface gently as before. The next step is to wash the furniture thoroughly with a strong soap and water. Washing-soda added to the water assists in removing all traces of the old finish as well as the paint-remover. It is most important that none of the liquid remover be left on, for it will burn through and destroy the new finish when it is applied.

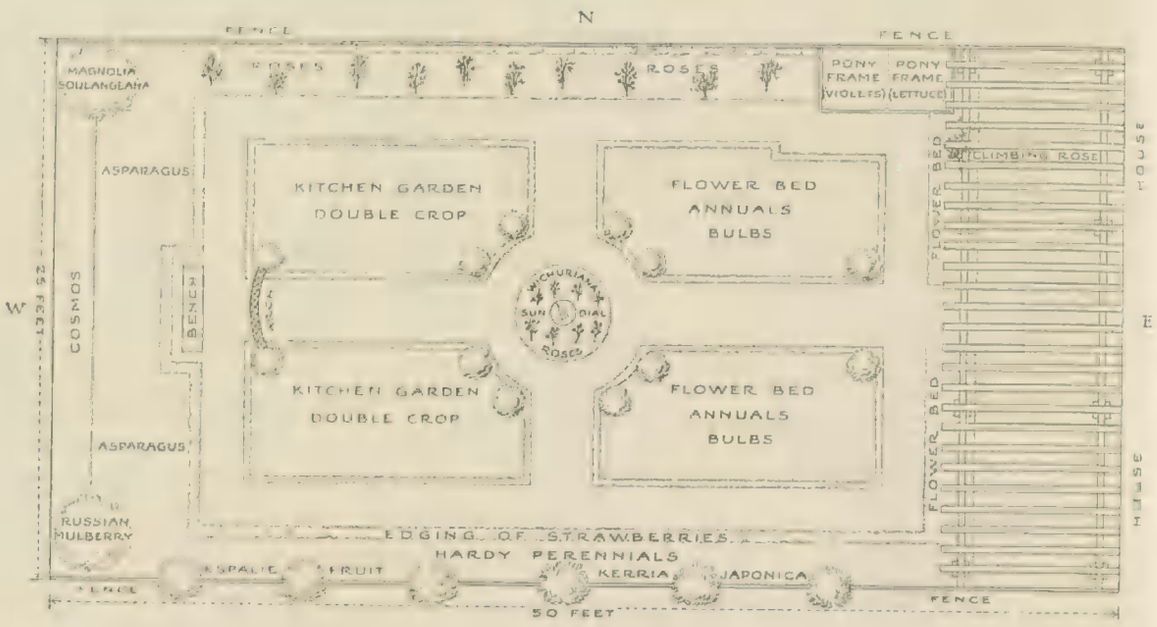
After the article has thoroughly dried, proceed with the first step toward beauty. If the wood is of open grain, such as oak or maple, a paste filler should be rubbed in across the grain of the wood with a soft cloth. This insures a perfectly smooth foundation for future operations. After the filler has dried—and this takes about forty-eight hours—sandpaper it lightly with sandpaper. Dust the furniture carefully and apply the first coat of paint.

Remember that the first coat of paint should be put on as carefully as the last. In order to apply a smooth, even coat, take only a little paint on your brush at a time. Work with long, even strokes, brushing the paint well into the wood. Even the best brush is apt to drop a hair when it is new. Watch out for this and remove the hair by raising it with the tip of a knife and then lifting it off with the fingers. Paint over the place where the hair has been taken out.



Give each coat a sufficient time to dry. Test the surface by placing the hand firmly down on the painted article. If it does not feel sticky, it is ready to be painted again. When the last coat has dried, brush a thin coat of varnish over the surface. And when this has dried, rub down the furniture with a piece of felt dipped in powdered pumice moistened with oil.

Because of lack of space these directions have been made most general. Before beginning the actual work, a housewife should have explicit and expert directions concerning the selection of paints or colors, the kinds of finishes, stencil and decalcomania decorations, as well as the actual painting.



Two Gardens

One owner had children — the other had none

By FRANCES DUNCAN

THIS BACK-YARD GARDEN LEAVES ROOM FOR THE CHILDREN TO PLAY

WHILE THIS PLOT UTILIZES EVERY FOOT OF SPACE FOR PLANTING

A GARDEN is not like—well, measles, for instance, which comes in a certain definite way; or jelly, for example, which hardens in a set shape. No, indeed; a garden is a fairy thing which can be changed and altered like magic. A dreary Cinderella back yard can be transformed into a smiling Princess garden. The same small plot can be a waste spot, or a flowery place for children to play, or a nook luxuriant with fruits and vegetables to delight the heart of the housewife. And the proof of this magic is right on this page!

Prosaically speaking, suburbanites and other folks who have tiny yards at their disposal may be divided into two classes. There are those who have children to consider, and whose back yards must be playground as well as garden. And there are those who have no children or whose youngsters are old enough to take a grown-up interest in flowers and have no desire to see-saw into the hollyhocks or to make mud pies in the freshly turned earth. Of course, the same arrangement will not suit both gardens. What shall be done about it?

A GARDEN FOR THOSE WHO HAVE LITTLE FOLKS

When there are little children in the family, the back-yard garden, however small, must meet the following requirements:

1. It must be interesting to the child in order that he or she will prefer it to the dangerous street.
2. The planting must be such that the "Don'ts" are reduced to a minimum. This will make the garden a happy place for both mother and children.
3. It must afford space for drying clothes.
4. It must afford play-space—as much as possible. There must even be some room for play when the drying of clothes is in progress.
5. It must be attractive to look upon. The devastation which sometimes follows in the wake of children's play is unnecessary if the yard space is adapted to the needs of the children.
6. It must have shade. Then the children may play and the baby may have an out-of-doors nap in the hottest part of the day without being exposed to the sun.

The first spot to show symptoms of the children's use of the yard is the grass-plot. Therefore dispense with it. Take but a narrow strip next to the fence for planting and defend this border from heedless little feet by a caging or stout board. Gravel mixed with sand will pack into a smooth surface and give far less opportunity for tumbles than the usual flagged path with its sharp-cornered coping-stones. If the whole space is on a single level, many a tumble will be avoided. Such a play yard is drier for little feet, and the fine gravel is less destructive to clothes than is the earth of a worn grass-plot.

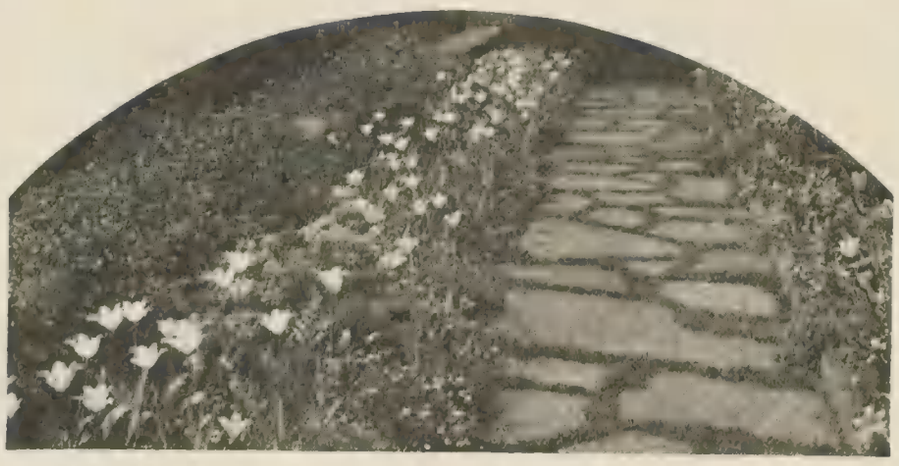
At the foot of the yard have a rough arbor, strong enough to support a swing, if the children are little. A discarded automobile tire slung from a cross-beam makes an admirable exercising-ring for older youngsters. A horizontal ladder, arranged so it can be hauled up when not in use, may also be hung from the arbor, or it can serve as a platform for a slide. In fact a strongly built pergola will suggest endless possibilities to an energetic small boy. And covered with vines, it makes a pleasant place for the baby's nap and for small daughter's tea-parties.

At one end of the arbor a heavily built low table which can be used as a work-bench should be placed. At the other end a hinged wooden box, the width of the arbor, serves as a seat and as a place for toys and tools. The heavy cross-beam of the pergola does away with the need of separate clothes-posts, for lines can be stretched from it to the house or to a parallel beam near the house. If an opening be left through the festoons of clothes, even on washday the children can amuse themselves in their out-of-doors play-room, undisturbed and undisturbing.

And what about the planting? Against the fence is a two-foot-wide garden-bed. A six-inch board, sunk to the depth of three inches, will be found to be a more secure guard than a wire protection, which is not easily seen. Close against the fence are planted early-flowering trees, dogwood, crimson peach, hawthorn, red-bud, or Judas tree. Neither cat nor dog nor child is likely to disturb these.

For the first season, gourds are planted to grow over the arbor. In front of it is the children's garden consisting of Russian sunflower, which gives seclusion to their play-room, cornflower, morning-glory and other easily grown annuals. In the long garden beds are German iris, hollyhocks, chrysanthemums—all set close against the fence—and zinnias, in shades of pale rose, deep rose and maroon.

In the Autumn, plant crocuses, snowdrops and daffodils in abundance. For bulbs, which are always a peculiar delight to children, will be joyously awaited in the Spring. Each youngster should have his or her small section of the flower-bed to plant therein what he or she chooses.



An additional joy, not difficult to compass, is a tub sunk close to the fence near the house where it will be convenient to the water-supply. Here turtles will thrive and tiny boats may be sailed. Playing with water, which in the house causes disorder and inconvenience, may here be enjoyed with no trouble whatever. The tub may be boxed in by a wooden caging with a five or six inch space between it and the "pool," and by planting primroses or forget-me-nots in this little space the tub may be attractively flower-encircled.

Such an arrangement of a back yard will be found of real service to busy mothers. It will be especially lovely in the Spring, a comfortable shady place in the Summer, and a boon to the little folk throughout the entire season.

WHICH GARDEN DO YOU WANT?

Have you children? Then choose the left garden and give them a place to play. No children? Then choose the right one, and have for your own enjoyment its secluded terrace and sweet-smelling blooms.

THE DELINEATOR garden pattern will tell you all you need to know about keeping either of these gardens. It's laid out with every foot of space accounted for and with directions for all the plantings. You couldn't have a garden any easier way—and think of the endless pleasure it will mean to you and your family. Twenty-five cents, sent to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., will bring you your "garden on paper" in just a few days

FLORAL CHARM LIES IN THIS TULIP-BORDERED WALK

A GARDEN FOR THOSE WHO HAVE NO CHILDREN

Let us imagine that the owner of the second little yard is a person very fond of gardening, one who likes to spend time with her flowers as well as on them. Therefore the garden has been arranged so that many a household duty can be performed in it. A valuable feature of this yard is the lattice-enclosed-flagged terrace or porch, which can make either an outdoor kitchen or dining-room for the housewife. The lattice with its roses gives as much seclusion to the place as if it were indoors. Here washing can be done or vegetables can be prepared. Here also is a delightful place for breakfast on a warm Summer morning, and a quiet nook for the man of the house to take his pipe and his paper in the cool of the evening.

In the small flower-bed under the roses on the sunny side are the earliest bulbs, also Winter aconite, Christmas rose, and a few plants of evergreen candytuft. These will give a bit of cheer in the Winter and will bloom in the Spring at the earliest possible moment. Just inside, shaded by the lattice, are primroses and violets.

A very prominent feature of any yard, especially of a small yard, is the fence. Flowers come and flowers go, but the fence remains quite as plain as the walls of an undecorated room. There are various ways of treating this eyesore. One very satisfactory method of camouflaging

IF YOU LIKE THIS BUNGALOW

This stucco bungalow, so quaint and attractive on the outside, so cozy and practical within, is planned to simplify the business of living and yet not sacrifice any of the comforts of a large home. Would you like to own it? You can build from a workable blue-print with floor-plans and elevations — which will cost you only one dollar if you write to the Home-Building Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and ask for DELINEATOR House Plan Number 12. Or, if before you buy the blue-print you want to see THE DELINEATOR'S entire selection of model houses, ask for the special sheet that pictures them all; this costs you nothing but a stamped return envelope

FIRST FLOOR PLAN

THE CLEVER DIVISION OF THIS HOUSE INTO THREE UNITS INSURES PRIVACY AND QUIET

"WHAT I really want," said the woman dubiously, "is a little house with all the advantages of a big one. But I suppose that's impossible."

"I don't think so," said the contractor. "What about a bungalow?"

"One of those little cramped affairs with no closet-space, rooms too small for ordinary-sized furniture—a place where no one has any privacy whatsoever? No, thank you."

"Just you glance at this plan for a minute," persuaded the contractor, as he spread before his client the blue-print of DELINEATOR House Plan number twelve. "It's what I should call a model bungalow."

"Why, it's a darling," she cried enthusiastically, "but—but are you sure it is as good as it looks? Tell me about the plan itself and all its advantages."

"This home will be warm in Winter and cool in Summer, because it's intended to be built of stucco," began the man.

"Stucco—that sounds attractive. But can stucco be painted? I do love color."

"Certainly it can," replied the contractor: "there's a specially prepared stucco coating or paint which is excellent. It's moisture-proof and comes in ten different shades. Or, if you like, the stucco itself can be tinted with pigments or colored sands. Then there's a new method that's proved most successful. Colored chips or pebbles are thrown against the moist wall, then lightly pressed in with a wooden float, which firmly embeds them in the stucco. Now for the roof——"

"Wait, a minute, please," interrupted the woman. "Will these colorings stand wind and weather?"

"Yes, indeed," was the reply; "all these methods are absolutely permanent."

"Good—and what were you going to say about the roof?"

"You'd like a shingled one, I suppose, of wood or asbestos."

"Which do you advise?" asked the woman with a perplexed look.

"Well," replied the contractor, "asbestos shingles are most appropriate, and they come in any number of colors. A conglomerate shade is good, because it blends with any tone. It comes in two finishes, also—smooth, which brings out the color of the shingle; or rough, which gives an especially pleasing texture to the roof."

"Are wood shingles any less expensive?" inquired the woman. "I must be thrifty."

"The initial cost of asbestos shingles is considerably higher than wood: yes. But figured on the cost-per-year basis, the asbestos shingles are cheaper, since they require almost no maintenance charges. The older the roof the tougher this kind of material becomes. It never needs paint and seldom repairs."

"It seems to me—" began the woman—"but, no, before I decide all these important outside details let's see the inside of the little house. After all, the interior is what counts most of all. And, remember, I want roominess, compactness, closet-space and privacy. Has this house all those virtues?"

"Just you wait," beamed the contractor. "Do you see how it is built? In three parts, you might say. The living-room is one unit, the back wing with the two bedrooms is another, and the side wing is another. Each part can be absolutely shut off by itself, which insures perfect privacy, you see. Then, too, if the family should grow larger, the front bedroom can easily be made into a dining-room and other bedrooms can be added to the rear wing."

"What a splendid arrangement!" said the woman eagerly; "and I do like that feeling of 'separateness' each room has. Yet I don't see a bit of wasted space."

"There isn't any," responded the contractor. "And just look here. There's a closet out of your entryway for coats and rubbers and umbrellas. And there are five other closets besides—ample room for clothes, for linen, for brooms, the vacuum cleaner, mops and the like. There's a place for everything of that sort to be put away out of sight in this house."

"I'm beginning to be enthusiastic," said the home-builder, smiling. "Plenty of closet-space is one of my hobbies. Let's attack the kitchen now. Is it big enough to be practical? I don't want a little cramped kitchenette."

"You won't have a 'little cramped kitchenette' in this house. But you'll have an ample, light, airy workroom, practical and step-saving down to the last detail. The work-table is near the stove. The refrigerator over in one corner can be reached by the iceman from the porch. Then there is a table for soiled dishes under the window, and to the left of that is the sink. Farther on to the left is a dresser for the clean dishes."

"Oh, I see!" said the woman. "You work right around in one direction. Why, think of the thousands of criss-crossing steps I'd save! And the little dining-alcove conveniently near, too. I'd love working in a kitchen like this."

"The living-room is pretty nice, too, I think you'll find—and a man would heartily approve it. It's big, yet comfortable and cozy with its open fireplace."

"That will be a good place for my big divan under those windows there at the front. Oh, and a terrace! I didn't notice that before."

"Yes, you see the living-room opens out on it, through French windows. It's an attractive room Winter and Summer. Then please notice that the bedrooms are all good-sized with plenty of window-space to allow for light and sun. The front chamber is really a wonder."

"It's a jewel of a place, and I'm convinced that it fulfils all my requirements. It's a big little house, quaint and attractive on the outside, cozy and practical within. You were quite right to call it a model bungalow.

"But I must ask you one more question. Is a bungalow hard to heat?"

"No, indeed," replied the contractor: "but did you know that about one-fourth of all the coal burned in all our homes is wasted? The heat escapes through the plaster ceilings to the attic-space under the roof, so I would advise placing

The Two of You

By

CELIA CAROLINE COLE

RAIN! And dozens of girls, slanted against the rain, blowing along the street and disappearing into big buildings. "Thin rain, leaning on the wind." April in the air. Girls young, gay-hearted, confident, being swallowed up for the day in offices. And we, high up above them, nibbling the end of our pen, and thinking, thinking ever so hard.

How many of those girls—secretaries and stenographers and all the other women with "jobs"—how many of them think beauty is only skin deep? They know! Because they are right on the front line of the funny old war between the sexes that has been going on ever since Eve bit the apple and Adam told on her.

They know that you can get a "job" because you are pleasing externally. You soothe the impressionable soul of a man—though he doesn't realize that, because, not being a woman, he doesn't analyze all his emotions. He just knows that he feels nicer and happier when he looks at you, and so you get the "job."

And maybe you don't get it, because you don't make him feel that way. You are too negative to start any pleasant vibrations. Or you're the "doll-baby" type, and on no condition does he want you around. Or you are attractive (in a way), but too artificial. A man parts with his illusions with pain; he doesn't like the lip-stick look.

As the maw of each building opposite swallowed up girls, we saw something. Each girl as she went in left outside on the street a self that didn't belong in the office—the self that dreams about love, a husband, and a home.

It's like Lilith and Eve. Lilith—the lovely, legendary first woman, elder sister or other self of Eve—had nothing to do with apples and commands, but only to be witty and alluring and wise where men and serpents were concerned. But Eve, patting busily around the garden, had heaps to do because she knew so little and wanted to know so much in order to be independent and a person.

And every woman of us is a Lilith-and-Eve—but business girls are most of all.

The girl in the office needs charm, but not the kind that distracts nor even attracts, so that an employer is conscious of being attracted.

We asked heaps and heaps of men if they liked them pretty, and all of them said: "Sure! The prettier the better, if they have brains enough to attend to their jobs and not let men call them up on the telephone all the time."

One of the things we discovered, talking with girls in offices here in New York, is that they either wash with water at noon or don't cleanse their faces at all, but just powder freshly. Both bad habits! Water coarsens the pores and dries the skin. Warm water is especially bad; it's relaxing to the muscles and tissues. And cold water won't cleanse thoroughly.

It does seem as if every girl could have a little place for a jar of cold-cream and a small roll of absorbent cotton and a box of the new, soft, inexpensive cold-cream removers that have just been put on the market. It's taken three years of experimenting to perfect them so that there is no lint and no grain.

Wet a piece of cotton about four inches square in cold water, squeeze it out, rub it over with the cleansing cold-cream and wash the face with it. Then take several layers of the tissue remover and wipe one side of the face with an up-and-out stroke. Then turn the tissue pad over, and wipe the other side of the face. Separate the layers of tissue, put the used sides together, which gives a clean new pad, and wipe the face once more, making sure that not a trace of cream is left.

TOO BUSY TO BE BEAUTIFUL?

Whether you are an Eve-in-the-Office, or an after-five Lilith or a busy, busy home-maker, don't "let yourself go!" If you want to look trim, alive and lovely, write Celia Caroline Cole and ask her for exercises to beautify your body—for preparations to gladden your skin—for advice on any personal beauty problem you may have. She is eager to help you. Tell her all about it at her DELINEATOR address, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. And don't forget a stamped envelope for her reply

If you need rouge—if you are colorless and look drab and unaccented and a touch of rouge gives you a come-alive, happy look—there is a delightful little thin celluloid tube of very good rouge which you can buy for thirty-five cents. It lasts a long time and is exceedingly easy to carry in your purse. Then a fluff of powder of your particular shade—cream, or flesh, or white, or a delicate pink if you are a blonde—and never, never heavily scented.

And while we are on this matter of scent, girls in offices shouldn't have any scent except that of a freshly tubbed, freshly shampooed, freshly "underclad" human. Perfume belongs to Lilith, the after-five self, not to Eve.

Which brings us to soap. Have your own soap in your office, delicately scented if scented at all. Use it for hands and neck and ears. And never, never, never use anybody else's soap.

Hands impeccable as to cleanliness, beautifully groomed as to nails are so frightfully important in an office. Happily for most of us, hands that are not beautifully shaped can be made charming and expressive. It is much more a matter of color, texture and movement than of shape and size.

The first need of almost all American hands is oil. Brittle nails come from lack of oil. Chapped and reddened and wrinkled hands can be gloriously improved by oil. Pure olive-oil or either of the two beautiful oils on the market that have been especially evolved for hands should be rubbed in well and worked in carefully around the cuticles. Dry cuticles should have cold-cream or oil rubbed into them every night. You've no idea, until you try it, how quickly and generously hands respond to care.

Never wash them in hot water. Use lukewarm—you'll like it after a while—and never wash them halfway. Wrinkles and a grimy tone of skin result from such carelessness. Wash them thoroughly in a pure vegetable-oil soap and dry them thoroughly. Then a lotion—there is one that we think the Goddess of Beauty made herself—and there are many others that are also good.

Then if you want your hands softly white, use a good bleach. We know a delightful one that is nice and reasonable, too. And there is always the lemon, the beloved and redeeming lemon. Keep one in the bathroom at home. Squeeze some juice in your two glasses of cold water before breakfast. Squeeze some more in the water you wash hands and neck in. It has fine cleansing properties. And put some on your hands at night to whiten them.

If you can, go to a good manicurist once a week. And the night before you go, soak your hands for ten minutes in hot oil, and then don't wipe it off too rigidly. Leave a little on. Having wicked cuticles ourself, we know quite a lot about that evil and how difficult it makes a home manicure. But with the aid of many a wise manicurist we have evolved a home manicure in between the once-a-week one, which includes a really good cuticle cream every night, and a system of manicuring. We would like to give it to you here only there isn't space; but we'll send it to you if you want us to.

No manicure should ever be done with a stiff file. Nor should the fingers ever be soaked longer than five minutes in the lukewarm soapy water. Nor should the pointed end of an orange stick ever be used, but always the rounded end, except when wrapped in cotton and used to put the peroxid and pumice powder under the nails to remove stains. Nor should cuticles ever be cut. Like children they should be gently but firmly trained and not half destroyed with violence. Nor should they be pushed back with a knife, but with a flat orange stick. And 'ware, oh beware, of liquid polishes! There are two good ones, only, that we know about. Powder is safer, only always put on a little paste or cream first.

Bare arms should be mostly left at home when it comes to offices. The little dark-blue serge with its long sleeves and young, crisp, becoming, enchanting white collars and cuffs is the perfect note in the office. Remember, too, that bracelets belong to Lilith, not to Eve. Lilith can clank and gleam all she wants to after five o'clock, but Eve-in-the-Office is quiet and deft.

If any girl who works in an office is too fat, she is a little lazy or not quite intelligent enough! With all these wonderful rubber reducing corsets—and they do do the work, and rollers for local fat—and they do do the work, and reducing creams and lotions—and lots of them do the work, and books on calories and books on reducing in spots—how can any self-respecting Eve let herself be too fat?

And now my starry-eyed, starry-dreamed Eves, all shut up in offices, what have we got? Simplicity, sincerity. Make men know that we aren't always taking the personal view-point, imagining injuries and slights and flatteries; that they can make a remark about humans in general, and we'll take it as such with no relation to us in particular. Make them know that we have other ambitions in life besides marriage; that we can stick to a job like a man.

Make men know that you are an honest, responsible, efficient, big-dreamed human, just like them—plus that something that the Great and Glad Creator of Man gave you when He made you after He did man because His first work didn't quite satisfy Him. Shall we call it charm, little Eve-in-the-Office? You and Lilith—the two of you!

SOULIÉ'S SKETCHES SENT FROM THE DELINEATOR'S PARIS ESTABLISHMENT SHOW THE CIRCULAR FLARE, THE NEW ENSEMBLES AND OTHER IMPORTANT MODES

The French idea of the suspender skirt with shoulder-straps is made of white crêpe de Chine with a blouse and front tunic of printed crêpe. From Blanche Lebouvier

A suggestion of 1870 is to be seen in the lifted apron drapery and bustle bow of a dinner gown by Rolande. It is of black satin over violine with crystal and violine embroidery

Beer places the new circular flare at the hip and ends it above the hem on an afternoon frock of chamois-yellow crêpe de Chine embroidered sparingly in gold. It is part of an ensemble

To the Prince of Wales coat Béchoff adds a feather collar and wristlets. The double-breasted coat is made of a beige and brown mixture

To the frock at the left Beer adds a coat of chamois-colored cloth embroidered in a plaid design and trimmed with bands of the plain cloth

Margaine Lacroix slashes a tunic of blue serge to the hip, disclosing a second tunic of jade-green Georgette. Both the green and blue are trimmed with a wool tissue of yellow, beige and brick stripes with an over design in dark brown

Martial et Armand make an ensemble costume of beige kasha cut and trimmed on straight lines with insertions of brown kasha and edges of copper color. The frock is of copper-colored kasha with collar and cuffs of ivory embroidery

Goupy uses the sweater neck and the effect of the kick plait in a frock of nut-brown crêpe de Chine with the collar, facing and under skirt of beige

Chavériat takes thought of the coming Summer with a frock of white Georgette with the hem, panel and collar of rose-pink Georgette. The rose embroidery is worked in shaded ribbon and follows a trellis of drawn-work

Kasha is the material of the hour and the ensemble costume the most important of the Spring models. Alice Bernard uses both in a coat and frock of yellow wool with a body of white kasha embroidered in rust

THE NEW IN NEW YORK

The Bride Takes the White Veil and Gown of Tradition, or Turns to Silver or Palest Pink

By Evelyn Dodge

AFTER you have decided that you will love, honor and use your own judgment about obeying, the next, almost equally important question concerns your wedding-gown and trousseau. Will you go to the altar white and nun-like in the demure virginal white of tradition? Will a glint of silver or gold show through the cloudy loveliness of your tulle veil? Or will you give them something to talk about by following the new vogue of pale shell or flesh pink for your veil and gown? The modern girl even at this romantic moment is clear-thinking and long-headed and the new idea of pale pink appeals to her for a frock that she will wear later for dinners and dances. The white gown is lovely for the actual ceremony, but it has deadly broadcasting powers afterward, and for that reason the apparent frivolity of pale pink has its practical side.

The conventions which govern the modern wedding and the trousseau and which vary a little each year have been tabulated for your guidance.

THE WEDDING-GOWN—An afternoon frock of the more formal type or an evening gown not too décolleté, and that provides for a temporary sleeve, is the customary wedding-dress. The straight, unbroken lines of the slim, narrow sheath frock or tunic are quite wonderful for lace, brocade or a beaded gown. The sheath flared below the knee is new and very smart. For the very young bride the bouffant robe de style makes a lovely picture. Draperies are suited to the stately wedding-gown of white satin or brocade of tradition.

Sleeves are usually considered obligatory; but they may be as short as one likes and can be removed when the frock is worn for evening. The great French dressmakers use the long, close sleeve, usually of lace.

The neck outline may be square, rounded, V or bateau shape, but must not be cut too low (see page 33).

The material for the wedding-gown depends on the formality of the wedding and to a certain extent on the age of the bride. For a formal church wedding lace, moire or brocade, satin, satin crêpe, crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, crêpe faille, broché silk crêpe, Georgette, chiffon or chiffon voile trimmed with lace, with great roses outlined in pearls, with crystal or silver embroideries, are used. Silver cloth and silver brocade are suitable, but you would have very little use for such a formal gown during the Spring and Summer. The very young bride may use taffeta or moire, taffeta, or if she is to have a small home wedding late in the Spring she may use organdy trimmed with lace.

THE VEIL—Real lace for the veil is very beautiful, but nothing has ever been devised that is lovelier than a cloud of tulle illusion. It is sometimes edged with lace and it may be draped to the head forming a cap caught up with orange-blossoms, or it may be draped from a coronet of lace or pearl beads, or caught to the back of the head by a bandeau of flowers or twisted ribbon.

Trains are used quite generally for formal church weddings. The train should be detachable so that it can be removed when the dress is worn later.

Slippers may be the opera pump or a sandal and should be white or silver or a pale pink to match the gown. White satin slippers are frequently embroidered with pearls or trimmed with a very tiny spray of orange-blossoms. The sheer silk stocking should match the slipper.

The Bouquet—The conventional round bouquet of orchids and lilies-of-the-valley is always lovely, but many brides carry a sheaf of madonna lilies or a great bouquet of white lilac. The quaint, old-fashioned paper-frilled bouquet is in keeping with the bouffant robe de style.

THE ATTENDANTS—A bride may have a matron or maid of honor, as many bridesmaids as she likes and a small page and flower girl. The maid or matron of honor may be dressed like the bridesmaids but in a different color, or her dress may be of a different style as well as color.

Like the bride, the attendants may wear any formal afternoon or evening style with sleeves, made in any material that is suited to the style. Georgette, chiffon, chiffon voile, tulle and taffeta and lace are light and diaphanous, and are the materials most used.

The attendants may all be dressed in the same color or colors, or a different sweet-pea or snapdragon color may be used for each pair. It is very new to have each pair dressed in a graduating shade of the same color, the palest shades coming next to the bride. When the bride wears pale flesh or shell pink, the deepening shades of pink for the bridesmaids make a very lovely picture..

Combinations of colors frequently used in the attendants' dresses are hydrangea pink and blue, hyacinth blue and lavender, powder blue with rose, silver, apple green or yellow, pale yellow with pale green or silver, blue and orchid, the ombre or graded shades of rose, green, yellow or violet, salmon or peach with Nattier blue or silver. If the bride's gown is embroidered with silver, it is very lovely to use silver on the attendants' dresses.

For a church wedding, the bridesmaids' heads must be covered. Abroad they sometimes wear veils instead of hats and the effect is delightful. The slippers should be of satin matching the dress or of silver.

THE TROUSSEAU will depend entirely on where and how you are going to live. A little flat in the Fifties and a ranch in Montana require totally different outfits.

The ensemble wardrobe would provide a suitable daytime wardrobe for a town or city bride, with its coat and two or three allied frocks. For general wear there should be a simple wool frock of the coat material or of a harmonizing plaid, check or striped fabric. For afternoon, a frock with a tunic or upper part matching the lining silk or crêpe, with the lower part of the dress of the coat material, will answer for luncheons, bridge, tea, etc. Or, if your coat is full length, you can have a silk frock of the gay lining.

For the wool part of your ensemble you can use lightweight, short-nap materials, soft twills, ribbed wools, cashmere suitings, kasha or broadcloth. If you prefer a silk ensemble, you can have a coat of heavy silk crêpe, crêpe satin or satin. The silk, of course, is very elegant, but not as generally useful as the more practical woolens.

The coat can be lined with flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin or a bordered silk in a contrasting color, or with a printed silk crêpe, crêpe de Chine or silk. The lining silk should match the ensemble frock or the tunic blouse or upper part of the dresses worn with the coat.

As you will use your ensemble coat and one of its frocks for your going-away costume, choose a lovely color for it. Green in the new amande, meadow and cedar shades, a soft rose shade or natural color for kasha, the soft grayish blue known as porcelain, brick, copper or terra-cotta, French gray, the beige shades, mustard and suède color, as well as the more sober shades of dark blue, brown and black, are smart this Spring. Before choosing your ensemble wardrobe turn back to the March DELINEATOR in which different types of ensemble coats and frocks are illustrated and described as to materials, colors, trimmings and accessories.

EVENING CLOTHES—Your wedding-dress without its sleeves will take care of formal dinners, dances, etc. For the theater and informal dances you will need a second frock of Georgette, chiffon, silk voile or crêpe de Chine. The new handkerchief and cascade draperies make self-trimmed frocks that are as smart as they are inexpensive. The Spring evening colors are the rose shades from pale tea-rose pink to a clear jack-rose red, yellow, orchid, lilac, fuchsia, cyclamen, the greens from pale water green to jade, periwinkle, royal and powder blue, and white. Pale beige, blond, string color and brown are considered very smart in Paris.

For an evening wrap you can have either a coat or cape. Black satin lined with silver, gray or white satin makes a smart wrap that can be worn with any frock. Colors are gay and pretty, but you must be sure that they harmonize with all your frocks. It is very elegant, but also quite extravagant, to have your frock and wrap match in color or material and color. Duvetyn and broadcloth in brilliant colors make inexpensive but satisfactory wraps.

LINGERIE (see page 32)—A dishabille or tea-gown of Georgette, crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, satin, etc., in a delicate color will be very useful when your score or more best girl friends come for tea or lunch, or when you dine alone at home with your bridegroom. Pajamas are very comfortable for lounging purposes and some girls like them for sleeping garments, though for a trousseau nightgowns are daintier.

Slips, combinations, envelope chemises and step-ins should be cut on the new narrow lines to give the right silhouette under sheath dresses. Slips that are worn under tunic blouses are made of silk crêpe, soft satin, crêpe meteor or crêpe de Chine. Under non-transparent dresses one can use the same materials or the less expensive radium silk, habutai silk, glove silk, silk jersey or sateen.

For nightgowns, step-ins, etc., the most popular material is crêpe de Chine. Washable satin, Georgette, wash silk are also used, and underwear mull, cotton voile, fine cotton crêpe, batiste and dimity come in sweet colors. Long-cloth and nainsook are substantial and practical.

The prettiest lingerie colors are flesh pink, rose, geranium, peach, maize, baby blue, water green, canary and orchid. Trousseau lingerie should be trimmed daintily with Val., binche, filet or Irish crochet lace, hand-embroidery, ribbon bows and flowers, contrasting bindings.

HIGH HATTING THE SPRING MODE IN NEW MILLINERY

HATS are high in the crown, narrow in the brim, and round, pointed, flat-topped or helmet-shaped.

The small hat trimmed on top with an artichoke bow, pompoms, gardenias, roses, water lilies, violets or quills is very popular.

Hats for general wear remain head-size. The large hat is seen occasionally with afternoon gowns and will be worn with the more formal Summer frocks.

Silk, satin, Georgette, moire, duvetyn, velours, flannel, faille, bengaline, ribbon and fine kasha are used alone or with straw. The new straws are Milan, Milan hemp, straw and hair braids, bleached panama, bangkok, and cellophane cloth. Felt is very becoming and popular.

The smartest colors are black and brown, the color of an ensemble, its lining or its trimming. "High" shades of purple, fuchsia, brick, biscuit, powder blue and green are new and hydrangea pinks and blues, fuchsia, rose, ocher yellow, chair pink and pastel shades will be used for Summer hats.

The new trimmings are flowers, feather fancies, grosgrain ribbon, ornaments of crystal, marcasite or rhinestones.

In choosing a hat be sure the head size is exactly right. It must be large enough to pull well down on the head, but it must not stand away from it. Consider your height and the shape and length of your face in relation to the shape and height of the crown and the position of the trimming.

THE wiseacres who say that brides are not what they once were, are sometimes right. Instead of following the tradition of dead white for veil, gown and slippers many brides choose white and silver and more occasionally gold, or pale pink with a veil of flesh-pink tulle. A famous French dressmaker advocates the gown of very delicate blush-rose pink with a tulle veil of the same shade and it has been used for a number of important wedding.

TUNIC BLOUSE COSTUMES, THE NEWEST TWO-PIECE FROCK AND DRESSES

36 bust requires 2¾ yards 54-inch cashmere for dress. Lower edge, plaits drawn out, 2⅛ yards.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 46 bust; hat for ladies, misses, girls from 20½ to 22½ inches head measure.

5925—This one-piece slip-over dress has a straight lower edge and is especially designed for wide borders, half-and-half materials, novelty or plain fabrics. One may use novelty crêpe satin, novelty faille or satin, half-and-half crêpe satin, wide borders in heavy silks or cottons; or use printed bayadere designs, satin, heavy silk crêpe or shantung with plain to match; or crêpe satin, heavy silk crêpe or corded silks with same material in contrast, etc.

36 bust requires 1¾ yard 56-inch half-and-half material. Lower edge 45 inches.

The dress is smart for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5970—5631—10233—If your coat matches this slip-over tunic blouse and slip of satin or heavy crêpe de Chine, you will have a smart ensemble costume. You may use Canton crêpe or faille silk all one material or with same material in contrast for the blouse. The slip has an inverted plait at each side below the low waistline. Work the embroidery in silk braiding or outline.

36 bust requires 2½ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine, 2⅝ yards 35 to 39 inch crêpe de Chine for slip. Lower edge, plaits drawn out, 54½ inches.

Blouse is for 32 to 44 bust; slip for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

5956—5715—Use plain flannel or wool jersey of one material or the blouse trimmed with the same material in contrast for this slip-over blouse and the closed wrap-around, straight skirt. The blouse has a straight lower edge and the skirt has a cluster of plaits at the closing. You may use plain silk broadcloth, heavy crêpe de Chine, radium, satin, with a kasha skirt.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch flannel (including skirt on a camisole top). Lower edge of skirt, plaits drawn out, 52½ inches.

The blouse is for figures 32 to 44 bust; skirt for ladies 35 to 49½ hip.

5968—5638—10336—This slip-over tunic blouse is in peasant style and trimmed with a real peasant embroidery. Work the design in chain-stitch, etc. Plain crêpe de Chine or soft satin makes a smart costume; or use plain Georgette, printed crêpe de Chine, etc., with a slip of crêpe meteor, etc. The side seams of the slip are placed where they will not show between the open edges of the blouse.

36 bust requires 5⅜ yards 39-inch satin crêpe (including slip). Lower edge 44 inches.

The blouse is for figures 32 to 40 bust; slip for ladies 33 to 46 bust, also misses.

5944—5827—This slip-over tunic blouse is exceedingly easy to make of printed crêpe de Chine, radium or Georgette, or of plaids with frill of self material and bindings of plain to match. It has a straight lower edge and may be shorter. Or use printed Canton crêpe with plain Georgette etc. Wear it over a costume slip of silk crêpe.

36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 39-inch printed silk, 2⅜ yards 32 to 39 inch material for slip. Lower edge of slip 44½ inches.

Blouse is for figures 32 to 44 bust; slip for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

OUTFITS FOR THE YOUNGER GENERATION

5962—5631—5952—For this slip-over tunic blouse with the new puff sleeve, slip-through tab and straight lower edge, use satin with silk crêpe or faille silk with satin, etc. The costume slip is of crêpe meteor, soft satin or crêpe de Chine, and the hat with a six-gored crown is of faille silk, crêpe satin, etc.

19 years or 36 bust requires 2⅜ yards 39-inch material, 2⅝ yards 39-inch silk (including dress trimming). Lower edge of slip, plaits out 54½ ins.

Blouse is for ladies 38 to 40 bust, also misses 16 to 20; slip for ladies 32 to 48 bust; hat for ladies, misses, girls from 20½ to 22½ inches head measure.

5866—5549—Use soft twills, corded wools, cashmere dress goods, wool crêpe, kasha, ribbed silk, heavy silk crêpe or satin with silk crêpe in contrast, etc., for this one-piece slip-over dress. It is close fitting at the hipline and the collar and puffs may be detachable. For the hat with a four-gored crown use satin or faille silk. Lower edge 42½ inches.

16 years requires 1¾ yard 54-inch cashmere and ½ yard 35-inch silk for dress.

Dress is for misses 15 to 20, also small women; hat for misses and ladies.

13 years requires 1½ yard 54-inch flannel, ¼ yard 54-inch contrasting flannel for dress.

Dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15; hat for girls 2 to 12 years.

5872—Printed silk crêpes or wash silks with plain to match, or plain wash silks with contrasting color make an attractive one-piece slip-over dress. It is plaited at the sides and has a straight lower edge. The collar and cuffs may be detachable. You may use flat crêpe, etc. Lower edge, plaits out, 59 inches.

17 years requires 2¾ yards 39-inch printed silk.

Dress is for misses 16 to 20, also small women.

36 bust or 38 hip requires 3⅛ yards 35-inch cotton voile, 1⅝ yard 54-inch flannel for skirt.

Blouse is for figures 32 to 40 bust; skirt for ladies 38 and 40 bust, also misses 15 to 20 years; hat for ladies, misses, girls 20½ to 22½ inches head measure.

5946—5952—The junior's Easter is made complete with a coat of checks, small plaids, broadcloth, twills, ribbed wools or ribbed silks, with braid or soft pile fabrics, camel's-hair or cashmere coatings with floss stitching. The cape may be omitted. For her hat with its six-gored crown use flannel or duvetyn with silk pompons, etc.

12 years requires 2⅜ yards 54-inch wool check.

The coat is for juniors and girls 8 to 15; hat for girls 20½ to 21¼ head measure, also misses and ladies 21½ to 22½ inches head measure.

5972—Make her Easter coat on the newest lines with the epaulet shoulder, a notched collar and cuffs, etc. Soft pile fabrics, checks, cheviots, camel's-hair twills, tweed, homespun or mixtures are suitable materials to use for this coat which has the smart straight silhouette.

8 years requires 1⅜ yard 54-inch material for the coat.

FRENCH HATS, SIMPLE FROCKS, PAJAMAS AND LINGERIE FOR HOME SEWERS

Nightgown 5936

Pajamas 5948

Costume slip 5631

5977 5921 Dress 5921 5936 5948 5631 5623

5977—Striped cotton or silk broadcloth, pongee or heavy crêpe de Chine makes a becoming one-piece dress trimmed with plain to match. You may use cotton prints, gingham, novelty cottons with plain to match; or make it of plain cotton broadcloth, linen, linen-finished cottons, plain heavy cotton crêpe, cotton poplin, chambray, etc., with the same material in contrast. Lower edge 54 inches.

36 bust requires 3¾ yards 32-inch striped gingham.

The dress is attractive for ladies 32 to 50 bust.

5921—In this slip-over dress the straight lower part of check gingham or cotton crêpe, or novelty check cottons, is joined to a long body of plain material trimmed with the checked fabric. One may use plain cotton crêpe or plain pongee with print to match, colored light-weight linen-finished cottons, etc., with same material in white.

36 bust requires 1⅝ yards 32-inch chambray for body, 3⅛ yards 32-inch gingham. Lower edge 54 inches.

The dress is becoming to ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5936—The new style slip-over French nightgown has a becoming neck and a deep armhole. Use crêpe de Chine, wash silks, wash satins, Georgette, underwear mull, fine cotton crêpe, cotton voile, batiste, long-cloth or nainsook, or one material, with lace or the same material in contrast. It can be made without the tucks. Without tucks use dimity with bands of plain material.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 35 or 39 inch satin.

The nightgown is very lovely for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5966—The Spring hats have smart crowns and narrow turned-up brims. For this hat use duvetyn, velours or flannel with grosgrain ribbon around crown; or make it of corded silks or satin with self-binding and a satin ribbon around the crown.

22 inches or medium head measure requires ¾ yard 35-inch corded silk (cut crosswise), ½ yard 35-inch satin, etc.

The hat is for ladies and misses 21½ to 22½ inches head measure; also for girls 20½ to 21¼ inches head measure.

5623—This step-in chemise is especially designed to wear under the present-day styles. It may be made of crêpe de Chine or Georgette crêpe, or of fine nainsook, fine long-cloth, fine batiste or fine cotton voile. This chemise is very easy to make. The hand fagoting and flowers are a French trimming.

36 bust requires 1½ yards 35 or 39 inch crêpe de Chine for this garment.

The chemise is good style for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5631—An inverted plait at each side below the low waistline of this costume slip, gives ease in walking and still retains the slender silhouette. Use crêpe meteor, soft satin or crêpe de Chine; or under non-transparent dresses use these materials or radium silk, habutai silk, silk jersey, glove silk or sateen.

36 bust requires 2⅝ yards 35 or 39 inch crêpe de Chine. Lower edge plaits drawn out, 54½ inches.

The costume slip is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

36 bust requires 4⅛ yards 32-inch tub silk.

The pajamas are for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5952—This hat with its six-gored crown offers several trimming possibilities. You may use faille silk trimmed with a bow of grosgrain or satin ribbon and with the cords in all the gores running in the same direction or with cords in alternate gores running in opposite direction; crêpe satin using the shiny side and a bow of grosgrain ribbon or with alternate dull and shiny gores and satin ribbon bow, etc.

The hat is for ladies and misses 21½ to 22½ inches head measure and for girls 20½ to 21¼ inches head measure.

The two most popular hearty soups in America! Read how they differ

Vegetable-Beef

A masterpiece of fine soup blending! Nourishing pieces of beef—a lot of it. Puree of vegetables, tomatoes, diced carrots and white potatoes, little peas, onion and blanched pearl barley. Rich beef broth gives its vigor to the whole blend.

Heat Campbell's Vegetable-Beef, too, just as it comes from the can and serve it on toast for breakfast. Make a lunch or supper of this substantial and filling soup. Have it often for dinner.

Vegetable

You will choose Campbell's Vegetable whenever you wish a substantial soup that combines the largest number of different vegetables—diced, sliced or whole.

Fifteen different vegetables are in this blend! Beef broth. Cereals. Fresh herbs. Skilful seasoning. Thirty-two ingredients in all!

Both the Vegetable Soup and the Vegetable-Beef taste best when the water is added cold, the soup brought to a boil, allowed to simmer and then served hot.

How I make good

IF you have not yet learned how to make them you can do so very easily. I remember well my first pie. So hard and tough it was likened to a cart wheel. For a long time pie was my bugbear and I have heard many others say the same thing. I wanted to make good pies but dreaded to start because I was always worried and wondered how it was coming out. Would the crust be tough and hard, or perhaps so greasy it would leave an unpleasant stickiness in the mouth? And would the filling run out, all over the bottom of the oven and burn and fill the kitchen with smoke and make the pie taste smoky? And would the bottom crust be soaked and uneatable? If an apple pie, would the apples be still hard and uncooked when the pie looked as if it were thoroughly baked?

I am going to tell you how I learned to make perfect pies with a tender, flaky, digestible crust.

The first pie I ever made with which I was perfectly satisfied, I made with Crisco, a wholesome vegetable shortening. I have found that Crisco makes perfect pastry of every description, not only delicious to eat and look at but digestible as well.

But I started to tell you how to make a perfect pie.

*The surest way I know to make a good pie crust

For a medium size pie I use 2½ cups flour, ¾ cup Crisco, 1 teaspoon of salt. To measure ¾ of a cup of Crisco I take a measuring cup, put in ¼ cup of cold water, then add enough Crisco to bring the water to the top of the cup, pour it off and I have an exact ¾ cup of Crisco. Then I cut the Crisco into the flour with two knives, criss-cross fashion. (If I used my fingers the heat from them would soften the Crisco and blend it with the flour too closely to make a flaky crust.) As the Crisco is cut into small particles each one becomes covered with flour, and when enough cold water is added (4 to 6 tablespoons) the dough will then be composed of these small particles, which when rolled become layers of flour and Crisco. Then if baking is started in a very hot oven to set the mixture before the Crisco has time to melt, the result will be a tender, flaky pastry.

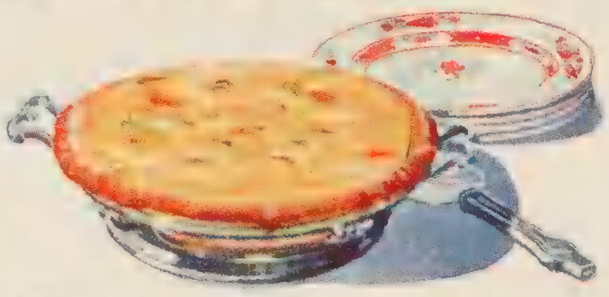
Be careful about water

Have the water cold and use only enough to make a paste which will easily clear the bowl and is soft enough so it will not break at the edges when rolled. It is easier to tell when you have just the right amount of water if you use your fingers to mix it. Now take half the dough, dust the board with flour, using as little as possible, and roll the pastry very lightly from the center outward, each motion of the rolling pin ending in the air, not on the board. It should be about an eighth of an inch thick. Fold it over one half, lay over a Criscoed plate, fold back over the plate, smooth into shape with the fingers and trim the edges.

To prevent the filling from soaking into the bottom crust

Brush it over with melted Crisco, dust a little flour over that, then add the filling prepared according to the recipe you are using. Moisten the edge with water, then roll the other half of the dough, fold it over one half, make slits with a knife in the center of the fold for steam

Chocolate Meringue Pie*



Make the pastry with Crisco and your pie shell will slip off the outside of the plate into the inside without breaking, and be tender and flaky, too.

Cover an inverted pie plate with pastry; turn back the edges to make it firm. Prick well with a fork to prevent bubbles. Bake in a hot oven, 450 degrees F. about 15 minutes. Then fill with Chocolate Cream made as follows:

2 squares from ½ lb. cake of chocolate	¼ cup corn starch	3 egg yolks	1 tablespoon vanilla
	2 cups milk	¾ cup sugar	1 teaspoon Crisco

Melt chocolate in double boiler. Blend sugar, salt and corn starch. Add milk. Cook until thick, stirring constantly. Add beaten egg yolks, melted chocolate and Crisco. Continue cooking a minute or two. Pour into the baked shell, cover with meringue made by beating the 3 egg whites until stiff and dry, and add 6 tablespoons granulated sugar. Return to slow oven, 300 degrees F. for 15 minutes or until brown. Serve when thoroughly cold. Makes one medium sized pie.

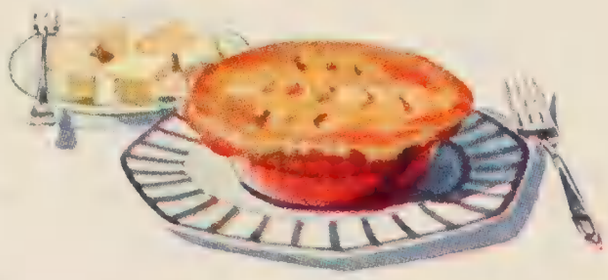
Rhubarb Pie*

4 cups rhubarb, cut fine	1 cup sugar
	3 tablespoons flour
	½ teaspoon salt

Wash, peel and cut the rhubarb. Mix together the sugar, flour and salt and then mix with the rhubarb. Bake between two crusts in a hot oven, 450 degrees F. until it starts to brown; then reduce heat to moderate, 350 degrees F. and finish cooking (about half an hour). Makes one medium sized pie.

Crisco is the ideal shortening for pie crust. It makes a tender, flaky crust which is light and dainty, not greasy. A little cinnamon—or nutmeg if you prefer it—gives pleasant flavor to rhubarb.

Butterscotch Tartlets*



Use Crisco in making the pastry for these tarts and the tender, flaky crust, blended with the delicious filling and fluffy meringue will fairly melt in your mouth.

Take bits of dough about the size of an egg. Roll; cover the bottom of inverted muffin pans which have been greased with Crisco. Prick well with a fork to prevent bubbles. Bake in a hot oven, 450 degrees F. about 15 minutes. When baked, slip shells off, turn pan over and put in a muffin tin. Fill with the following Butterscotch filling.

1 cup brown sugar	2 egg yolks	1 cup milk	1 teaspoon vanilla
3 tablespoons flour	1 teaspoon Crisco	3 tablespoons water	¼ teaspoon salt

Mix sugar, salt and flour. Add water. Cool until thick, stirring constantly. Just before removing from stove, stir in beaten egg. Add Crisco and vanilla. Cool slightly and fill the tart shells. Cover with a meringue made by beating 2 egg whites stiff and dry; add 2 tablespoons granulated sugar; cover tarts, return to slow oven 300 degrees F. for 15 minutes or until brown. This amount will fill 12 tarts.

Deep Dish Apple Pie*

(a pie without an undercrust)

Serve in dishes they are baked in. Or when they are baked, turn them upside down on plates, cover with sweetened whipped cream, sprinkled with chopped nuts and call them Apple Crow's Nest.

Prepare 3 cups of sliced apples, then mix in 1 cup of sugar, ½ teaspoon cinnamon. Divide into 4 or 5 individual baking dishes. Add ⅛ teaspoon salt to each. Dot with bits of Crisco. Cover with the pastry, making slits in the center for steam to escape. Bake in hot oven, 450 degrees F. until pastry starts to brown. Then reduce heat to moderate, 350 degrees F. until apples are done. (About one-half hour.)

pies every time to escape. Lay over the pie, with the fold in the center, turn back to cover it, press edges together with thumb and finger, trim, then press together again.

To keep the juice in

Take a strip of plain cloth about 3 inches wide, wet it in cold water and put around the edge of the plate, letting one half lie on top of the edge of the pie crust and the other half just under the pie plate. Have the strip long enough so that the ends will lap over each other two or three inches. For very juicy fillings, make a little funnel of paper or take pieces of macaroni and stick into 2 or 3 of the slits you have made. The juices will bubble up into these and return to the pie as it cools.

When pie is partly cool remove cloth and funnels.

When juices run out they will burn on the bottom of the oven, causing a smudge which is likely to add a smoky taste to the pie and leaving the oven hard to clean.

To make a nice brown

Wet the top crust with milk; or for a rich brown glaze brush over with a slightly beaten egg white or an egg yolk mixed with 1 teaspoon of water. Start baking in a very hot oven, 450°, until the pie begins to brown. Then reduce the heat to moderate, 350°.

If the pie should be browned before the filling is soft enough, take out the macaroni and cover with another pie plate until the filling is baked.

A special Crisco help

Every pie I make in this way is perfect when I use Crisco. And for several years I have used nothing else. You can mix a large quantity of Crisco, salt and flour and keep it in the ice box. Simply add the water whenever you want a pie. You can do this with Crisco as it keeps a long time without becoming rancid. This mixture will, of course, be thoroughly chilled and this chilling helps to make a flaky pie crust which will still be tender and light.

Lots of other good things

I make all my cakes with Crisco because it is easier. Crisco doesn't have to be kept on ice, so it is always ready for instant use. It makes perfect cakes and so much more economical. When I grease my pans with Crisco my loaves and layers come out whole, which makes them as good to look at as they are delicious to eat. I use it for all my frying because I can fry without smoke, either in the frying pan or the deep kettle. I use both and I never had such beautiful looking food as comes out of my Crisco kettle. It is never greasy, because Crisco does not soak into the food. It simply cooks it. I use Crisco for every purpose which requires shortening and find it always the same, giving uniform results.

W. S. C.

Custard Pie*

Crisco pastry will not soak the custard if you follow the directions below.

Line a Criscoed pie plate with pastry, building up the edges to make it deep enough. Scallop the edges by pressing the edge between the thumb and finger of the left hand with the first finger of the right hand. To prevent the custard soaking into the pastry, brush with melted Crisco and dust with flour. Prepare the custard as follows: Beat three eggs until light; add ¾ cup granulated sugar; ½ teaspoon salt; ½ teaspoon ground nutmeg. Beat together thoroughly and add one pint of milk. Pour into shell. Bake in hot oven 450 degrees F. for 10 minutes until the custard begins to brown on the top, then reduce the heat to moderate, 325 degrees F. until the custard is set, about 30 minutes.

Apple Dumplings*

A well seasoned apple baked in Crisco pastry is a delicious, digestible dessert; crisp, tender and flaky.

Roll pastry, cut in 4-inch squares. Moisten the edges with cold water. In the center of each square set a small apple which has been peeled and cored and the hole filled with sugar and cinnamon. Bring the corners of the paste together over the top of the apple. Press closely together; prick with a fork; bake in a hot oven 450 degrees F., until it starts to brown. Then reduce heat to moderate, 350 degrees F., and bake until the apple is soft, about 30 minutes. Serve with hard or hot sauce.

Individual Chicken Pie*

An attractive way to serve Chicken Pie. The standard Crisco pastry recipe makes a crust which is just right.

Stew until tender a large fat fowl. Cool and remove meat from the bones. Thicken the gravy with flour. Fill small earthen baking dishes half full of chicken meat. Add a few slices of boiled carrot and two or three boiled button onions. Pour over enough gravy to almost cover the chicken. Roll pie crust, spread over top of each dish, letting it come just over the edge. Make a slit in the center to allow steam to escape. Bake in hot oven, 450 degrees F. until done, about 20 minutes. One large fowl will make six pies.

*ALL MEASUREMENTS LEVEL

Use the proportions of flour and Crisco and follow the method given on the opposite page for making the pastry for all these pies.

RAISIN COOKERY LESSONS BY FAMOUS COOKS

Three unusual cakes from simple recipes

By Caroline B. King

NUMBER FIVE  OF THE SERIES

CAROLINE B. KING, nutrition specialist and dietitian. Woman's Editor of THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN; writer, lecturer, home economics teacher. Author: "Caroline King's Cook Book" and "Caroline King's Cake Book"

Most persons, I believe, when they think of a cake containing raisins, picture at once, one of those great plummy black loaves that are so very good and so popular at Christmas time. And because these cakes are so closely associated with snow and cold weather, the many other delicious and tempting raisin cakes, appropriate for all the year round serving, are often overlooked.

In my experiments in cake making, I have found that the addition of raisins to many of my formulas not only adds largely to the nutritive qualities of the finished cakes, but that they are wonderfully enhanced as to their palatability and attractiveness as well.

Raisins add interest and fuel value also to many of my fillings and icings, and often the combination of one of these delectable accessories with the simplest of cakes produces a very attractive finished product.

A cup of raisins added to the plain little Everyday cake that I can recommend because it is so easily put together and so very satisfactory in every way, increases its food value by 352 calories. I add raisins to a favorite gingerbread, bake the batter in layer cake pans, put the finished cakes together with a delicious raisin filling, and the result, I think you will agree, is a most unusual and delicate cake.

But the best of the raisin cakes, to my way of thinking, and one which should prove very popular with the housewife, for it will keep a long time, is the Golden Fruit Cake which in my own household has long since taken the place of the richer and less digestible fruit cake as it is generally known. Golden Fruit Cake is very delicate and dainty as to texture and flavor.

But it is also a substantial cake, a desirable one at any season of the year and for serving upon any occasion. —Caroline B. King

There IS a difference in raisins

There is a difference in flavor, sweetness, size, color and cleanliness. To make certain of the finest results, be sure that the raisins you use are Sun-Maids.

For Sun-Maids are made from the tenderest and sweetest grapes, grown where they reach perfection—in the beautiful San Joaquin and Sacramento Valleys of California.

They come to you in sanitary packages,—raisins large, plump, juicy, with an inimitable delicacy of flavor. Thoroughly cleaned and sterilized, they do not require washing before use.

You can use these perfect raisins freely, for they are inexpensive now—cheaper than they have been in years. Buy a package of Sun-Maid Raisins today and try them in the simple and interesting cake recipes which Mrs. Caroline B. King has given you on this page.

Golden Fruit Cake

¾ cupful butter
1 cupful sugar
4 eggs
2 cupfuls flour
1 teaspoonful lemon extract
1 teaspoonful vanilla extract
1 cupful Sun-Maid Seedless Raisins
½ cupful blanched almonds
¼ cupful shredded citron
1 tablespoonful orange juice
1 tablespoonful lemon juice

Chop the raisins and dredge them with a tablespoonful of the flour; shred the almonds and citron and marinate the latter in the orange and lemon juice for an hour. Cream the butter, adding the sugar gradually, also the extracts. Sift the flour and add to the butter and sugar alternately with the well beaten egg yolks. Whip vigorously, then add the raisins, nuts, and citron with the fruit juices. Fold in the stiffly beaten whites of eggs, pour into well buttered paper lined pan and bake in a moderate oven, 300 degrees, about an hour. When cool, ice with boiled or Royal icing as preferred. Garnish with halved raisins and blanched almonds

Boiled Frosting

Boil 2 cups sugar with ½ cup water until the syrup threads when poured from a spoon. Pour over 2 stiffly beaten egg whites and continue beating until the frosting will hold its shape. Spread over sides and top of the cake

Everyday Raisin Loaf Cake

2 tablespoonfuls butter
1 cupful sugar
2 eggs
½ cupful milk
1½ cupfuls flour
1 teaspoonful baking powder
¼ teaspoonful cinnamon
1 cupful chopped Sun-Maid Seeded Raisins

Slightly melt the butter and cream with the sugar, add the eggs beaten together. Sift the flour and baking powder together, and add alternately with the milk. Stir in the floured raisins and the cinnamon and bake in a loaf cake pan in a temperature of 350 degrees. When nearly finished, sprinkle the surface of the cake with granulated sugar and cinnamon, and return to oven to partially glaze

Tutti Frutti Gingerbread

2 cupfuls flour
½ teaspoonful soda
½ teaspoonful ginger
½ teaspoonful cinnamon
½ teaspoonful baking powder
¼ teaspoonful cloves
2 eggs
½ cupful softened shortening
½ cupful sour milk or buttermilk
½ cupful sugar
¾ cupful molasses
1 cupful chopped Sun-Maid Seeded Raisins

Mix and sift all the dry ingredients together, mix the sour milk and molasses, combine the two mixtures, add the eggs without beating them, and stir in the chopped and slightly floured raisins. Finally beat in the partially melted shortening. Beat all well. Bake in two deep layer cake pans. When finished put the layers together and ice the top of the cake with the following:

Tutti Frutti Filling

1½ cupfuls granulated sugar
1 tablespoonful cocoa
1 tablespoonful butter
½ cupful milk
¼ cupful Sun-Maid Seeded Raisins
¼ cupful chopped nut meats
½ teaspoonful vanilla

Mix together all the ingredients but the raisins and nuts and cook rapidly for five minutes, then add the nuts and raisins (chopped fine) and cook to the soft ball stage. Beat until thick enough to spread

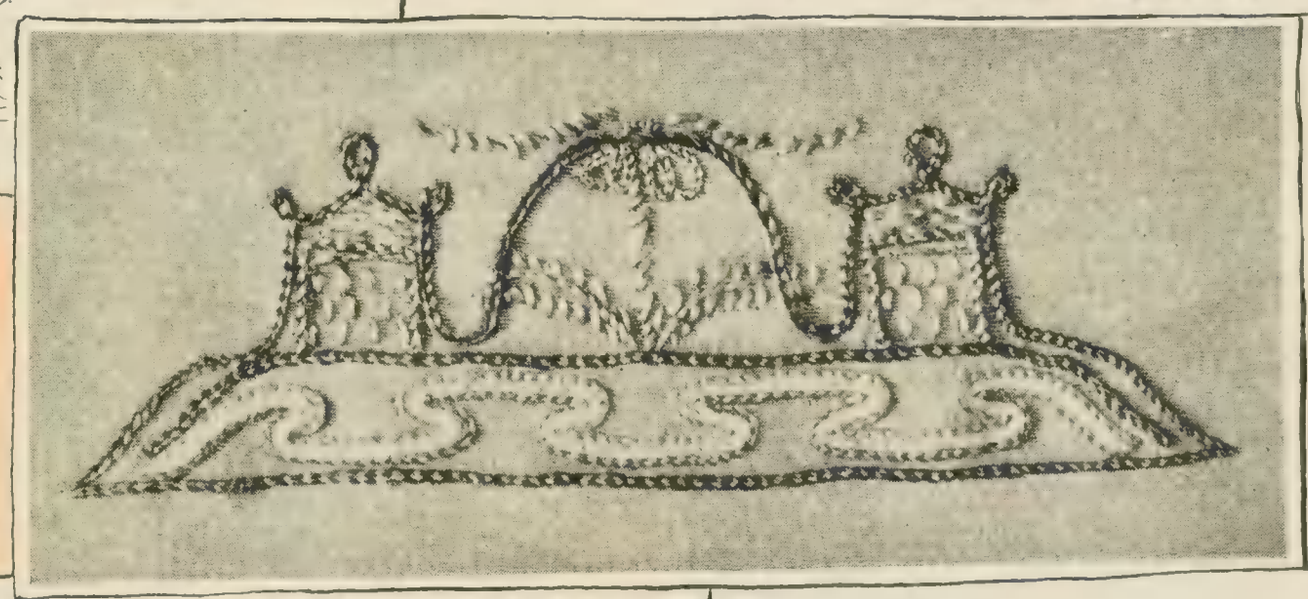
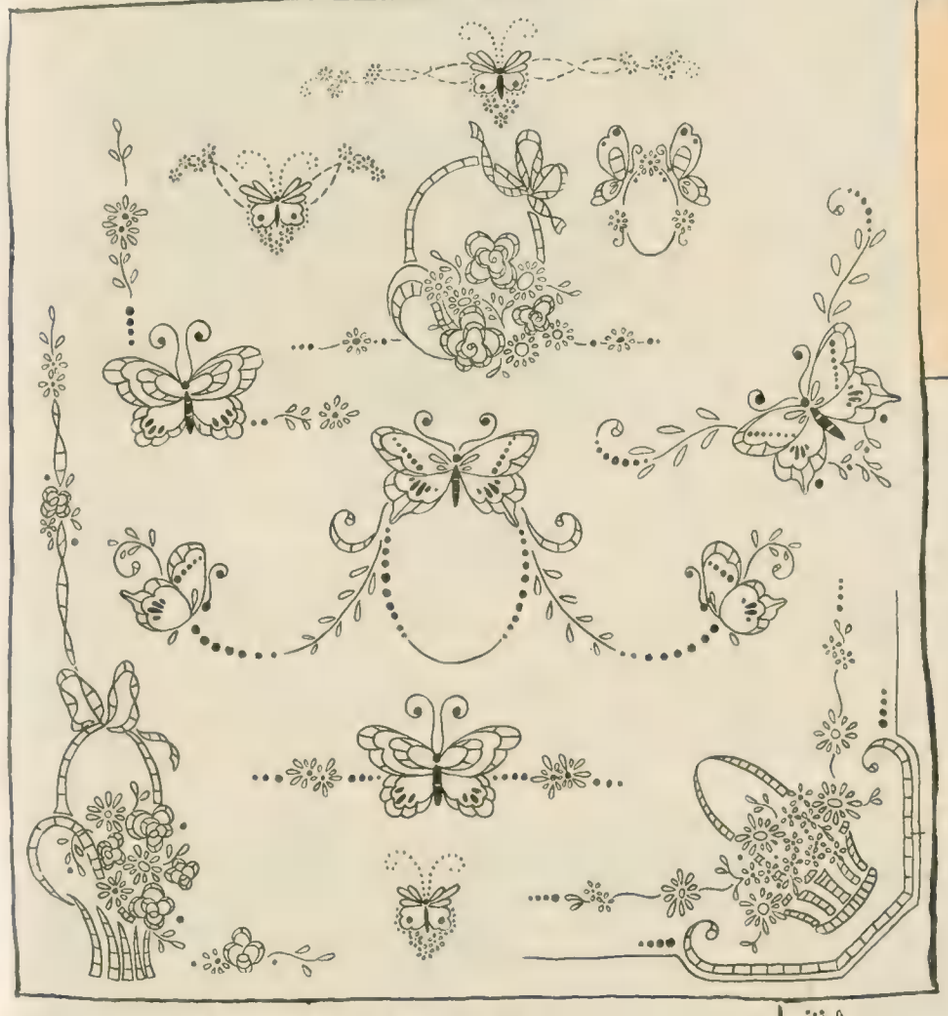
A PEASANT DESIGN, MOTIFS FOR WOOLS, CUT-WORK AND FLOWERS





Embroidery design 10334

Embroidery design 10336

10336—If you want to be consistently smart, put this new peasant embroidery on your cotton voile or crêpe de Chine peasant blouses and frocks. It is also suitable for tunics and puffed sleeves. The edging may be done in single chain-stitch or, as illustrated in the detail at the right, in three chain-stitches combining three colors. The banding and motifs of this embroidery may be worked in a combination of one-stitch and outline, chain-stitch or braiding. The design can be adapted to 5⅛ yards of banding 3 inches wide, 3⅜ yards of edging 1 inch wide and 30 motifs in 4 assorted styles.

Embroidery design 10330

10330—And while we are thinking of brides—give a thought to her linen trousseau. The Spring bride of your acquaintance is doubtless counting on your offering of new linens for her chest. A scarf decorated with a butterfly in cut-work will make an exquisite shower-gift. The motifs and corners of this design are also suitable for tea-cloths and napkins or for household linens. You should use cut-work, eyelet and satin-stitch in working this new embroidery. The design can be adapted to 42 motifs; 4 of each large corner and 6 of each small corner.

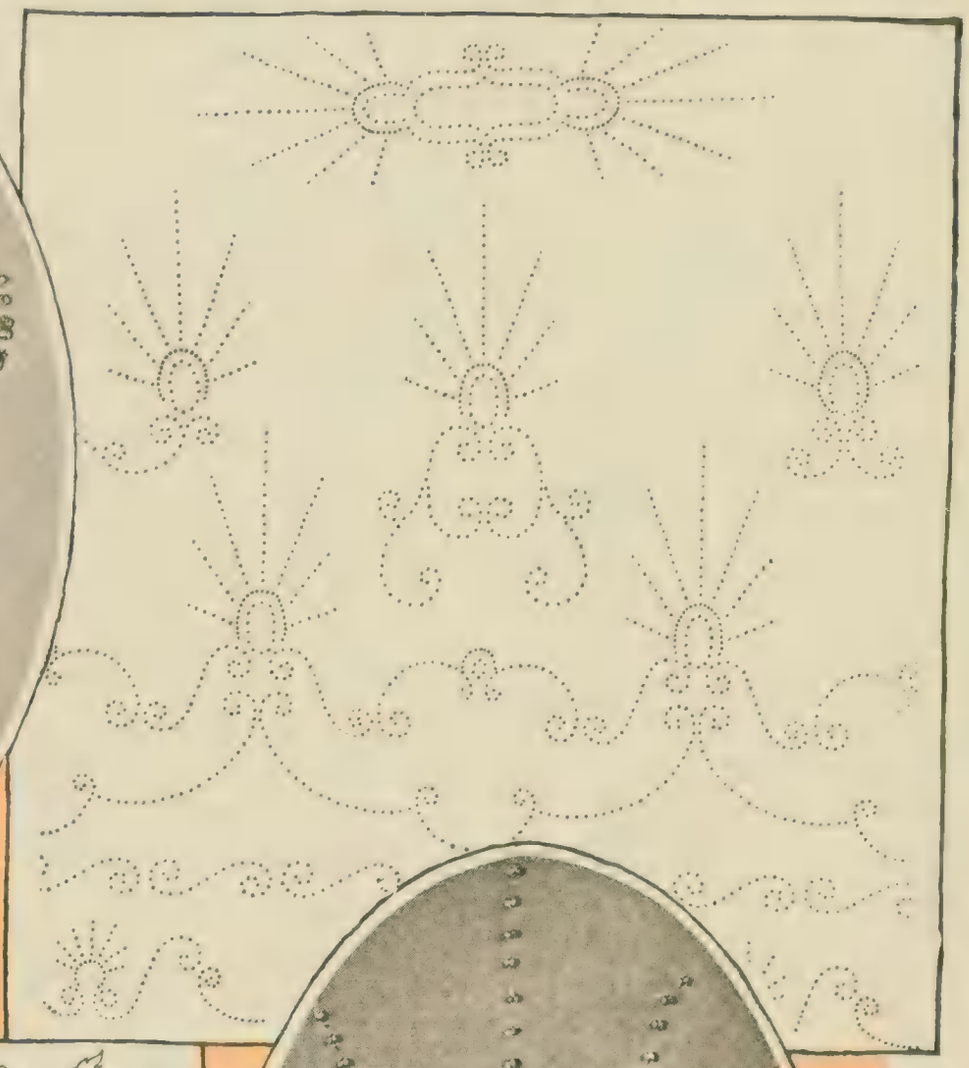
10334—When April showers you may embroider the flowers for your household linen. In this design there is a blossom for every preference, hollyhocks for those who love New England gardens, water-lilies and other flowers. If you like, you may work one of these motifs on a hand-bag. Use outline, satin-stitch, French knots, Kensington stitch and one-stitch in this embroidery. The design can be adapted to two hollyhock motifs 11½ by 10 inches, two water-lily motifs 12½ by 6 inches and 56 motifs in 6 assorted styles.

10335—Any one of these motifs is delightful worked in wools on a wool jersey frock. On the lingerie frocks for Spring use bright-colored cottons in outline, satin-stitch, lazy-daisy stitch and French-knot embroidery. This design is suitable for trimming dresses, blouses, children's clothes, household linen, etc. It can be adapted to 3¼ yards of banding 2¼ inches wide, 3⅜ yards of scalloped banding 1¼ inch wide, 3¼ yards of edging ⅝ of an inch wide, a neck motif and 24 motifs.

BEADING, CROSS-STITCH AND FLOWER TRIMMINGS



Embroidery design 10331

10331—Beading is a fashionable trimming for tunic blouses and dresses. A rather wide banding, an edging not so wide and several sizes of motifs make this a very useful design for trimming one's dresses and blouses. It may be worked either in beading or French-knot embroidery. The design can be adapted to 2⅞ yards of banding 2¾ inches wide, 3½ yards of edging ¾ inch wide, and 24 motifs in 8 assorted styles.

Embroidery design 10332

10332—Nothing is lovelier than satin-stitch embroidery on white linens or lingerie. This design is also delightful worked in lazy-daisy. The motifs are suitable to use as dress trimming. The design can be adapted to 1¾ yard each of bandings 4¼ and 1¾ inches wide, 3½ yards of scallops and 30 assorted motifs.

10329—Peasant blouses, frocks, skirts and hats are the brighter for this cross-stitch embroidery. The design can be adapted to 2⅝ yards each of banding 8 inches wide, for large crosses, and 2½ inches wide for medium-size crosses, 5¼ yards of medium-size crosses ¾ of an inch wide and 22 motifs in assorted styles to match the large cross banding.

"My real trouble was chronic constipation, which had caused pimples, acne and frequent headaches . . . Skeptical, I began to eat Fleischmann's Yeast. Then—after a little over a month—the miracle became an established fact: pimples gone, headaches gone, acne fast going, and no more constipation."
E. H. Howard, Santa Fe, N. M.

The PRICE of HEALTH

For a few cents a day thousands have found again the freshness, the vigor of youth

NOT a "cure-all," not a medicine in any sense—Fleischmann's Yeast is simply a remarkable fresh food.

The millions of tiny active yeast plants in every cake invigorate the whole system. They aid digestion—clear the skin—banish the poisons of constipation. Where cathartics give only temporary relief, yeast strengthens the intestinal muscles and makes them healthy and active. And day by day it releases new stores of energy . . . All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Start eating it today! Eat two or three cakes a day on crackers—in fruit juices or milk—or just plain. For constipation especially, dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) night and morning. Buy several cakes at a time—they will keep fresh in a cool dry place for two or three days.

And let us send you a free copy of our latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. D-15, The Fleischmann Co., 701 Washington Street, New York.

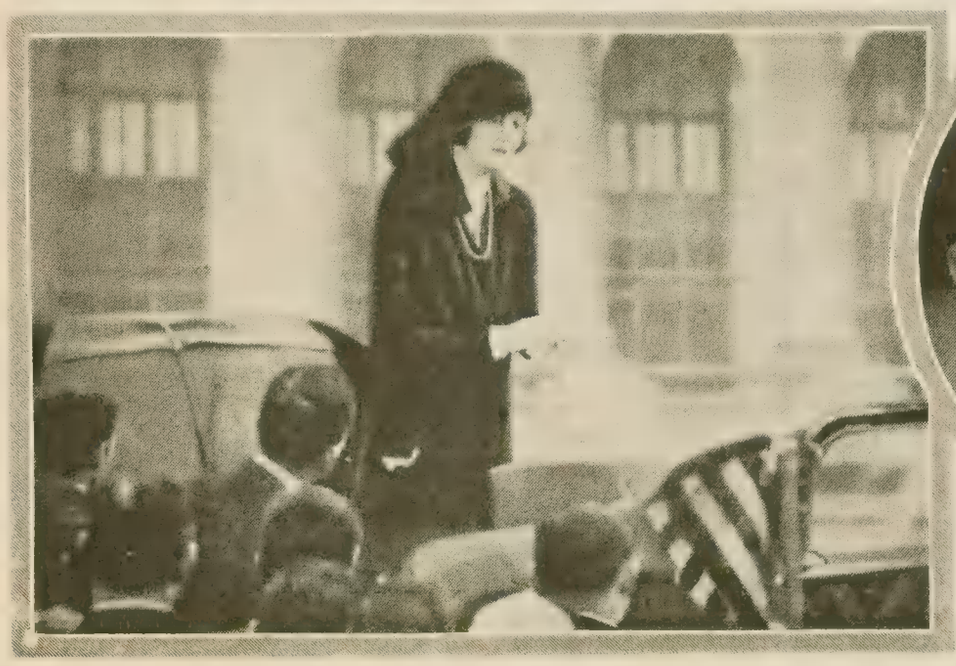
"As a speaker for my party in 1920, I rushed heedlessly from state to state until an outraged nature exacted retribution . . . I sought out a famous specialist for some magic. Here it was! 'Fleischmann's Yeast; three cakes a day.' In two weeks my appetite had returned; in six, I dared to face my mirror again with clear eyes. I no longer know what anemia and skin troubles mean. My daily cake of yeast has become a rite and a symbol of a more vital existence."
Miss Alma B. Sasse, Brunswick, Mo.

(LEFT)



"After years of suffering from a disfigured face, due to chronic acne, and after prolonged treatment, I was persuaded to use Fleischmann's Yeast. I started with two cakes every day. To my great joy there was an immediate improvement. Continued daily use of yeast overcame the unsightly condition of my face and it is now clear of blemishes."
Miss Helen W. Young,
Philadelphia, Pa.

(RIGHT)

"I am a professional man, and suffered many years from indigestion. I could eat only certain foods and had constant pain in my stomach. Three cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast a day for three weeks, brought such incredible improvement that I persisted in the practice. At the present time my digestion is perfect and I am in as perfect health as any man of my age in New Haven."
Irving J. Keyes,
New Haven, Conn

(BELOW)

"For years I fought a chronic constipation. I began eating Yeast merely to satisfy a friend. At the end of two weeks, my chronic constipation and dull headaches had begun to disappear. In one month I was feeling better than I had for ten years. Now I am absolutely normal. As supervising nurse in the health department of a large utility company I find constipation one of the most common ailments. I consider yeast the best remedy I can advise for it."
Miss Gayle Pond, R N., Chicago, Ill.

This famous food tones up the entire system—banishes constipation, skin troubles, stomach disorders.

Keep your teeth shining and safe—with Pebeco

WHEN your Mouth Glands dry up teeth inevitably decay

The only way to protect the teeth successfully is to keep the mouth glands flowing normally

DENTISTS say that practically no mouth today is normally moist and safe for teeth.

Modern cooked foods, too soft, too quickly swallowed, do not require enough chewing. From sheer lack of exercise your mouth glands dry up. Instead of protecting your teeth with their alkaline fluids as nature intended, these glands leave your whole mouth dry—your teeth defenseless against the acids that cause decay.

By harsh scouring thousands of men and women today succeed in keeping their teeth white. But never safe from decay. Five minutes after ordinary brushing the acids form again.

Dentists now recognize that there is only one way to keep teeth both white and safe. Today you can successfully counteract the acids of decay with a tooth-paste that restores the normal flow of the mouth glands.

Pebeco is the simple natural way to prevent tooth decay. It acts directly on the salivary glands. As soon as it enters your mouth it starts a full, normal flow of alkaline saliva.

With constant daily use Pebeco completely restores the natural, protective action of your glands. Their alkaline fluids again bathe your teeth day and night. The acids of decay are neutralized as fast as they form.

Pebeco leaves your gums clean and soothed—your whole mouth normal and healthy. And in this healthy mouth your teeth are kept not only white and shining, but safe.

YOUR POTS AND PANS

A lesson in kitchen equipment

By Ruth M. Kellogg

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the School of Home Economics, Cornell University

Kitchen necessities—how many and what kind—that's a problem! If you are replenishing your equipment, buying a complete new set, or giving a shower to some happy housewife-to-be, THE DELINEATOR'S complete list of what to have in the kitchen may save you time, trouble and expense. This list was prepared by the equipment experts at Cornell University, and a copy of it is yours for the asking. Just send a stamped, self-addressed envelope to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

All new cast-iron ware should be well rubbed with unsalted fat and this burned off in the oven before the utensil is used

HAVE you an intimate acquaintance with your pots and pans? Do you know what they are actually made of and how they should be cared for to give you the best service? There is a reason for using iron for Scotch kettles, aluminum for saucepans, enamel over steel for certain purposes, and glass and earthenware for still others.

Have you ever been disappointed with a new iron skillet which turned your food dark and gave it an unpleasant taste, although the one that you had used for years always behaved quite properly? The reason for this is that all new cast-iron utensils—griddles, waffle-irons, Dutch ovens and skillets—are not immediately ready for use. They must be well oiled before being used for cooking purposes. This should always be done with unsalted fat, as salt tends to encourage rust on iron. Go over the entire inside of the utensil with the fat or oil, rubbing it in well, then either let the article stand aside for several days or put it in an oven at a low temperature (300 degrees Fahrenheit) and bake it for an hour or so. Then wash the utensil, rubbing it briskly, in hot, soapy water in which some washing-soda or other alkaline washing-powder has been dissolved. Rinse it in clear, hot water and rub it dry.

Cast iron is so hard that you do not need to be afraid of scratching it when you clean it, and consequently you may scour it with harsh abrasives or coarse steel wool as well as with milder cleansers. But remember to dry it thoroughly each time before it is put away. If it is a utensil that will not be used for some time, it is wise to rub it over with unsalted oil or fat and put it away in this condition. The oil prevents the air from coming into direct contact with the iron and prevents rust. The article must then be thoroughly washed before being used again, as the fat may become rancid. All cast-iron ware improves with age if well cared for and grows smoother with use.

Cast iron is very durable and, because of the thickness of the material, an even heat is obtained when it is used. Also it is inexpensive. Against these advantages one must balance the ease with which it rusts, its heavy weight and the fact that it is not adapted to cooking acid foods.

For cutlery it pays to buy only good steel. Do not look for so-called bargains in such things as steel knives. The best "buy" is high-grade tempered steel, as it will hold an edge as poor steel never will. Stainless steel in knives of reliable brands is proving a great boon to the housekeeper. To have knives untarnished so that no scouring is necessary and to be able to pare acid fruits without getting your hands discolored is indeed a great convenience.

The coated forms of steel—enameled, tinned, japanned and galvanized ware—are rust proof as long as the coating remains intact and the steel background is not exposed. Enamel ware is adapted to the cooking of all kinds of foods. The term granite is often applied to the gray mottled enameled ware, agate to the kind that has big splotches of color, and enameled to the plain colored or white ware. All are enameled utensils. Enamel ware is really a form of glass. Naturally it chips and reacts unfavorably when dropped or banged. If your utensil is very cold, do not suddenly put it over an intense heat, nor if it is very hot place it on something very cold, such as ice or snow. After the enamel has once been chipped the steel foundation becomes exposed and is subject to rust and wear.

It is better to use only mild abrasives in cleaning articles of this material when something more vigorous than soap and hot water is necessary. Harsh abrasives may scratch the fine glaze.

TINNED ware is, as the same indicates, steel coated with tin. Cheap tinware is stamped from sheets of steel coated with tin. The more expensive redipped or twice-dipped variety has several advantages over it. It has greater weight and durability than the cheap ware, it is smoother and has fewer crevices in which dirt may lodge. Avoid vigorous scraping of tin with sharp knives or the use of harsh abrasives in cleaning it. Ordinary tinware is not well adapted to the cooking of acid foods, but it may give good service in cooking bread, pies, cakes and muffins or in serving as a dish-pan. A good weight retinned dish-pan is very durable. It is well to let baking-tins become darkened, as they are more satisfactory in this condition and take up the heat more readily than when bright and shiny.

Aluminum is a metal possessed of many advantages for the cooking of any or all food products. It has lightness of weight, strength, durability, and does not rust. Aluminum utensils have the further advantage of being seamless.

Many housewives have hesitated to cook acid foods in aluminum because of an unfortunate rumor that the acid dissolved the metal and brought about results harmful to

What the most beautiful Queen in Europe says about the care of the skin

"NO woman is so highly placed that she can afford to neglect her beauty. Personal appearance is vital to her success—she cannot allow the usual marks of fatigue or exposure to show in her face. I believe that her beauty can be thoroughly guarded by a daily use of Pond's Two Creams."

Marie
Queen of Roumania

POINT to another woman in the world today whose beauty, power and vibrant personality are equal to those of Marie, Queen of Roumania!

"A tall, majestic figure, hair of red-gold, a round white throat, flashing violet eyes and long lashes sweeping demurely the rose-leaf of her lovely cheeks." One who knows her well describes her thus.

Granddaughter of Queen Victoria, cousin to the King of England, to the Queen of Spain and to the late Czar Nicholas of Russia, she has lived from birth in the midst of the great affairs of Europe.

At sixteen she became the bride of the fortunate heir to the Roumanian throne and entered upon the vivid, flashing life of the Balkans.

Today no queen in Europe has such influence in state and international affairs. Queen Marie matches her skill in state-craft and the prestige of her position with the magnetism of her personality to achieve victories for Roumania that astonish nations many times its size.

Even after her crowded years in Roumania, Queen Marie is still extraordinarily beautiful, beloved of her people and human to the core. When she wears the national dress and mingles with the simple peasant folk she is just as lovely as when she wears her gorgeous robes of state and her magnificent crown jewels. She is known as the queenliest queen in Europe just as her daughters were called the prettiest princesses—before they married kings.

A womanly woman as well as a queen—and one to whom many things have come because of her own beauty—Queen Marie feels that "No woman is so highly placed that she can afford to neglect her beauty. Personal appearance is vital to her success—she cannot allow the usual marks of fatigue or exposure to show in her face."

More and more, women are realizing this. They have found that the woman who is careless of her personal appearance is practically never the woman who is a success. Yet it is so easy to look one's best! A few thoughtfully chosen toilet preparations and a little regular care every day—this is all one needs to keep the skin fresh, clear and youthful.

YEARS ago one manufacturer devoted his laboratories to perfecting the two creams that would answer the vital needs of the skin. Today the famous Pond's method of cleansing and protecting the skin is used everywhere by women who, because of their high position or their social prominence, tax their skins the most and yet must keep them loveliest.

Every day, and especially after any exposure, the thorough cleansing that keeps the skin clear and fresh. For this use Pond's Cold Cream. With the tips of your fingers or a piece of moistened cotton, smooth a generous quantity on your face and neck. The pure cream works deeply into the pores, cleansing them of all impurities. Wipe the cream off with a soft cloth. It will bring with it the excess oil, the powder, the dust, and dirt your skin has been collecting all day. Repeat the process. Now notice how fresh and clear your skin feels—and looks—how smooth and relaxed. And, above all, how youthful. Finish by dashing your face with cold water or rubbing it with a piece of ice.

If your skin is very dry, use Pond's Cold Cream at night, too, patting it in around the corners of your eyes and mouth, where—unless you are wary—wrinkles will begin to form. Let it stay on until morning—you will find the little lines all smoothed away.

And then, to protect your skin and as a foundation for powder, use Pond's Vanishing Cream, light, greaseless, and deliciously refreshing. Smooth in just a light film, enough for your skin to absorb. Now notice the limpid freshness of your skin; how soft and smooth it is to the touch, how captivatingly lovely to the eye. The delicate Vanishing Cream protects your skin, keeping it fresh and untired. No amount of wind or sun will roughen it now. After you have smoothed in the Vanishing Cream, you are ready to rouge and powder. And you will be delighted with the smoothness with which they go on and blend—and stay—for hours! No more horrid nose-shine to worry you now.

MOST skins need a Pond's cleansing only once a day, but after exposure of any kind, such as a dusty train trip or a long motor ride, you will find there is nothing more refreshing or relaxing to your skin than a thorough cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream. Finish up, as always, with Pond's Vanishing Cream. It gives you just that last touch of brilliancy and smoothness that—to be absolutely perfect—your complexion requires before you powder!

Take care of your lovely skin. Begin today, to follow the method the beautiful Queen of Roumania so heartily commends. Your beauty like hers, can be, as she says, "thoroughly guarded by a daily use of Pond's Two Creams." Buy your own Pond's Creams in jars or tubes and use them faithfully every day. You will be enchanted to see how quickly your skin looks fresher, more youthful—with a freshness and youthfulness you can keep. The Pond's Extract Company.

HER MAJESTY, MARIE, QUEEN OF ROUMANIA

A recent portrait by Philip A. de Laszlo, eminent European artist. Queen Marie, a writer of distinction, has done much to foster the Roumanian national arts. She is called "the mother-in-law of the Balkans," having married her two eldest daughters to the Kings of Greece and Jugoslavia.

Below, a pair of silver boxes from Tiffany and Company, bearing the Queen's crest and filled with Pond's Cold and Vanishing Creams, sent by the Pond's Extract Company as a gift to Her Majesty. Physical vigor and mental driving power—in adults and children alike —are built day by day with the food they eat. And this power rests largely in the hands of the woman who plans the meals.

Food can tire him out—or keep him fresh and vigorous

Why this delicious food makes such a difference in the way you feel

WE are beginning to realize that our choice of food on any one day determines more or less the way we feel on that particular day.

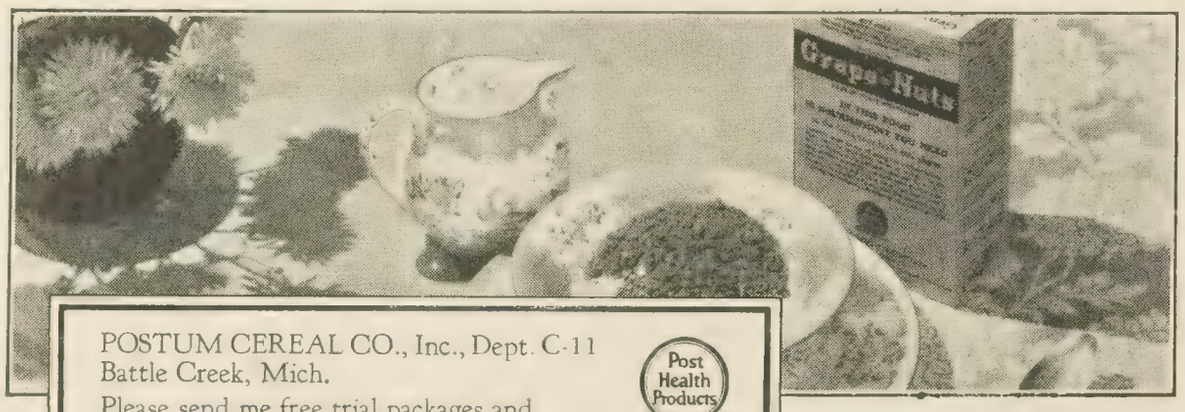
But what we do not realize is that our choice of food day in and day out makes a profound and lasting difference to our health.

Authorities now agree that the lack of vigor that leads gradually to failure, ill-health, actual disease—is due largely to:

Foods that place too great a burden on our digestive system and fail to supply our bodies with the nourishment they need.

In Grape-Nuts you get the rich nourishment of whole wheat and barley in its most digestible form.

Baked 22 hours Grape-Nuts is ready for the body to use almost immediately. What is more, it actually hastens the digestion of various other foods.



Women who plan the family meals for health and efficiency find Grape-Nuts an ideal food. It supplies perfectly the needs of grown-ups, and of children who use up so much vitality in the strenuous business of growing.

For children especially—who always will bolt soft foods—Grape-Nuts fills a real need. It teaches them to chew their food properly, helps to develop healthy teeth and gums, and aids digestion.

Grape-Nuts is deliciously different. Its crisp, crunchy kernels—its rich, full flavor—stimulate your appetite and add a zest to the whole meal.

health. Careful tests made by chemists, government experts and food authorities have proved that any kind of food may be cooked in aluminum vessels with perfect safety. Acids have little, if any, effect on this metal.

When heat is applied to any part of aluminum ware, it quickly spreads or is carried to other parts of the utensil. This means an even heat and that foods cook or brown evenly, and is the reason aluminum handles should not be used on aluminum utensils.

TWO kinds of aluminum utensils may be purchased—cast or stamped. The cast variety is thicker, hence heavier, than the stamped. Cast aluminum is made up into such articles as pressure cookers, griddles, skillets, double boilers, Dutch ovens, tea-kettles, tea and coffee pots and some kettles. Aluminum skillets are now obtainable in good weights of stamped as well as of cast aluminum. It pays to buy stamped aluminum of standard weight; the thin, cheap pieces get out of shape quickly and, though they, as well as the heavier pieces, may be pounded back into shape by using a wooden mallet and block, it is a safer investment in general to buy the better quality.

Aluminum may be cleaned with mild or very fine scouring-powders, fine-grade steel wool or copper-wire dish-mops. The one thing to avoid with aluminum is the use of strong alkalies such as washing-soda, as these, if strong enough and if applied often, attack the metal.

The discoloration which appears on aluminum from some waters or from cooking some foods is not at all harmful. The easiest way to remove this is to cook some acid fruit or vegetable in the discolored utensil. This is entirely safe.

Utensils of this material must not be allowed to boil dry, for although aluminum melts at a very high temperature, dry aluminum if left over heat for some time will melt and the article will be ruined.

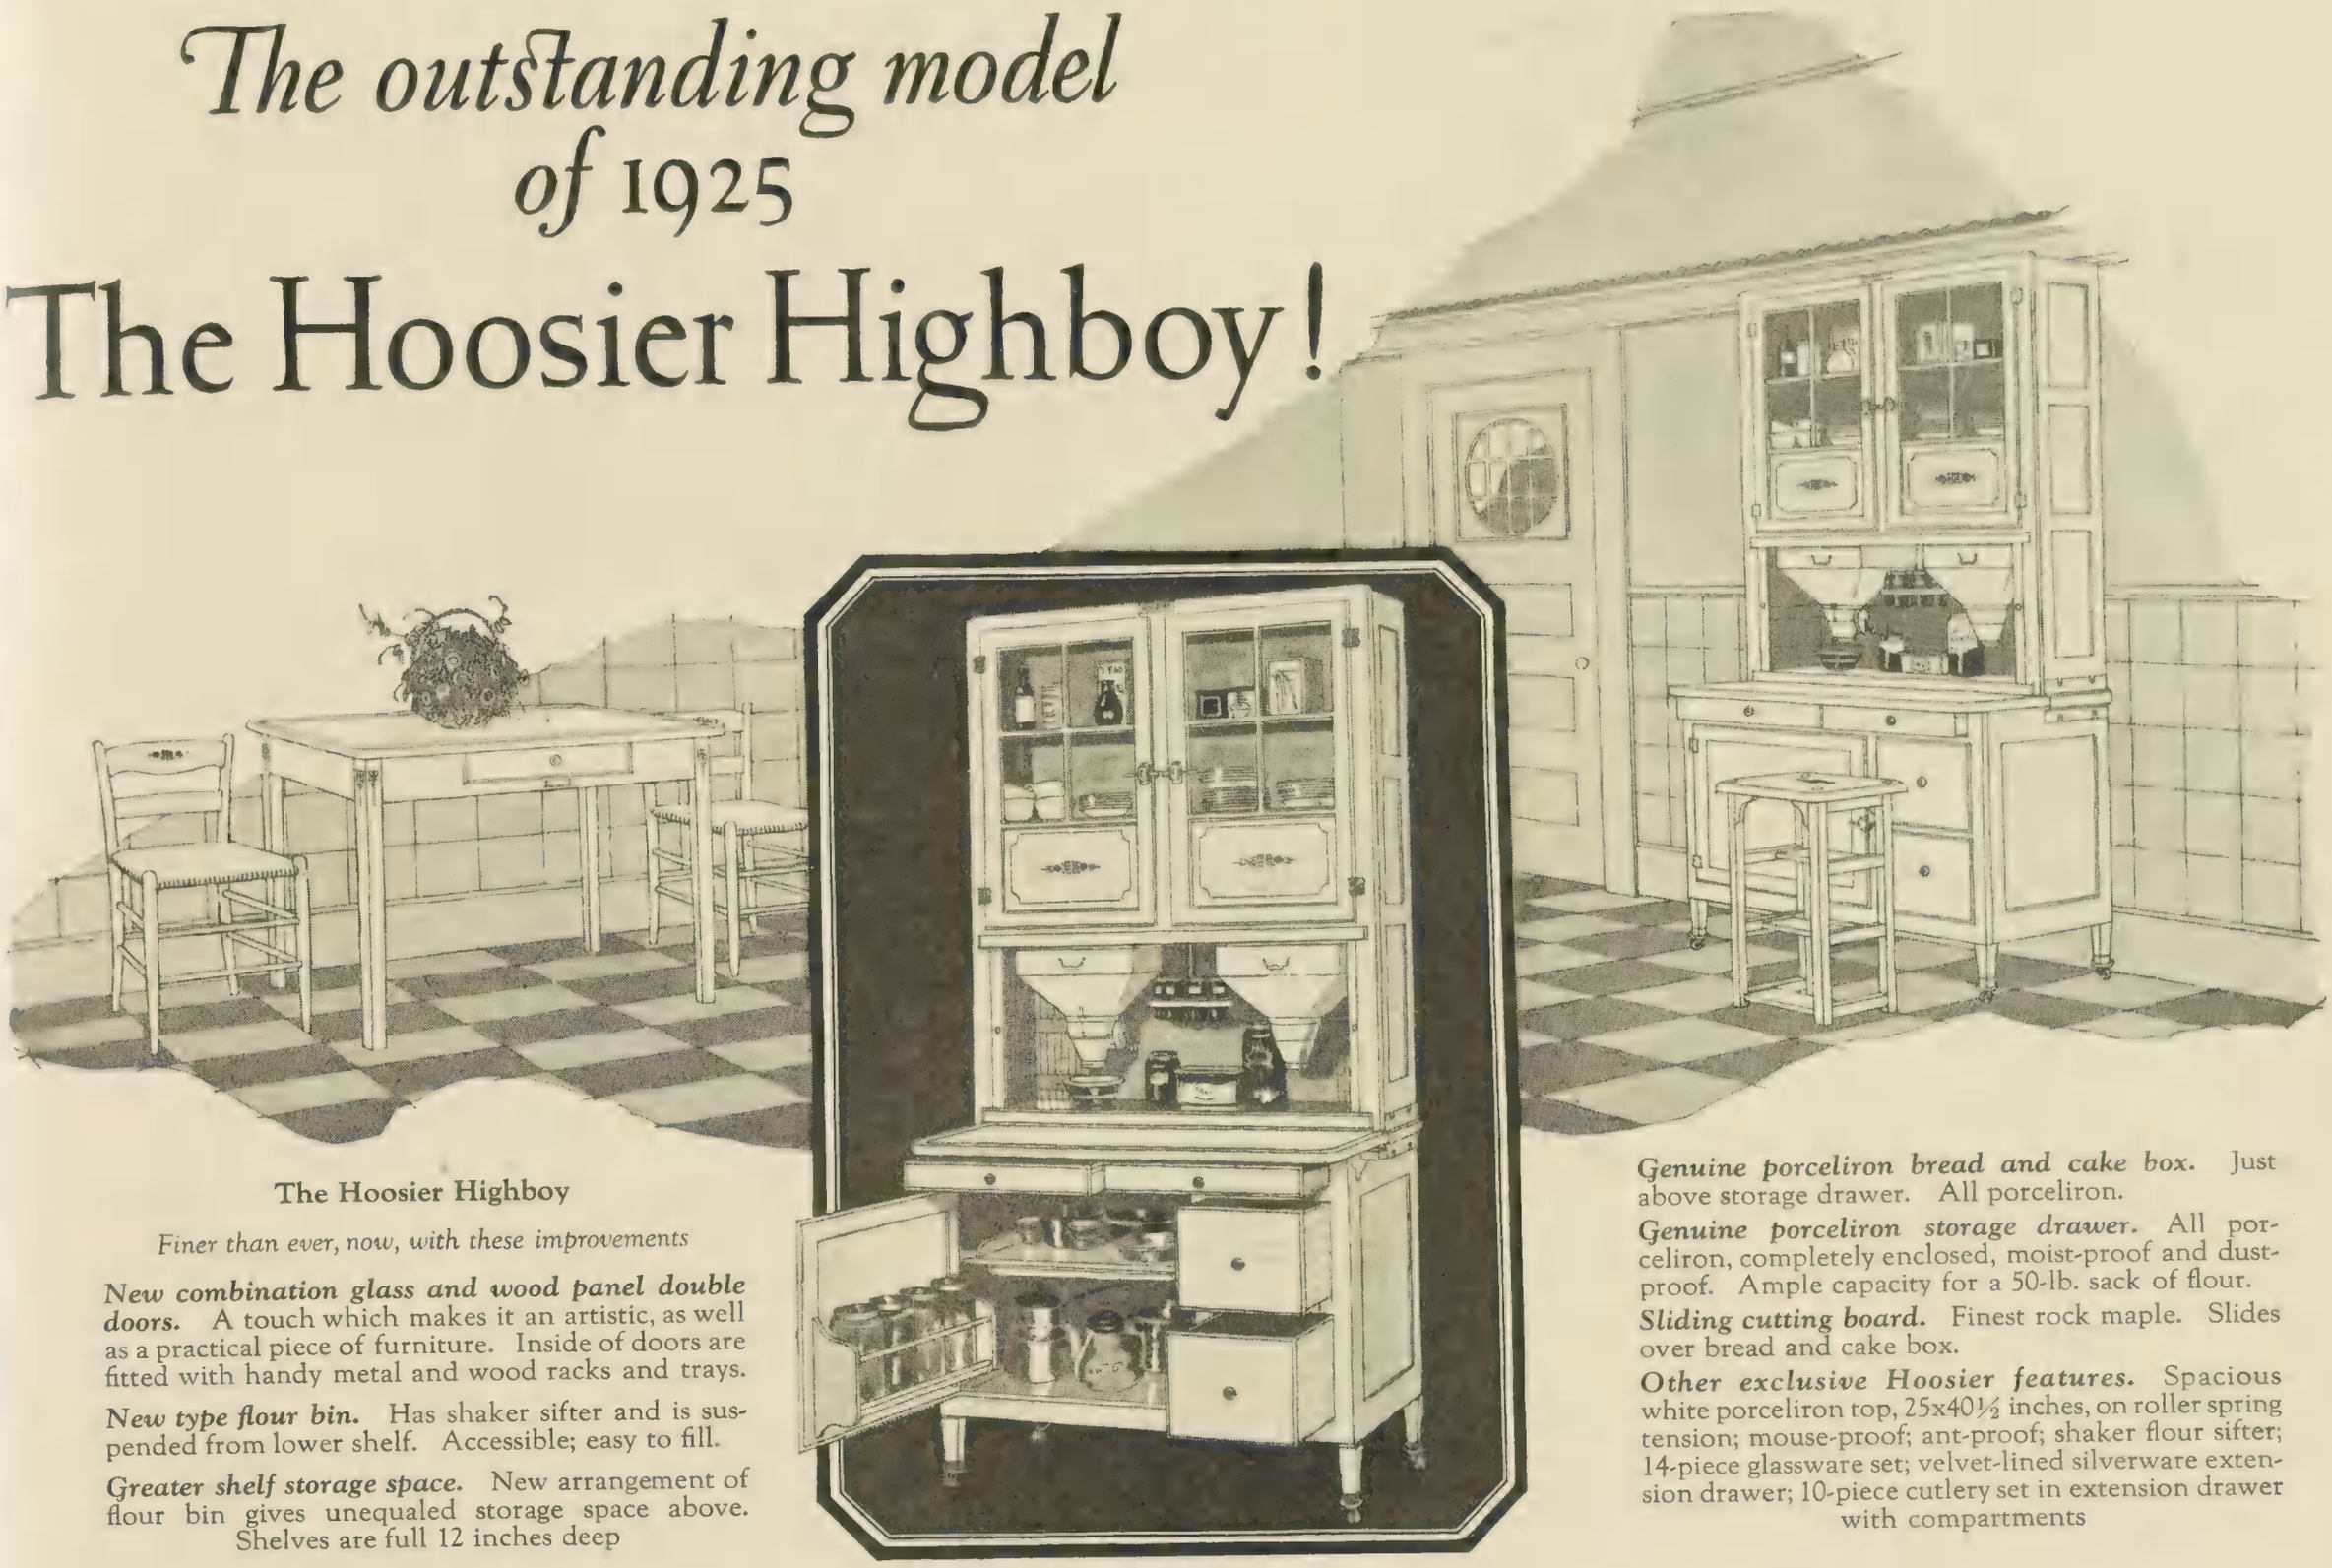
NICKEL-PLATED utensils, such as tea or coffee pots and various electrical devices, may be cleaned by using whiting mixed to a paste with ammonia. Rub this on briskly, then rub it off with a soft, dry cloth.

Utensils of earthenware and glass are not designed for use on top of the stove, but they are splendid for baking, as they give an even heat and retain heat well. Food baked in either of these materials may be served directly from them at the table, so that no extra dishes are involved. Glass has an additional advantage in that you may watch your baking process and see when the food is browned to suit your taste With care, glass or pottery may give service for a long time. Glassware is difficult to handle when it becomes hot in the oven. But wire racks can be bought for any size baking-dish, and the dish may be placed on one of these before it is placed in the oven. This offers you an easy means of handling the hot glass.

Glass or earthen ware may be cleaned with any of the standard abrasives. However, if such dishes are put to soak as soon as the food is removed, they are very easily cleaned. No one questions the safety of cooking any kind of food in these.

Galvanized ware has a steel foundation coated with zinc. Galvanized utensils should never be used for cooking purposes, as harmful products develop when foods are cooked in them. Galvanized ware is extremely satisfactory for garbage pails, ash-cans, water-pails and similar articles, however. As long as the zinc covering remains intact it is rust-proof. Clean galvanized ware with soap and water plus a good brush. Kerosene can also be used.

Japanned steel (papier-maché is also sometimes japanned) is steel coated with a special paint or varnish. It, too, is not suitable for cooking utensils, but it is widely used for such utensils as bread-boxes, canisters and trays. It is very satisfactory for such purposes, is relatively inexpensive and very attractive. Warm water and soap are used in cleaning a japanned finish.



Aside from deciding the kind of material desired for new utensils there are several other points to be considered. Is the handle a convenient one? Is the utensil well balanced, so that it stays in the correct position? Is it the size and shape that can be used for more than one purpose? Is it free from seams and corners that would be difficult to clean? Is it smooth and well built in general? Will it be used often enough to justify its cost and the storage space it requires? If it is a set or a combination device, will you really use the set or will you use only a piece or two? And, if so, would it be cheaper to buy these pieces separately?

Above—Wire lifters or racks for holding glass baking-dishes make this popular oven-ware easier to handle. Below—When you shine up your aluminum, use a fine mineral wool. A diluted household acid used for a laundry bleach will remove the stains

Offering beauty, convenience, value never before combined in one model

Time was, when the kitchen was the "ugly duckling" of the house. That was before women realized how vastly much difference our surroundings make in the way we do our work.

No longer is the kitchen thought of as just a place to work. In its way it should be as cheerful and charming as your living room; completely, efficiently furnished.

One all-inclusive piece of furniture has revolutionized kitchens—the kitchen cabinet! And one splendid model now brings a greater efficiency and new beauty to this room—the Hoosier Highboy!

Planned scientifically in every exclusive detail, the improved 1925 Highboy offers an unequaled storage capacity arranged in convenient drawer and shelf space; a score of helpful devices which could not possibly be assembled separately in such efficient working order.

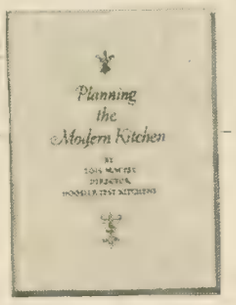
The Hoosier Units for extra storage space

To provide ample cupboard space in addition to what the cabinet affords, Hoosier Domestic Science experts have designed handy cupboard units; one for brooms, mops, etc.; another for pots, pans and supplies. These supplant the old distant butler's pantry, giving storage space right in the kitchen. Like the Hoosier cabinets, they come in white or French grey enamel or golden oak.

Another convenience, both useful and ornamental, is the dainty little Hoosier Breakfast Set of table and chairs. With this, you can have a charming nook in your kitchen and the extra table space is always welcome. The table has a fine white porceliron top; the chairs have cane seats.

Your kitchen may be old but it does not need to be old fashioned. Hoosier equipment will bring it up to date with no fuss or expense of remodeling. For that new kitchen, ask your architect about installing Hoosier furniture. With it you can have greater convenience than with any of your own devising and building.

The Hoosier Easy Purchase Plan!
Small down payment—easy terms



Best of all, Hoosier Kitchen Equipment is not extravagant in cost; it is quite within reach of the most modest purse. The Hoosier Company has an Easy Payment Plan whereby you may select the units you need and enjoy them in your own kitchen at once. Just a small down payment brings them; take your time about paying the balance! The Hoosier store in your town will gladly explain the details and help you select the units you need for your kitchen.

Burns and scalds are the lot of every woman who does housework. But Unguentine puts a quick stop to the pain they cause.

Burns - Accidents - Injuries!

Save hours of needless suffering

Today a remarkable remedy prevents hours of suffering. It is now being used by thousands of hospitals and by physicians everywhere.

No injury is too serious for its healing properties—no wound so slight as not to need its safeguarding from infection.

It has relieved untold pain—saved hundreds of lives.

Keep it in your medicine cabinet!

UNGUENTINE marks the greatest advance in medical science in the treatment of burns and skin injuries.

It is used today in cases where the most intense suffering must be relieved—by hospitals and physicians throughout the country.

No wonder those who have used it for smaller burns and skin injuries at home are astonished at its effectiveness—at the rapidity with which it takes away the pain!

Prevents infection

Unguentine does more than prevent suffering. It prevents infection also. And—though highly antiseptic—it can be applied to an open wound without the slightest irritating effect.

Furthermore, Unguentine keeps the wound free from germ life during the entire healing process. It stimulates the quick healing of the tissues and often prevents the formation of ugly "scar tissue."

There is nothing like Unguentine made today. No medicine cabinet should be without it. 50 cents at your druggist's. Or the coupon below will bring you a trial tube free of all charge.

Iowa doctor reports remarkable case

"I know you will be interested in a case that came under my personal observation.

"On Nov. 20, in response to a call I found this situation: Mrs. F——— had just filled the wash tub with boiling water. Her small child by some means pulled the plug out of the tub, and the scalding water struck the side of his face, ran down his shoulder, arm and hand, then on down to his leg and foot. The face, shoulder, arm and leg were a solid blister.

"The child was suffering terrible agony. I dressed the wound with Unguentine at once, which gave almost immediate relief. I attended this case for 10 days using only Unguentine as a dressing. At this writing, 20 days after the accident, the patient has quite recovered and to my surprise, not a scar."

EAT MORE FISH

By Lucile Brewer

Recipes have been tested and approved by the School of Home Economics, Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

Disconnect the backbone of the fish and lift out the framework

If you're fond of fish, we have something you'll like—and if you aren't, we have something that will convert you. It's a leaflet which tells the best kinds of fish to bake, boil or fry, and just the right sauces and garnishes to serve with them. It will tell you more about fish than you ever knew before. Just send a stamped, self-addressed envelope with your request to our Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

THERE are altogether too many people who don't like fish — or at least who think they don't. A taste for fish should be cultivated, for sea-fish contains iodin, which is essential to human growth and health. Indeed the increased prevalence of goitre in inland places is said to be an indication that people need to eat more iodin foods.

The lack of popularity of fish as an American food is due to one or all of three things. Either good fish is difficult to get, and inferior fish is therefore bought and served, or troublesome bones make the eating of fish unpleasant, or the fish itself lacks savoriness and flavor because it is improperly cooked.

If you want your family to like fish, be sure to select a good quality, whether it be fresh, frozen or salted. Then remove the bones before serving, and use plenty of fat and seasoning in the cooking. If you will also serve a variety of fish in as many different ways as you can devise, you will have the pleasure of watching your family's appetite change.

TO SELECT GOOD FISH

In selecting fish, make sure that it is fresh and of good quality. Here are the points to look for: the eyes should be bright, bulging and clear; the gills should be bright red in color; the flesh firm and elastic; the skin should be bright and shiny; the mouth and gills of the fish should be closed and practically free from slime; and the fish should sink when put in water.

TO BONE FISH

To bone fish, work from the inside. Slip the knife under the rib bones near the head and slit down the entire length of the body cavity. Then cut down to the ridge of the backbone, taking care not to cut through the skin. Treat both sides of the fish in the same manner. Disconnect the backbone at the head and lift the bony framework out of the fish.

The bone is left in the tail to help keep the shape. The head, which may be left on or removed according to preference, aids in keeping the stuffing in the fish.

TO BAKE FISH

Dust the inside of the fish with salt and fill it with the stuffing. Bring the cut edges of the body together, slipping steel skewers through both edges, at intervals of one and one-half inch. Put the center of a long piece of cord around the head, crossing it underneath. Then lace the cord around skewers and fasten it. Place slices of salt pork around the tail and back fins and across the back. Lay the fish in a shallow roasting-pan or on a fish-cloth covered with thin slices of salt pork.

Dust the inside of the fish with salt and fill it with stuffing

Do not add water. Bake forty-five minutes (for a fish weighing three to four pounds) in a hot oven (400 to 450 degrees Fahrenheit).

TO BOIL FISH

Either a steamer, a fish-kettle with a strainer, or a large kettle with a wire frying-basket is needed for boiling a large fish whole. A plate held in a fish-cloth (a piece of coarse muslin or cheese-cloth kept for this purpose) may be used for fish cut into small pieces. Clean the fish, rub a little salt over it, wrap it in a cloth, and place it in the steamer.

The fish must not be put into cold water, as that extracts the flavor; nor into boiling water either, as that breaks the skin. It should be put into hot water, which may

The best spring tonic is—PROPER FOOD

Watch your diet—that's the way to get ahead of lazy spring

Not so many years ago it was the custom to take a tonic in the spring to "thin the blood" and thus combat that "tired feeling."

Now nutrition authorities have discovered that the best spring medicine is a wise diet; that springtime laziness is largely due to overworked digestions.

In the winter your diet naturally includes a high proportion of heavy, heating food. With warm spring days, you do not need so much. In fact it throws an undue burden upon digestion.

You know how slow and sluggish, how unfit for work you feel when you have eaten too much rich food.

The kind of breakfast you need

Take breakfast, for instance. The first meal of the day should set you up with ample energy for a brisk morning's work. And it will, if you eat wisely.

But if you eat a too heavy, hearty breakfast, you will find yourself yawning, half asleep by the middle of the morning.

What you need at the start of the day is simple food, full of energy; food that is easily and quickly digested. You can find no food which will more perfectly fill these needs than good old Cream of Wheat!

Try it for three mornings

As a test, try Cream of Wheat for breakfast for just three mornings, served as suggested here. You will be surprised how fit you feel.

Cream of Wheat, made of the best hard wheat, is exceptionally high in energy value or carbohydrates. But equally as valuable is its easy digestibility.

You get all the rich energy of Cream of Wheat because it is digested so easily and quickly none is wasted in extra work imposed upon the stomach.

It has all the satisfying nourishment you could possibly want yet is simple enough in form for a baby to digest. In this splendid food find energy to meet the languid moods of spring.

Try this—3 mornings for a better day's work

FIRST MORNING

Cream of Wheat

¾ cup CREAM OF WHEAT
½ teaspoon salt 4 cups boiling water

Pour Cream of Wheat slowly into rapidly boiling salted water; stirring constantly. Place over boiling water and continue cooking fifteen minutes or longer if desired. Serve with cream and sugar, or Southern Style with butter and salt

SECOND MORNING

Cream of Wheat with Dates

¾ cup CREAM OF WHEAT
4 cups boiling water ½ teaspoon salt
½ cup dates

Pour Cream of Wheat slowly into rapidly boiling salted water, stirring constantly; add dates and cook fifteen minutes in a double boiler

Also with Figs, Raisins or Prunes

Follow recipe above, using instead of dates ½ cup figs, raisins or prunes cut in small pieces

THIRD MORNING

Cream of Wheat with Poached Egg

¾ cup CREAM OF WHEAT
4 cups boiling water ½ teaspoon salt
Butter, salt and paprika Poached eggs

Cook Cream of Wheat in rapidly boiling salted water fifteen minutes, mix well with butter. Serve 2 heaping tablespoons cooked Cream of Wheat, make a depression in the center with the back of the spoon and place in this a poached egg. Season with butter, salt and paprika

WESSON OIL AND AN EGG
MAKE MAYONNAISE

WESSON OIL and a fresh egg—beaten together and seasoned to taste—make the most delicious mayonnaise you ever put in your mouth.

The quickest results are obtained if the oil and egg are not too cold. The ordinary temperature of your kitchen is just right.

Break the egg in the bowl, add about a tablespoon of Wesson Oil and beat vigorously with an egg beater or a fork —until the oil and egg are thoroughly mixed. How long will that take? Perhaps while you count fifty—not as fast as you can count but as fast as you can beat. Add another tablespoon of oil and beat again—vigorously.

Two tablespoons and beat again.

Two or three more and beat again. Your mayonnaise will begin to thicken a little.

Then add Wesson Oil four or five tablespoons at a time, beating well after each addition —until your mayonnaise is as thick and stiff as you want it. The more oil you beat into it the thicker your mayonnaise will be. About two cupfuls is the usual amount, but never add more than a quarter cupful of oil at one time.

After your mayonnaise is made, season it.

Mix a half teaspoon of salt, a teaspoon each of sugar and mustard, a generous pinch each of paprika and red pepper—add a tablespoon of lemon juice or vinegar and stir until the salt and sugar are dissolved

It's easier to do than to say!

—then pour into the mayonnaise and beat well.

This makes a mild mayonnaise. You can change the seasoning to suit yourself, of course.

There is really nothing easier to make than a good mayonnaise—and you know how good it is because you know that it is made of Wesson Oil, a fresh egg and pure spices.

Why wouldn't today be a good time to try it? This Wesson Oil mayonnaise is the beginning of many delicious fancy salad dressings—for instance, Thousand Island dressing or Russian dressing.

RUSSIAN DRESSING

To make Russian Dressing you add to three-quarters of a cupful of mayonnaise one-half of a hard boiled egg that is chopped very fine, two chopped pimentoes, one tablespoon of chopped chives or one-half tablespoon of grated onion, one-third of a cupful of chili sauce, two teaspoons of chow chow and the juice from one-quarter of a lemon. If you like it, you might add the meat from an anchovy or sardine flaked fine.

THOUSAND ISLAND DRESSING

Thousand Island Dressing is even simpler. To a cupful of mayonnaise you add a third of a cupful of chili sauce, a third of a cupful of whipped cream, two tablespoons of chopped sour or sweet pickles or chow chow and one chopped pimento.

TEA ROOM MAYONNAISE FOR FRUIT SALADS

To one cupful of Wesson Oil mayonnaise add one-quarter cupful of cream, whipped stiff, one-half tablespoon of lemon juice and a little paprika. Stir well.

then be quickly brought to the boiling-point. After the water boils, draw the kettle to the side of the range where it will simmer.

Cover the fish with water, and add one teaspoon of salt and one tablespoon of vinegar or lemon-juice to every two quarts of the water. After the water begins to simmer, allow ten minutes to the pound for white fish, fifteen minutes to the pound for medium fat fish, and twenty minutes to the pound for fat fish.

In steaming, place the fish on a plate in the upper part of the steamer, allowing the same time as for boiling.

Fasten the fish securely together with steel skewers and a stout cord

TO BROIL FISH

Split the fish down the back, dry it thoroughly, and sprinkle it with salt, pepper and lemon-juice. Place the fish, flesh side down, on a well-greased wire broiler. When it is cooked, turn it and broil it on the skin side until crisp. Large fish may be cut into slices one inch thick, and broiled on both sides evenly.

TO FRY FISH

After cleaning, dry the fish, sprinkle it with salt and pepper, dip it in fine bread-crums, flour or corn-meal, in egg, and then in the crums, flour or corn-meal again. Fry it in deep fat.

FISH LOAF

1 cup fish
2 cups bread-crums
2 eggs, beaten
2 tablespoons finely minced bacon
Salt and pepper
1 tablespoon melted butter
1 tablespoon minced parsley
Milk, enough for moistening

Mix the ingredients well and form a loaf on a flat, slightly greased pan. Brush with melted fat. Bake in a moderate oven (350° F.) for thirty minutes. Serve with pepper sauce.

GREEN PEPPERS STUFFED WITH FISH

4 medium-sized green peppers
1 cup bread-crums
⅔ cup shredded fish
2 small slices bacon
1 tablespoon butter
1 tablespoon minced onion
Salt and pepper
Tomato-juice, meat-stock, or milk to moisten

Cut a slice from the stem end of the peppers, remove the seeds and plunge the peppers into boiling water. Cook them for ten minutes and drain them.

Attractively garnished with cucumber, lemon and pimiento, the fish is brought to the table

TO PREPARE PANNED FISH

Clean, wash and dry the fish, rub it in flour which has been seasoned with salt and pepper, or dip it in egg and crums and fry it in a saucepan in a small amount of fat.

TO MAKE FISH STOCK

Place the head, bones and trimmings from the fish in a kettle. Add one small onion, one small carrot, celery leaves or the coarse outside stalks, parsley, green pepper, two cloves, a small piece of bay-leaf, and salt. Cover with cold water. Simmer until the meat drops from the bones. Strain. The shredded meat may be used in creamed dishes and chowders.

IMPERIAL CREAM OF FISH SOUP

1 medium carrot
1 small onion
1 medium potato
4 stalks of celery
2 tablespoons butter
1 pint thin white sauce
1 cup fish-stock
½ cup finely shredded fish.

Cut the carrot and the potato into thin match-like pieces one inch long. Cut the celery crosswise and mince the onion. Melt the butter and fry the vegetables in it until they are yellow. Cover them with boiling water and cook until tender. Add the hot white sauce, shredded fish, stock, salt and pepper. Serve with a dash of paprika on top.

To make the stuffing, cut the bacon into bits, try out the fat and add the butter and crums. Fry until the crums are slightly browned. Add the other ingredients, using just enough liquid to moisten them. Fill the peppers, cover them with crums and bake (350 degrees Fahrenheit) until tender, or about thirty minutes.

FISH CUTLETS

1 cup milk
2 tablespoons butter
4 tablespoons flour
1 cup shredded fish
Salt and pepper
Onion-juice
Lemon-juice

Make a white sauce of the milk, flour and butter. When this is thick and smooth, add the shredded fish and the seasoning. Spread the mixture on a plate to cool, and set aside for an hour. Shape the mixture into flat cutlets, roll them in crums, in beaten egg to which has been added one tablespoon of milk, and then in the crums again.

Place them on a baking-tin and brush them over with melted butter. Brown the cutlets in a hot oven (400 degrees Fahrenheit).

WHAT TO DO WITH RHUBARB

By Alice Blinn

Recipes have been tested and approved by the School of Home Economics, Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

Frozen rhubarb desserts—ices, sherbets and frappés—offer a refreshing change in the Spring menu

Have you ever tried the sweet-tart flavor of juicy pink rhubarb for giving a tang to preserves? We have recipes for luscious jams, conserves and marmalades, all of which use rhubarb. Our Home-Making Department will send them to you if you'll address your request to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and remember to enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope

IT IS a curious fact that perfectly good foods are often the victims of their own reputations. This is true in the case of rhubarb. Every housewife knows that her family enjoys its succulent flavor and its juiciness bubbling under a flakey crust, and that they find a dish of stewed rhubarb for breakfast most welcome. Yet no one ever seems to think of using this delicious fruit-vegetable except in a pie or for sauce. The modern home-maker should realize what a friend she has in rhubarb. For rhubarb comes early in the season and stays throughout the Summer. It is easily grown in the tiniest back-yard garden, it is always cheap in market, it has a lovely color, and a pleasantly-sharp flavor. Also it has better food value than many fruits.

Why shouldn't it be one of the most useful foods?

Frozen desserts—ices, sherbets and frappés—are excellent when made with rhubarb-juice. It is delicious in hot puddings as well as in cold gelatin puddings. And baked rhubarb has a flavor and color all its own.

Here are a number of common recipes in which rhubarb has been substituted for the more ordinary fruits.

RHUBARB SHERBET

1 tablespoon granulated gelatin
¼ cup cold water
4 cups rhubarb juice
2 cups sugar
Juice of 2 lemons

Soak the gelatin in the cold water until it is soft. Make a sirup by boiling the rhubarb-juice and the sugar for five minutes. Pour the hot sirup over the gelatin, add the lemon-juice, and stir the mixture well. Strain it, allow it to cool and freeze it.

RHUBARB JELLY

2 tablespoons granulated gelatin
½ cup cold water
½ cup boiling water
¾ cup sugar
3 cups rhubarb-juice

RHUBARB BAVARIAN

1½ pints milk
Lemon-peel
½ cup rice
¼ teaspoon salt
½ cup sugar
1 teaspoon flavoring
2 tablespoons granulated gelatin
½ cup cold water
1 cup heavy cream
Rhubarb

Put the milk and a few thin slices of lemon-peel into a double boiler. When the milk is hot, stir in the well-washed rice and salt, and cook until the rice is perfectly tender. The milk should be nearly absorbed, leaving the rice very moist. Add to the hot cooked rice the flavoring, the sugar and the gelatin, which has been soaked in the cold water, and mix carefully. When the mixture is beginning to set, fold in the cream, whipped until stiff. Pour the whole into a mold. Serve it with well-sweetened rhubarb sauce. The white mold with the red sauce makes a charming color combination.

RHUBARB WHIP

1 cup sweetened cooked rhubarb
Sugar
3 egg-whites
Salt

Rub the fruit-pulp through a sieve, add a pinch of salt, sweeten if necessary, and heat. Fold the stiffly-beaten whites of eggs into the hot fruit-pulp. Fill a greased baking-dish or small molds three-fourths full, set in a pan of hot water and bake until firm. Serve with whipped cream or a soft custard.

STEAMED RHUBARB PUDDING

2 cups rhubarb
½ cup butter
1 cup sugar
2 eggs
2½ cups flour
4 teaspoons baking-powder
1 cup milk

Cream the fat and sugar and add the beaten eggs. Sift the flour and baking-powder together and add to the first mixture alternately with the milk. The rhubarb, which has been sweetened, cooked and has the juice drained from it, is stirred into the dough. Turn this mixture into greased individual molds and steam for one hour. Serve with a sauce made from the thickened rhubarb-juice.

RHUBARB BETTY

1 pint cut rhubarb
4 tablespoons butter
⅔ cup rhubarb-juice
½ cup fine bread or cake crums
¾ cup sugar

Place the rhubarb in a baking-dish and add bits of butter. Pour half of the fruit-juice over the rhubarb, sprinkle with crums and sugar. Arrange a second layer in the same way and bake, basting occasionally with the remaining juice. Serve in a hot baking-dish.

RHUBARB AND MACAROON PUDDING

⅓ pound almond macaroons
1 pint rhubarb-juice
4 eggs
½ cup sugar
1 orange

Soak the almond macaroons in the rhubarb-juice until soft. Beat the eggs and add to them the sugar and the grated rind of one orange. Stir the mixture carefully into the macaroons and add the juice of the orange. Pour the whole into a greased mold and set on a stand or ring in a kettle of boiling water. Simmer steadily for an hour. Serve hot with orange or rhubarb sauce.

BAKED RHUBARB

Prepare as for stewing, using the same proportion of sugar and rhubarb, and bake in a slow oven until the rhubarb is reduced to a soft, red pulp.

QUICK QUAKER—luscious and strength building—cooks in 3 to 5 minutes

FOR sparkling eyes and rosy cheeks—"hot oats and milk," say authorities on child feeding.

Because of limited cooking time, many mothers were serving less nourishing breakfasts, so Quaker Oats experts perfected Quick Quaker.

Savory, flavory and delicious, it's cooked and ready in 3 to 5 minutes. That's quicker than toast, quicker than coffee! Why not have richer, more nourishing breakfasts then? Ask your grocer for Quick Quaker. You will be delighted with it.

All that rich Quaker flavor; all its smooth deliciousness, are retained. The grains are cut before flaking and rolled very thin. They cook faster. That's the only difference.

Your grocer now has two kinds of Quaker Oats—the kind you have always known and Quick Quaker.

WHAT'S IN A SAUCE?

By Jane E. C. Emmons

Recipes have been tested and approved by the School of Home Economics, Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

The right sauce, piquantly seasoned, brings out the flavor of meat or fish

MORE SAUCES!

Yes, we have more of them—ten, to be exact—as savory and appetizing as those given here. "Sauce Piquante" is one of them — it lives up to its name, too—and each has a delicious flavor all its own. We'll gladly send them to you without charge if you'll write to our Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope "Always have lobster sauce with salmon,

And put mint sauce your roast lamb on."

THE difference between good and bad cookery can hardly be more strikingly shown than in the preparation and serving of sauces. The making of excellent sauces should be carefully studied by American women, for foreigners often make the sweeping assertion that we have but one sauce for all occasions. A well-made sauce, smooth as velvet and seasoned exactly right, will add much to the menu.

WHITE SAUCE

Melt two tablespoons of butter, add two tablespoons of flour, and, when these two ingredients are thoroughly blended, pour on gradually, stirring constantly, one cup of milk. Beat this mixture until smooth and glossy, and season with one-fourth of a teaspoon of salt and a dash of pepper. A wire whisk is a very good utensil to use in making white sauce.

LOBSTER SAUCE

Make the white sauce as directed, and add to it a cup of lobster cut in small dice, a blade of mace, a very little Cayenne and a tablespoon of lemon-juice. This sauce is not only good with salmon, but it is excellent for baked bluefish.

PARSLEY SAUCE

To the white sauce add one tablespoon each of chopped parsley and lemon-juice, a dash of Cayenne, and you have an excellent sauce for boiled fish.

OLIVE SAUCE

Mix together one tablespoon each of melted butter and flour, and one-half a cup of good stock. Stir until smooth and thick. Add a scant tablespoon of Worcestershire sauce and one dozen finely chopped olives. Season with a little salt and pepper. Let the mixture simmer gently for three minutes.

MINT SAUCE

The mint should be fresh and young. Strip the leaves from the stems of half a dozen stalks. Wash these well and chop them very fine. To three tablespoons of the chopped mint allow two tablespoons of powdered sugar. Mix in the sauce-boat and add gradually six tablespoons of good vinegar. While this sauce is, par excellence, for lamb and mutton, it may also be used for other meats when they are served cold, and is delicious with new potatoes.

ONION SAUCE

Melt two tablespoons of butter in a frying-pan, stir in an ounce of flour and two of finely chopped onion. Cook until a light brown, then add one-half a cup of good stock, stirring constantly. Mix together one teaspoon each of sugar, French mustard and tarragon vinegar and stir in while the sauce is boiling.

GERMAN SAUCE

Put three tablespoons of butter into a stew-pan with a sprig of parsley chopped fine, the juice and rind of one small lemon and four good-sized tomatoes which have been skinned and nearly all the seeds removed. Season with salt and pepper. Add a quarter of a pint of water and set the mixture over the fire. Bring the mixture to boiling-point. Serve this sauce with roast meats.

DUTCH SAUCE

Put the yolks of two eggs into a small bowl with two ounces of fresh butter (about four tablespoons), one-half a cup of water, a little salt, a grating of nutmeg, and mix thoroughly. Place the bowl in a saucepan of simmering water and stir the mixture inside until it is thick. Do not let it boil. Remove the jar from the fire and add a dessertspoon of lemon-juice or a few drops of strong white vinegar. This is a good sauce for fish or calves' head.

EGG SAUCE

"Egg sauce: few make it right, alas!
It's good with bluefish and with bass."

No. 1. Mash the yolks of three hard-boiled eggs and mix with an ounce (two tablespoons) of butter, one tablespoon of cream or rich milk and two tablespoons of lemon-juice.

No. 2. Make a good plain white sauce and add to it the whites and yolks of two hard-boiled eggs chopped fine and seasoned to taste with salt and pepper. Allow two eggs to each pint of white sauce. This is an excellent sauce to serve with cauliflower or other vegetables.

CELERY SAUCE

Mix together two tablespoons of flour and one-half a cup of butter. When well blended, stir the mixture into a pint of boiling milk. Chop very fine three heads of celery and boil for a few minutes in water; strain and add the celery to the sauce, stirring over the fire for five minutes. Season to taste with salt and pepper; and a bit of mace may be added if desired. Serve with boiled or roast fowl. It is a thin, very rich sauce. It brings out the flavor of fish, meat and game.

MUSHROOM SAUCE

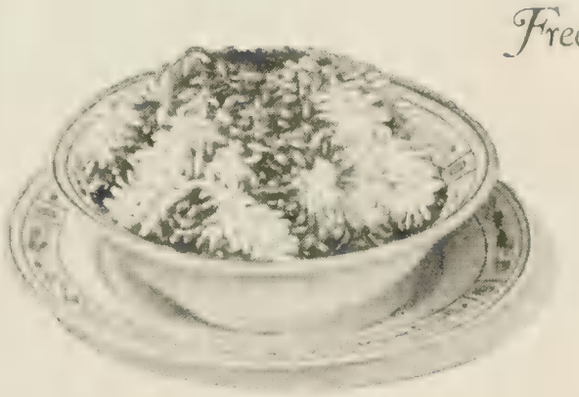
To each cup of stock add the juice of one can of mushrooms. Thicken with two tablespoons of flour and two tablespoons of butter rubbed together. Season with salt, pepper and a little lemon-juice. Add the mushrooms and let the whole simmer a few minutes. This is an excellent sauce to serve with fillet of beef.

Why no other syrup can give you this wonderful flavor

The largest selling high grade syrup in the United States

IT'S WHEN the steaming waffles lie golden-brown on the plate before you, that syrup becomes for the moment the most important thing in life. How you long for that one perfect flavor in your syrup—for the taste of maple at its best.

Like other precious gifts of nature—the finest coffee or chocolate—maple sugar is at its best only when skillfully blended.



It is through the Towle Process of blending, known only to the makers of Log Cabin, that maple is brought to you in its most delicious form. Choice maple sugar from Canada and Vermont is combined with granulated cane sugar in Log Cabin, in a way that mellows and enhances the richness of the maple. No other syrup can give you just that same delicate flavor.

You will see happier faces around the table when you first serve your family Pancakes or Waffles with Towle's Log Cabin Syrup. Use it on Hot Breads, French Toast and Fried Mush, too.

A pleasant surprise lies ahead of you, if you have never tasted rice with Log Cabin Syrup. It is a delightful dessert. Just follow the simple instructions given below. DAINTY DRESSING-TABLES

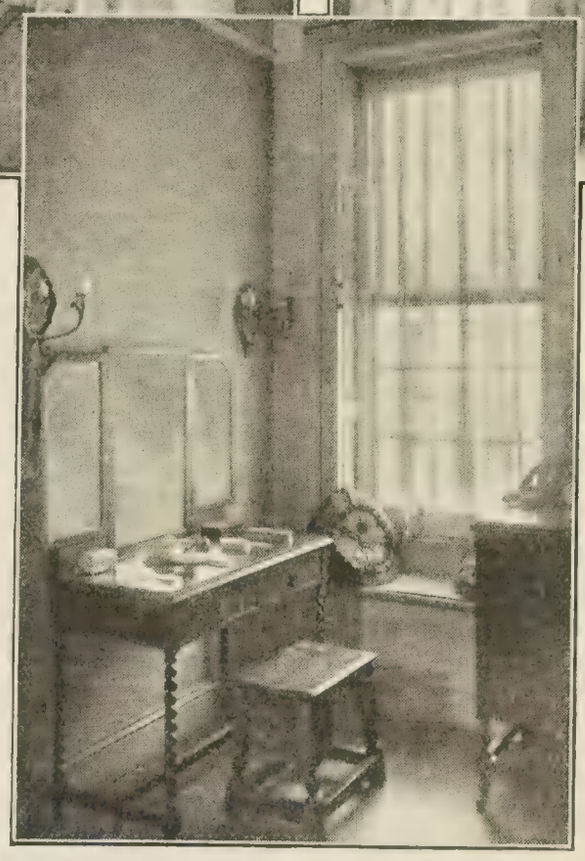
By Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders

Editor, Department of House Decoration



Mrs. Sanders says: "I shall be glad to answer any reader's questions about anything from the making of a dressing-table to the assembling of a toilet-set." This is a very cordial invitation—and all Mrs. Sanders asks is that you send a stamped envelope for her reply. Address her at THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

ONE of the many things that modern house decoration has done for the woman of to-day is to gratify her desire for a pretty and practical dressing-table.

Besides the style, which of course should be chosen to combine with the other types of furniture in the room, the matter of the dressing-table's correct height to fit the person who uses it is most important. Care should be taken to guard against a high chest with a towering mirror for a short person, or a low, broad table for a tall lady.

Besides the flat-top dressing-table with the three-sided mirror, old chests, wash-stands and tables painted and flounced make attractive toilet-tables

After a careful selection of the piece itself, the next thing of importance is to place it in the path of good light. To get the best daylight, if one's dressing-table can not be placed between two windows, see to it that whatever light is available shines on the face instead of the mirror.

The matter of artificial lighting is still another problem which, to gain the happiest results, should be considered carefully. If an overhead drop-light is to be reckoned with, it should be at least seventy-two inches from the floor and hung just over the mirror and not too far in front of it. If, on the other hand, side brackets or plugs for a pair of lamps are considered, these should be at a height slightly above the head of the person at the mirror and shaded with down-turned flaring shades.

In the country where no electricity is available, candlesticks with stout wax candles give an excellent bright light and have an advantage over lamps in that they throw less heat and may be placed closer to the mirror.

Glass tops have never been more successfully used than for dressing-tables. With a glass top, no longer do powders, lotions and cold-creams mar beautiful woods or soil dainty dressing-table covers. Runners of muslin, embroidered linen, cretonne and lace are often placed under the glass and are just as lovely when seen through the protecting slab as when used on top.

All dressing-tables should contain enough drawers or compartments to enable their owners to keep neatly under cover and out of sight brushes, combs, small cloths, cotton and other toilet necessities. An array of patented hair tonics, pastes and powders can hardly be considered interesting decorations for a lady's dressing-table. Too, it is wise to keep one drawer for clutter. Quick dressing often necessitates careless placing, and this one sinful drawer will help to keep the others neat.

Dainty bottles of silver or glass, pretty cold-cream jars and powder-boxes, a pair of crystal or porcelain lamps, silver candlesticks, a small, slim vase for the single rose and a pincushion covered with silk or with a dainty washable cover are pleasing and feminine articles which are indeed more than mere ornaments.

And now the all-important and necessary toilet-set! Never before have the shops had so much to offer in assortments of materials and colors—silver, tortoise, ivory in natural or dainty colors, wood and clear amber sets. They bewilder one with their variety.

The most necessary pieces in such a set are the brush, comb, hand-mirror, powder-box, button-hook, nail-scissors, shoe-horn, jewel-box and pin-tray. Besides these, hair-receivers, containers for fresh cotton, an extra comb and plenty of hairpins should be added, as the occasional guest often adjusts a stray lock before milady's dressing-table, and the last-mentioned articles should be ever present for her convenience and comfort.

—But her Husband didn't get a Divorce!

Little chapters from the story of how the Arch Preserver Shoe changed the ideas of a Nation. No. 7

THEY had been engaged during their last two years at Northwestern University. Shortly after their commencement they were married and settled down in Chicago to live.

Their's had been a romantic courtship. They had a "perfect background" of wonderful times together—so many things to "talk about." They would be so happy!

She had been a leader in social affairs at the university, a sorority girl, and a good student. He had been an athlete and one of the best known men on the campus.

Therefore, they were popular in Chicago. They soon found many friends among the Northwestern alumni. Business started off well, too. In fact, from every view-point their new life was fine.

Then followed a trip abroad, a new home—and a young son. They had been married three years. And it would have seemed logical to expect them to be happier than ever before.

But, as a matter of fact, they were miserably unhappy—at the breaking point.

She had become nervous, impatient, incapable of enthusiasm. Trips were abandoned; entertaining was almost entirely dispensed with; they had very few good times together. She seldom played golf; never played tennis; didn't care to walk; had little energy for dancing.

And yet to her husband she appeared healthy, and he settled down into a feeling of genuine dissatisfaction.

"I'm getting sick and tired of your everlasting whining," he declared one morning, and he slammed out of the house.

What happened next is perhaps best told in her own words. She wrote: "I was face to face with ruin. I could well understand that the end of our married life was in sight. Yet it seemed so hopeless. I couldn't be my old self. I couldn't do the things I knew I ought to do, simply couldn't. I felt like a helpless old woman.

"My husband didn't come home for dinner that evening and for hours I sat sobbing, fingering through magazines, seeing nothing. I had no thought for stories of other people. Tragedy was in my own home at that moment.

"But my eye caught the phrase 'It's so wonderful to feel like doing things!' in one of your advertisements. To feel like doing things. That was what I needed. I read the advertisement, and was cynical. I couldn't conceive how a pair of shoes could make such a difference.

"The next day, however, I decided I'd try these shoes. I had to do something. I was in such a desperate mental condition that I would have tried almost anything then.

"I got the Arch Preserver Shoes. I wore them a few days. I didn't feel like climbing trees, but I did begin to feel more capable. I somehow managed to quit scolding, and my husband acquired a tolerant attitude that enabled me to wait for developments.

"Six months have passed since I purchased my first pair of Arch Preserver Shoes. I have changed into another woman. I feel so differently; and I don't see anything worth complaining about.

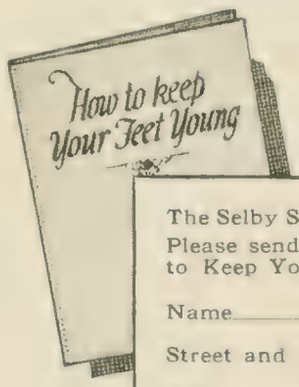
"I guess I've solved my problem. My husband came home this afternoon and we played a game of tennis. I won. He laughed and called me 'Freshman'—the first time I'd heard that word since our 'bride and groom days.'

"I feel like walking and being on my feet. I have no aches. I don't feel drudgy. My nerves are calm and steady. These are the reasons why I felt enough gratitude to write you about my experience. To think that a pair of shoes would have prevented all the mental agony that I suffered! I wish other women could understand."

Other women are understanding. Thousands and thousands of them. They have learned by similar experiences, that the concealed, built-in arch bridge does provide a natural support for the foot arch, that the shoe bends freely with the foot at the "ball," the only place the foot itself bends. They also have realized the wonders of the flat inner sole which permits the nerves, bones, and blood-vessels of the forepart of the foot to function normally.

In this shoe your feet are so comfortable, so vigorous, so downright healthy that you have unbelievable capacity to do things which require walking and standing.

There can be no sagging, no cramping, no burning sensation, no aching. The foot can carry the weight of the body all day long and never have the slightest strain.



This means a free, unhindered feeling—real youthfulness in your feet.

Besides, you have the smartest of style for all occasions. It's so wonderful, Arch Preserver Shoe women are saying, to have the energy to enjoy all the occasions as well as the fashionable footwear to finish off your costumes.

A different shoe, with an entirely different effect on the foot—yet in appearance it is like any high-grade shoe.

Won't you write us for our little booklet, "How to Keep Your Feet Young"? It will tell you all about this more desirable shoe.

Mothers!

Only the purest unflavored unsweetened Gelatine combined with real fruit juices [not extracts] will yield you the remarkable health properties found in

KNOX
GELATINE
"The Highest Quality for Health"

The recipe below is not only delicious, but is easily digested and supplies the valuable vitamins of the fruits.

ORANGE JELLY

1 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
½ cup cold water — 1 cup sugar
2 cups boiling water — 1 cup orange juice
2 tablespoonfuls lemon juice

Cut a piece of peel from stem end of oranges. Remove pulp and juice. Strain juice from pulp and use in making jelly. Soak gelatine in cold water ten minutes; dissolve in boiling water. Add sugar; stir until dissolved; add fruit juices. Fill orange cups with the mixture. Serve, garnished with whipped cream and glaced cherries. Or, mold in small cups. May be served as a salad on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise.

Mothers should read our book—"The Health Value of Gelatine." Free for 4c postage and your grocer's name.

Charles B. Knox Gelatine Co.
166 Knox Avenue, Johnstown, N. Y.

Both packages contain the same plain Sparkling Granulated Gelatine, but the "Acidulated" has an extra envelope containing lemon flavoring.

Any of the dried fruits are delicious in bread, cookies and cake if cooked and steamed until tender. Prunes are especially good in sandwich bread

SPRING USES OF DRIED FRUITS

By Lucile Brewer and Alice Blinn

Recipes have been tested and approved by the School of Home Economics, Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

If you look down on prunes as prosaic and unimaginative, we're willing to wager you've never tasted the sour-sweet combination of prune-and-pine-apple conserve or the luscious smoothness of apricot sherbet. Don't you want us to send you these recipes and some other tempting ones that use dried fruits? Write to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a stamped envelope

KEEP up the fruit habit now Spring has come. Now is the time to take advantage of the dried fruits that you will pass by when fresh fruit becomes more abundant. Dried prunes and figs vie with the citrous fruits in healthful properties, offering an excellent supply of iron and calcium. Apricots, though lacking iron, offer phosphorus as a substitute and have in addition an enticing flavor. These fruits are all-the-year standbys with a Summer as well as a Winter usefulness.

Since these fruits have been dried, they must have their water content restored to them. They should first be washed, then allowed to soak in tepid water overnight. They are cooked in the same water in which they are soaked in order not to lose their mineral salts, and should be boiled slowly and gently. Cooking in a double boiler or a fireless cooker is an ideal method for dried fruits. These fruits are rich in a natural concentrated supply of sugar, but if more sweetening is desired, it should be added just before the cooking is finished. For recipes where the pulp is desired the fruit may be steamed until tender and then rubbed through a strainer. The pulp is much used in soufflés, sponges and ice-creams. These fruits are also used in pastries and in salads, as well as in the form of sauce. The steamed fruit may be cut and used in fruit cakes, cookies or puddings.

APRICOT DUMPLINGS

Wash, soak and stew dried apricots and sweeten to taste.

Make a plain pastry dough. Roll the pastry into a sheet and cut in rounds large enough to enclose a medium-sized apple. Place two tablespoons of the stewed apricots on each round. Add a small piece of butter, and press the edges of the dough together.

Brush over the top with milk and dredge with sugar. Bake in a moderate oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit) fifteen to twenty minutes. Serve with thin cream.

PRUNE COFFEE CAKE

⅓ cup fat
½ cup sugar
¼ cup molasses
1 egg
1 cup milk
1 teaspoon salt
Grated rind and juice ½ lemon
2½ cups flour
5 teaspoons baking-powder
1 cup prunes
1 teaspoon cinnamon
½ teaspoon nutmeg
¼ teaspoon soda

Blend the sugar and fat together and add the beaten egg, molasses and milk. Sift the dry ingredients and add the prunes, soaked and cooked until soft. Combine the two mixtures, beat well and pour into a shallow pan. Sprinkle with a mixture of three tablespoons of sugar and one teaspoon of cinnamon. Bake in a hot oven (400 degrees Fahrenheit) for twenty minutes. If served hot, cut with a fork.

PRUNE BREAD

2 cups whole-wheat flour
2 cups Graham flour
2 cups white flour
2 tablespoons sugar
1½ teaspoons salt
1 compressed yeast-cake
1 cup steamed prunes cut in pieces
½ cup chopped English walnuts
Tepid water to make stiff batter

Mix the dry ingredients and the prunes, add the yeast dissolved in one-half cup of tepid water, and enough more tepid water to make a stiff batter. Beat thoroughly. Let rise until double its bulk. Stir well and turn into greased bread-tins. Let rise until it is again double in bulk and bake in a moderate oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit) for one hour.

PRUNE MUFFINS

Bake the mixture in greased muffin-pans for twenty-five minutes and serve hot. These muffins may be used as a dessert by doubling the sugar and serving with any fruit sauce.

PRUNE SAUCE TO SERVE WITH BAKED HAM

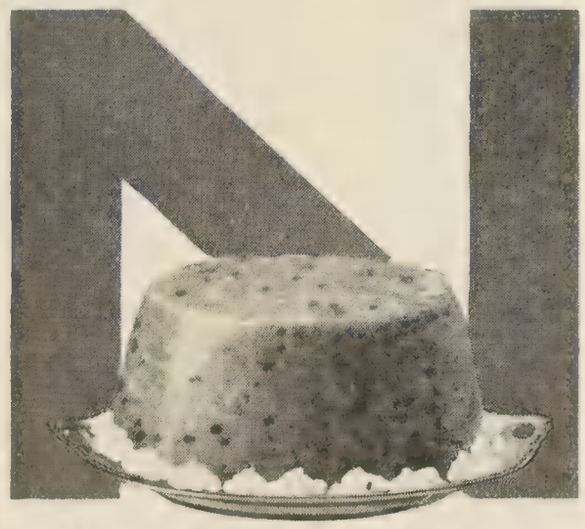
¼ cup butter
3 tablespoons flour
1 cup boiling water
½ teaspoon salt
1 bouillon cube
Cayenne pepper
Grated rind and juice 1 lemon
Grated rind and juice 1 orange
1 cup thin prune-pulp

Brown the butter carefully and add the flour, salt and a few grains of Cayenne pepper. Stir until thoroughly brown. Dissolve the bouillon cube in the boiling water and add gradually to the mixture. Cook thoroughly. Just before serving add fruit-juices and pulp. Pour the sauce over hot baked ham and garnish with watercress or parsley.

FIG PUDDING

1 cup sugar
⅓ cup fat
½ cup milk
2 egg-yolks
2 cups flour
1 teaspoon salt
4 teaspoons baking-powder
2 egg-whites

Cream the fat and sugar. Add the beaten egg-yolks. Add the milk alternately with the sifted dry ingredients. Beat thoroughly. Fold in the stiffly beaten egg-whites. Turn the mixture into a greased shallow pan and bake in a quick oven (450 degrees Fahrenheit).



Cut in oblong pieces and place a spoon of whipped cream on top. In the center of the cream place a stewed fig. Serve with fig or lemon sauce.

"The Highest Quality for Health"

ONE package of Knox Sparkling Gelatine will make four different desserts or salads—each sufficient for a family of six.

Treat your family to the following delicious dessert. It is economical and easy to make.

Butter Scotch Rice Pudding

Wash ⅛ cup rice; cook in double boiler, with two cups scalded milk and ¼ teaspoon salt, until nearly tender. Meanwhile cook together in shallow pan one cup brown sugar and 2 tablespoons butter until it gets dark brown, but not burnt. Add this to the rice and milk, and finish cooking until rice is tender and the caramel melted. Soak ½ envelope Knox Gelatine in ½ cup cold water 10 minutes; dissolve in one cup hot milk. Strain this into cooked rice mixture and turn into cold wet mold. One cup chopped nuts or Grape-Nuts may be added.

This "Perfection Salad" will tempt any appetite. It's a particular favorite with men and it's good for the children, too. This salad makes an ideal "company" dish. Write for the recipe.

Because of its health value, economy, and many delightful uses, a plain, unflavored, unsweetened gelatine like Knox Gelatine should be served to your family daily.

Every Bean
HAND SELECTED

57

Millions of cans of HEINZ BAKED BEANS are produced each year.

And every individual bean is hand selected!

Heinz uses only the choicest hand-picked beans, but even these are not choice enough.

Each bean, before it is baked in the Heinz ovens, is re-inspected by clean, sharp-eyed, quick-fingered girls—hundreds of them working before an endless carrier. Long practice makes them perfect; they rarely miss a single defective bean.

Re-selecting selected beans may seem like an unnecessary precaution, but it is a rule of Heinz to take nothing for granted.

The Heinz label on any one of the 57 Varieties is a seal of quality, and no process necessary to the maintenance of that quality is considered too slow or too costly for the house of Heinz to adopt and follow. * * * H. J. HEINZ COMPANY

MENUS FOR EASTER TIME

By Jessie A. Boys

These menus were planned to provide correct nutritional values within the budget of an average household. They were edited by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the School of Home Economics, Cornell University

It is often a problem for the housewife to find just the right dish to serve at a company meal—a savory soup, a dainty dessert or some especially tasty way of roasting meat. If you want some simple but attractive dish to serve when you entertain, look over this list of menus and see if any of the starred recipes strike your fancy. Then read the note at the bottom of this page.

IN OLD English times many days during Lent were celebrated because they had some special significance.

The long Lenten fast was ushered in by a feast of pancakes on Shrove Tuesday, when a pancake bell was rung from the church at noontide, and the children cried:

"Pancakes and fritters, Say the bells of St. Peter," or

"Pan on, pan on,
Pull the big one off, put the little one on;
Pan on, pan on!"

In the middle of Lent came a Sunday called Mothering Sunday, because on that day it was the custom for young married couples to visit their parents. In many parts of England a dinner of roast loin of veal was served to the assembled family. A "laid pudding," which consisted of layers of raisins and currants alternating with delicious custard-soaked tea-cakes, was eaten with it.

On Palm Sunday, and in some parts of the country on the previous Sunday, which was known as "Carling Sunday," it was customary to eat carling, consisting of gray peas, steeped all night in water and fried the next day in butter.

Care Sunday, care away
Palm Sunday and Easter Day, says the old rhyme.

A soup made of gray peas and bacon was formerly given away to customers by all Black Country innkeepers on Shrove Tuesday, or "Fasten's E'en," as it was called. Shrove Monday was called Collop Monday because on that day people ate flesh, both fresh and salted, for the last time in forty days. The collops were sometimes large slices of bacon. The Saturday before Collop Monday was sometimes called Egg Saturday because on that day eggs were eaten for the last time before the long fast.

The custom of eating Hot-Cross Buns on Good Friday has continued down to the present day. In ancient times, these buns, if properly made, were supposed to keep for years. They probably took the place of a pagan sweetmeat eaten in honor of Eastre, a Saxon Goddess of the East, whose feast was celebrated in the Spring. The sign of the Cross on the buns made it a Christian cake. Often the housewife used to make the sign of the Cross on a loaf of bread to prevent the devil from interfering with her baking, and as Good Friday was supposed to be the most unlucky day of the year, she naturally took every precaution to guard against evil influences and to make her baking a success.

Most of these holidays with their quaint old customs have lost their original meanings nowadays. We have not set aside special dishes to be served during Lent, and entertaining presents few difficulties for us at this time, for the markets offer the housewife a wide variety of fresh fruits and vegetables.

Following are a few menus for party luncheons and dinners which the hostess may find helpful.

WELCOME SPRING SALADS

By Alice Blinn

Recipes have been tested and approved by the School of Home Economics, Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

Rings of green pepper or lemon add color to a fresh asparagus salad

Don't you sometimes find it hard to know just the right kind of dainty to serve with a salad? THE DELINEATOR has a whole sheaf of suggestions—sandwiches, biscuits and crackers—that are toothsome and original. Just drop a line and a stamped return envelope and our Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., will send them to you at once

THERE is nothing like the fresh crispness of a salad to tempt a jaded appetite in the Spring. Tender young dandelions, crisp water or Winter cress, sorrel and chickory make many a pungent, satisfying "appetizer" of this sort.

Such a salad should be served crisp and cold with a dash of well-seasoned French dressing. Or sometimes a salted cream dressing is a welcome variation. This last is made of three tablespoons of thick cream beaten into the yolk of one egg. A teaspoon of salt and a tablespoon of lemon-juice is added at the end and the whole thing is chilled.

A dinner salad should be light and simple, and for this the crisp green things are best. The luncheon salad may consist of cooked greens chilled with eggs, or may combine several vegetables. Always keep the salad as crisp, sharp and tasty as possible.

In mixing a salad it is important to have all the ingredients chilled and crisp. Use a chilled earthenware bowl and a silver or wooden fork or spoon. Lift and fold the ingredients together, taking care not to crush them. No appetite is tempted by a salad which is mashed. Always serve on a cold plate.

Chives, mint, chervil, parsley and other small greens finely minced and sprinkled over Spring salads make effective garnishes.

For molding individual salads use aluminum or tin molds, earthen or glass ramekins. Gelatin salads may be placed in pans and cut in squares or any other desired shape after hardening.

CUCUMBER JELLY SALAD

From the first early cucumbers a very tasty jelly salad can be made. You will need

1 pint of grated cucumber
Salt and paprika
2 tablespoons vinegar
1 tablespoon oil
1 teaspoon gelatin
2 teaspoons cold water
6 halves of walnut-meats
Mayonnaise
Lettuce leaves

Peel several cucumbers, removing most of the white pulp as well as the green skin. Grate enough to give one pint, and season with salt, paprika, vinegar and oil. Add the gelatin mixed with cold water. Place over the fire until warm and well mixed, but do not boil. In the bottom of individual molds put half a walnut-meat; then pour in the cucumber mixture and set on the ice to cool. When ready to serve, turn each mold onto a nest of young lettuce leaves and top with a spoonful of mayonnaise.

FROZEN ASPARAGUS SALAD

Fresh asparagus is a treat at this time of year, and a frozen asparagus salad would be most delicious. Cook a small bunch of asparagus in the smallest possible amount of water until tender. Remove the tips and rub the stalks through a strainer to make a purée. Season well with salt, pepper and a bit of lemon-juice. Cool and add a cup of cream and one of mayonnaise dressing. Fold in the asparagus tips, pack in molds and freeze.

RADISH-ROSE SALAD

2 cups shredded lettuce
French dressing
1 tablespoon grated cheese
Mayonnaise
12 radishes sliced thin
Garnish of whole radishes

Mix the shredded lettuce well with the French dressing to which the grated cheese has been added. Form a nest of this, filling it with thin slices of radish which have been mixed with mayonnaise dressing. Garnish each portion with one whole radish cut to form a rose.

CRESS SALAD

1 pint watercress
1 onion
French dressing

Pick over the watercress carefully, removing all bruised or wilted leaves. With the fingers break the crisp ones into two-inch lengths. Put the cress in a salad-bowl. Chop the onion very fine; sprinkle it over the cress. Add French dressing and serve.

CRESS-AND-DANDELION SALAD

1 cup watercress
1 cup dandelion greens
French dressing
6 thin slices raw onion

The dandelion greens should be fresh and young. Wash the leaves carefully and drain them well. Arrange them in a salad-bowl with the cress. Add the slices of onion and the French dressing.

CRESS-AND-WALNUT SALAD

½ cup walnut-meats
1 lemon
1 pint watercress
French dressing

Crack the walnuts and remove their meats as nearly as possible in halves. Squeeze over them the juice of the lemon and let them stand for a short time. Just before dinner pick over the watercress, wash it carefully and drain it in a napkin. At the last moment drench the cress with French dressing and sprinkle with the nuts.

ASPARAGUS SALAD

6 rings cut from green pepper or lemon
24 stalks cold boiled asparagus, fresh or canned
Lettuce leaves
French dressing
½ tablespoon tomato catchup

Cut the rings of pepper or lemon about one-third of an inch wide. If lemon is used, remove the pulp, leaving only the peel. Slip four stalks of cold asparagus through each ring and arrange on crisp lettuce leaves. Serve with French dressing to which tomato catchup has been added.

Dentists Now Prescribe Them

Oranges for The Teeth

Facts About Tooth Troubles That All Mothers Should Know

To Combat Tartar and Decay

We asked this question of two thousand dentists—"Are oranges good for the teeth and why?"

Here is their composite answer, accurately and conservatively stated:

For Alkaline Saliva

Orange juice used after any meal is a good solvent of the starchy material left between the teeth and around the gums, which, if it stays, results in tartar and decay.

For Sound Tooth Structure

Oranges, although known as "acid" fruit have an alkaline reaction in the blood, and also stimulate the flow of alkaline saliva—the one best natural mouth wash.

Oranges and orange juice contain the essential phosphates and several other minerals necessary to a sound tooth structure. Growing children whose teeth are in the formative period are in daily need of the bone and tooth-building mineral salts of oranges.

To Check Pyorrhea

Acid condition of the blood is often the great obstacle in the way of proper pyorrhea treatment. Oranges, helping as they do to alkalinize the blood and saliva, thus tend to relieve the dentist of that interference with this most important work in saving teeth.

Four Important Reasons

So here are four reasons for the frequent use of oranges given by men who have made life studies of the proper growth, the care and preservation of the teeth.

Four reasons for "the bed-time orange"—to protect the teeth at night.

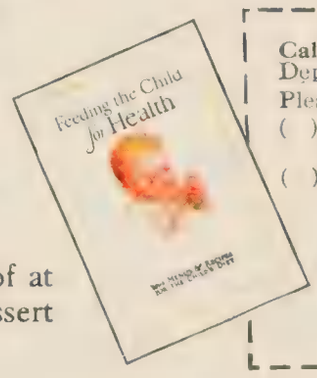
Four reasons for the use of oranges with starchy meals particularly—to remove the starch that starts decay if it remains.

Four reasons for the presence in the diet of at least one orange salad or fresh orange dessert each day.

A Most Pleasant Benefit

Here are facts about a fruit that practically all children like which surely every mother will be glad to know, because the orange method simplifies, in a most attractive way, the daily problem of the children's teeth.

Fresh The Year 'Round



You may buy fresh oranges the year round if you ask for Sunkist. They are rich in the organic salts and acids which are so good for the teeth. Being in the market always you can use them every day.

The only "Cabinet Babies" – the washing of their clothes Mark Twain and his famous white suits –

JEAN, JOAN, JANE and JIMMY
– and their dainty clothes

"YOU'VE heard of many kinds of babies, but 'Lux babies' are quite a new thing, especially famous ones. Of course, they are not fed on Lux, but they have all their dainty dresses and soft flannels and cuddly woolens washed in Lux.

"Two of these famous Lux babies are Jean and Joan, the only Cabinet babies in Washington, daughters of the Secretary of Labor and Mrs. James J. Davis.

"Jean and Joan have a four-year-old sister Jane. She refuses to put on any dress unless the sleeves are 'pasted,' which is the way she tells whether the dress is freshly laundered or not! And seven-year-old brother Jimmy has all his play suits and silk blouses washed in Lux. So you can see how such a family of four lively children increases the output of Lux! Their mother says: 'With two babies and a constant demand for "pasted" sleeves and Jimmy's innumerable shirts, we give thanks daily for Lux. I buy it by the case of one hundred boxes!'"

Elizabeth H. Shaw, Washington, D. C.

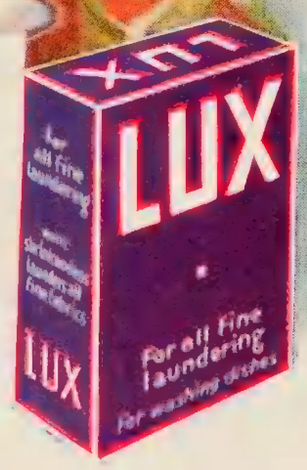
Mark Twain's sure method

"MARK TWAIN had a 'battery' of about twelve white serge suits, and would wear one for about two days, and then it would be 'French cleaned.' One day he said he had heard of a wonderful new laundry material. He had forgotten its name, but said it rhymed with 'swans,' and he insisted that one of his suits be washed with it.

"Grocery stores were 'scoured'! However, the name suggested some sort of domestic bird—chickens, roosters, ducks. 'Ducks' it must be! Lux rhymed with 'ducks.' 'Yes,' he said, 'that's the name.'

"One of his suits was washed in Lux. He inspected it—smelt it and felt it. 'I knew it!' he drawled, 'I knew they'd made a mistake in the name. This is as white, and clean, and pure, and soft as swan's down'."

R. W. Ashcroft, Brooklyn, N. Y.



IMPORTANT USES FOR LUX
that women themselves have discovered

THEIR finest fabrics—lovely silks, sheer cottons and linens—Lux cared for them so gently that women everywhere began using it for everything they washed with their own hands.

Dishes—All the ugly traces of dishwashing vanish from your hands when you wash your dishes with Lux. Lux leaves your hands so soft and fresh—and the dishes with such shining faces. Just one teaspoonful is enough for dishwashing.

The family laundry — Clothes and household linens are too expensive these days to trust to soap that is hard on them! For everything that is washed in the house use Lux! Those foamy Lux suds leave things so sweet and clean without wear and tear on your laundry. You can do the washing with your own pretty hands when you use Lux — it is so kind to them. A little goes so far it's a real economy to use it.

Babies' milk bottles, linoleum, paint, porcelain, rugs, shampoo — Women love Lux for every one of them. It does the work so safely and keeps your busy hands so white and smooth. Lever Brothers Co., Cambridge, Mass.

Now the Big New Package too!

Lux won't hurt anything that water alone won't injure

ASK US

Ask us anything you want to know about housekeeping and we will answer it personally. From our recent correspondence we publish the following questions and answers as being of general interest to all home-makers

QUESTION—What is meant by a service-plate and how is it used?

Answer—In serving formal meals a plate is placed in the center of each person's place at the table. This is called a service-plate and is usually of the hostess's most cherished china. Upon this plate the first courses of the meal—fruit, oysters and soup—are placed. The plate is not removed until the first hot course after the soup is served. Thus in formal service the cover-place is never left without a plate.

QUESTION—How should baked potatoes be served? Is it enough to take them directly from the oven to the table?

Answer—Baking is the best method of cooking potatoes. It does not matter how they are served if they are well baked and mealy. The skin of each potato should be broken before serving, for this lets the steam escape and keeps the potato from becoming soggy. It may be broken open or a cross may be cut on one side of each potato and the four triangles of the skin tipped up. In this opening butter and a dash of paprika may be placed. Tartar sauce or maître-d'hôtel butter may also be used.

Stuffed baked potatoes are both delicious and decorative. Cut the upper portion from the flat side of each baked potato, leaving it boat-shaped. Scoop out the potato, leaving the shell. Mash the potato thoroughly and beat well with butter, salt, hot milk and cream. Pile the potato lightly in the shell and brown in a quick oven.

Baked potatoes are served with a serving-spoon and fork.

QUESTION—In canning I never seem to be able to estimate how much fruit or vegetables will be required to fill my cans. Are there any rules or measurements that would help in this?

Answer—The quality of the food to be canned, the method of preparation and the actual canning itself cause variation in the number of cans to be obtained from a given quantity of food. The average quantities have been found to be about as follows:

1½ pound of spinach will make 1 pint can
1 pound of chard will make 1 pint can 12 to 15 baby beets will make 1 pint can 20 carrots will make 1 pint can ¾ of a pound of string-beans will make 1 pint can
2 quarts of peas will make 1 pint can
4 small ears of corn will make 1 pint can
1 bushel of peaches will give about 25 quart cans
1 bushel of plums will give about 28 quart cans
1 bushel of red raspberries will give about 24 quart cans
1 bushel of cherries will give about 20 quart cans
1 bushel of tomatoes will give about 18 quart cans

THE PRODIGAL SUN

By Flora Rose

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the School of Home Economics, Cornell University

"OPEN up your doors and your windows wide and let a little sunshine in"—the prodigal sun has at last come into its own! If we wish to thrive, we must throw open the house and go forth and welcome the sun with open arms and bare. We must literally bathe in its beneficial rays—children and adults alike.

It will not do to let the ordinary pane of glass stand between us and this prodigal wanderer, because it is only when the sun's rays come in direct contact with our bodies or with the air that surrounds us that we get the full effect of the radiant energy it has to bestow.

Clothes, too, shut us away from its effects. Let us therefore seek a vacation at the seashore or the lakeside where we can, in the modern frank bathing-suit, alternately bathe in water and in sun and store up in our bodies a supply of sunshine to help tide us over the Winter's shortage. If this is not possible, let us find some protected sunny spot where we and our children can receive the benefits of a daily sun-bath during the warm months at least. Let us arrange our houses and our lives so that they will include as much direct sunshine or sun-warmed air as possible.

As soon as the days are warm enough to permit it, put the children in short socks. Let them wear little short frocks or panties. Make the tiny sleeves short or roll them up and have the necks low or the collars turned down. And except in very hot weather send the youngsters out to play during the sunny part of every day.

Whenever the sun shines, Winter or Summer, open up all the doors and windows as wide as possible and fill the house with sun-kissed air. Never mind if the best rugs and draperies fade. Strong, vigorous bodies, straight bones and clear minds count more than household possessions.

Hang pillows and bedding to air in the open so that when night comes they will be delightfully freshened and thus contribute to the family health.

All of ths means that if we are house-hunting or home-building we should surely give some thought to the location, the number and the size of the windows and the possibilities of establishing a protected place for a sun-bath for the children, at least. We should build and live in houses where those rooms which are used most frequently are the sunniest.

The time will come when those great unused roof areas in our large cities will be as much sought after as sites on the seashore and the lakeside. We believe our new conception of the benefits of direct sunshine or at least of sun-warmed air will change some of our methods of regulating the ventilation and lighting of our schools. We believe that windows will be opened more often in the schoolroom and a new kind of glass will be used for windows—a glass recently perfected which does not shut out the radiant energy of the sun.

But there will still be those who must shake their heads sadly and say: "This is not for me, for I have nothing to offer the prodigal sun. My windows will not welcome him. The canyon of a street in which I live is too deep to receive him. I have neither roof nor sleeping-porch, nor the opportunity to seek the seashore or the lakeside. What am I to do?" But there is hope, even for this person. For sun energy may be found stored up in at least a few of our foods. So if for some reason we find ourselves shut away from the sun, or if the Winter is a dark one because the sun has shut itself away from us, then we may turn to those foods which we know will help us. Pure cod-liver oil is the most potent of these—three or four teaspoons a day for the children and adults, three to fifteen drops in each bottle for the babies. It is a disagreeable dose for some people until a taste for its special flavor has been cultivated, but it is well worth any temporary unpleasantness. An egg or an egg-yolk a day for older children and adults and a half an egg-yolk a day for the babies will also give them some stored-up sun energy.

Babies often have rickets because they lack the properties that the sun supplies. Treatment with violet rays is one method of helping them. Or the food which such children are to eat may be subjected to the rays, thus indirectly giving the child the power necessary for healthy tissue growth.

It is the sun itself, however, which should supply protection to the majority of us, and if we give it a cordial open-house welcome it will come and abide with us.

For his Sake —and yours Mother!

Dress Baby the safe way —without a pin or button

SAFETY pins in Baby's clothes. They never did belong there! For they do become unfastened—so mysteriously. Sharp, jabbing points exposed!

And hard buttons standing edgewise are almost as painful to Baby's sensitive little body, so easily bruised.

If Baby could only talk he'd tell you that these make him cry more often than colic or "temper."

The Safe Way

The Vanta way of dressing Baby now eliminates both pins and buttons. Instead dainty little bows of twistless tape fasten Vanta Baby garments. You can dress your Baby without once turning him over. And the tapes are instantly adjustable for a perfect fit. No buttons to break in the wringer. No loose pins for Baby to put in his mouth.

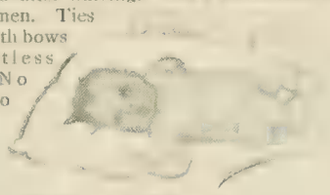
Recommended by 20,000 Doctors and Nurses

More than 20,000 leading doctors and nurses recommend this safe way to dress your Baby. Vanta garments are all non-shrinkable, guaranteed. Twice sterilized in the making—once just before packing—so they come to you, mother, antiseptically clean.

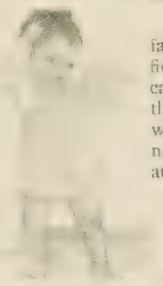
For Baby's comfort and safety you'll be glad many times to have him dressed the Vanta way.

Most stores carry Vanta Baby Garments. If your dealer should not, just write direct to the EARNSHAW SALES CO., INC., Dept. 24, 325 W. Jackson Blvd., Chicago, Ill.

Note: Vanta Twistless Tape, patented, is different from any other tape. It will not kink, twist, curl or ravel. If tape had not been improved in this way, this method of fastening would not have been practical.



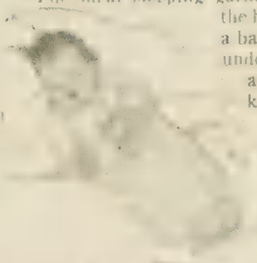
Vanta "K" Band
For Summer



Many babies cannot wear wool over the chest and back, especially in warm weather, yet need that "touch of wool" over the abdomen. The Vanta "K" Band meets this need, the upper part being of cotton, while the lower portion is of fine merino, the two fabrics being skillfully joined in the knitting without a seam.

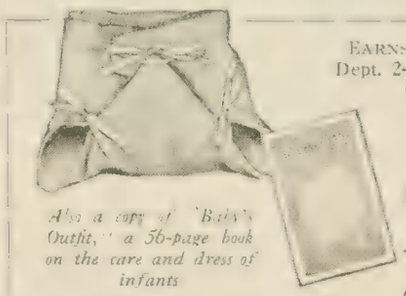
Vanta Abdominal Binders

Replaces the old-fashioned, inelastic strip of flannel used to hold the navel dressing in place. A knit fabric, firm enough, yet sufficiently elastic to permit the little "tummy" to expand after nursing. Goes twice around the abdomen. Ties at side with bows of twistless tape. No pins—no sewing.



Vanta Vest

"The shirt without a fault," has won the unqualified approval of the medical profession. Double over the chest and abdomen, just where constant protection is needed. Cannot possibly gape at the neck. And it can't "work up" because the last little bow fastens it securely just below the curve of the abdomen.



Vanta Knit Knitie

The ideal sleeping garment. The tape at the bottom closes it like a bag, keeping the feet under cover. The tapes at ends of sleeves keep hands covered and prevent thumb-sucking and infection of the eyes by rubbing with the fists.

ASK THE DELINEATOR

We are glad to offer our readers the following services; and we hope they will have no hesitation in consulting our department experts on any personal or household problem. Be sure (1) to address your inquiry to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.; (2) to give us your return address; (3) to enclose the cost of the pamphlet or other literature (in each case a minimum amount fixed to cover cost of printing and postage)

Babies and Children—In its Happy Child Department, THE DELINEATOR offers mothers the medical advice of nationally known baby and child specialists.

The following pamphlets, which are reprints of articles that have appeared in THE DELINEATOR, may be had for ten cents each: "The Expectant Mother and the New Baby," by Dr. Ralph Lobenstine; "The General Care of the Baby," "Maternal Nursing," "Artificial Feeding" and "Diet Problems of Childhood" (four separate booklets), by Dr. L. Emmett Holt; "Early Childhood," by Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw; "The Mental Health of the Child," by Dr. Thomas W. Salmon; "The School Child," by Dr. William Palmer Lucas; "The Child's Teeth," by Dr. Harvey J. Burkhart; "Three Dread Diseases of Childhood: Diphtheria (by Dr. William H. Park), Tuberculosis (by Dr. L. Emmett Holt), Diabetes (by Dr. Henry Rawle Geyelin)," and "Play, Eyes and Movies," by Dr. Ward A. Holden and Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw. There is also a treatise on "Correct Posture," by Dr. Alan De Forest Smith, to be had for ten cents; and a cloth-bound "Baby's Record Book," by Dr. Bird T. Baldwin, which costs one dollar.

Housekeeping—The Home-Making Department has more helpful leaflets than can be listed here. Write for a list of subjects. Ask any question that troubles you in your household management. Always send a self-addressed, stamped envelope for reply.

Building and Decoration—If you want to build, write for pictures of all Donn Barber's model houses, costing you only two cents for return postage. Then for one dollar you may order a print of floor-plans and elevations of the house you decide upon.

Ask Mrs. Sanders, the editor of this department, about furnishing and decorating (not more than five questions at one time, please). Be sure to give dimensions, exposure and full description of rooms—and a two-cent stamp for reply.

Special bulletins, "Good Floors," "Curtains and Draperies," "Walls, Woodwork and Ceilings," "Furnishing the Home" and "How to Choose, Frame and Hang Your Pictures," may be had for twenty-five cents each.

Beauty and Health—You can improve your appearance with a little time and careful study. The Beauty Editor will answer personal questions and send folders prepared by experts on the care of the skin, hands and hair, on lotions and cosmetics. These folders are free. Tell us which you want. Be sure to enclose postage.

Etiquette—Don't make social blunders. Mrs. John Cabot Kimberley will answer any personal quandary or send you instructive leaflets on the various phases of etiquette. Some of the most popular are: "Courtesies of To-day between Men and Women," "Introductions, Invitations and Replies," "Entertaining," "Travel," "House Weddings," "Etiquette at the Table," "Letter-Writing," "Calls and the Use of Cards." These leaflets cost you nothing but the postage, which should be estimated at two cents for three folders.

Entertainment—Ask us about any dinner, dance, shower or entertainment that you may be planning. This department has some interesting suggestions for a simple Historical Carnival and Pageant, which may be adapted to any community; a Cranford Party; and Musical Readings, suitable for various occasions. Two cents will cover return postage.

REDUCING IN SPOTS

be taken in connection with a general régime of food curtailment. Since local accumulations are the result of too little muscular activity, the most effective exercises are those that bring into play the particular parts of the body that are too fat. If followed faithfully, in connection with an intelligent diet and exercise program, they may be depended upon to serve the desired purpose. They are not, however, a set of instructions for working miracles. They entail some work, but no results can be accomplished in reducing without effort. The various things that are advertised to melt fat by merely saying "presto" and rubbing on some lotion not only fail in their purpose but, as I have said before, may work actual harm. They should be strictly avoided.

The woman is indeed fortunate whose tendency to "get fat" is local. An otherwise trim and attractive figure that is marred by huge arms, thick ankles, a series of chins, or a waistline of aldermanic dimensions can be improved by following a sane and healthful program of exercise. Results are certain, and the program entails no exercises so strenuous as to be injurious. Nor are there very severe demands on one's time. The principal requisites are regularity and punctuality. Furthermore, a woman must not look for results if after exercising for a few minutes she sits down and devours a pound box of candy. The body is going to build up faster than any exercise course will wear down if she insists on supplying it with rich material.

During any of the reduction cures of a more or less drastic nature the heart should be frequently examined and the work decreased if there are signs of trouble. Another thing to remember is that when the weight is reduced by drugs or dieting alone without a corresponding effort to improve the general muscular tone serious complications are apt to arise. Among these are displacements of the organs, often leading to more serious troubles than was obesity itself. This all goes to prove that there is no such thing as an overnight cure.

The success or failure of a reducing course is primarily a matter of one's will and mental condition. One must have the determination to enforce the strictest discipline upon oneself. Follow your program to the letter. Do not guess at anything, but measure your food and do your exercises exactly as prescribed by the guide you are following. If you do, success is assured.

I am convinced, after many years in athletics, that a trim, well-poised body is the finest possession that any one can have. It is an advertisement that one is healthy and that one has the strength of character to avoid certain excesses and to do certain definite things that are requisite to maintain good health.

IT MUST be remembered, however, that some persons are naturally slender and others are plump. Some of the healthiest and most conscientiously abstemious and energetic women that I have ever known are much heavier than the willowy creatures one sees in the fashion books. Nature has cast such women in a generous mold. They are not "fat in spots," but have a liberal supply of firm, healthy flesh on their bones. On the other hand, I have seen some fashionably slender ones who to me seemed the victims of malnutrition or vitally in need of proper rest and sleep.

The safest plan to follow is to adjust your diet with regard to your tendency to grow fat or slender, take exercise enough to keep the bodily functions in order, fight off local fat deposits by special exercises, and stop worrying. If you are perfectly healthy, physically and mentally, you probably will be proportioned just as nature intended that you should be.

Putting Your Birthday on Your Back

"IT is true, Madame, women put their birthdays on their backs when they become careless about their figures. Then they come to me and expect a miracle of dressmaking — that I shall make straight lines of rounding curves.

"With the right corset, yes! Without it, positively no! For one cannot be correctly gowned unless one is first correctly corseted."

Your dressmaker is right. True fashion foundation depends upon correctly fitted corsets.

And she knows there is a Bon Ton corset or brassiere for every need of the human figure — models scientifically designed to put the pounds in their place and prevent straight lines from curving prematurely.

For the lovely Easter frock you cannot be satisfied with just any corset. Insist upon a Bon Ton fitting for a corset of undeniable comfort one that will not fail to give you proper support and line in the right place.

Of particular interest to all women planning their Spring and Summer wardrobe is the exceptional offering of Bon Ton FIVE DOLLAR corsets now being shown by leading department stores and specialty shops. These are a quality corset of finest materials and workmanship that will outhold their shape and outwear far more expensive models.

There is a Bon Ton dealer in your town. Ask to be shown this unusual corset value at $5.00.

When 5,000,000 Women turn to a new way in personal hygiene, surely you owe it to yourself, at least to try that way

By ELLEN J. BUCKLAND, Graduate Nurse

If you believe the testimony of five million American women, you too will want to know about this new way in personal hygiene. At least will want to try it, for yourself.

Today countless thousands of women are learning for the first time, what these millions know. Everywhere, they are finding new personal immaculacy, new freedom, relief from embarrassment. Today this amazing new way has been adopted by 8 in 10 women in the better walks of life.

This new way is Kotex, and doctors, nurses everywhere advise its use. It is Science's solution of woman's oldest problem, supplanting the old-fashioned sanitary napkin and other dangerous makeshift methods.

These scientific features

Many discomforts common to women are directly traceable to makeshift sanitary methods. Much of the loss of charm, of the feminine immaculacy expected at all times, is chiefly due to the same reason. Every woman knows this to be true.

Kotex is a sanitary pad made of Cellucotton, the world's super-absorbent. It absorbs 16 times its own weight in moisture. It is five times as absorbent as cotton.

Each Kotex pad is impregnated with a new secret deodorant which our scientists recently discovered. It is the result of years of laboratory experiment and research.

Another important advantage of Kotex is that it can be discarded simply, without the least bother or embarrassment—just like a piece of tissue.

Kotex is germ-proof, packed in sanitary sealed packages of 12. In two sizes, the regular and Kotex-Super.

All drug and department stores have Kotex—ready-wrapped in plain paper. There are no questions to ask or answer, no needless conversation. Simply pay the clerk and walk out, that is all.

Easy to get—anywhere

Today, get Kotex, deodorized. Learn what it has come to mean to the millions of women who have adopted it. Or if you will write to me, I will send you free a sample of the new deodorized Kotex, and an interesting booklet, written by an eminent doctor on this important subject. Your letter will be treated confidentially, of course, and the sample will come in plain, unmarked wrapper. Just address me

SAVE DOLLARS AND HOURS

Hints from successful housewives

It you have discovered some clever little way to save time or labor or fuel or food or anything else connected with housekeeping, tell us about it—and if we can use it in these columns we will pay you five dollars for it. Write on only one side of the paper and address your letter to The "Savers" Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. Silk lamp-shades can be washed most successfully in warm sudsy water

SAVE YOUR LAMP-SHADES BY WASHING THEM

SOMETIMES housekeepers think that when silk lamp-shades become dingy and soiled they must be discarded and the frames recovered. However, I have washed several very successfully. Any metal fringe or braid should be removed. Then the lamp-shade should stand for a few minutes in a tub of warm sudsy water. After the shade has stood in the water for several minutes raise it up and down so the suds will be forced through the material. The shade should then be rinsed in clear warm water. If the silk is faded or a different tint is desired, a dye may be added to the rinsing-water. The shade should be hung to dry in the same position it will have when placed on the lamp, and it should be dried in a shady place. I have washed successfully yellow taffeta and China silk shades made of three layers of material.—E. J., Mount Vernon, N. Y.

SAVE YOUR SUITCASE

In these days of long motor drives suitcases which must be packed on the running-board or even in the rear of the car often become marred and must be refinished. They may be protected by making a case of duck or linen which may be slipped over the suitcase with a piece of cardboard or several thicknesses of paper placed between the case and the cloth cover. Suitcases protected in this way may be taken on many a long motor trip without the slightest damage.—M. H. G., Pilot Mound, Manitoba, Can.

SAVE WORK IN REMOVING PAINT FROM WINDOWS

It is sometimes very difficult to prevent paint from getting on window-panes when the house is being painted. But I have found a very good way that goes far toward preventing this nuisance: Before the house is painted, coat the windows thickly with any cleaning-powder commonly used for window-washing. When the house is finished, both paint and cleaning-powder can be washed off the glass together, thus saving time, temper and money. If paint has been allowed to dry on the windows, a sharpened putty-knife will remove it very easily.—A. M. H., San José, Calif.

SAVE MONEY ON LEMONS

By purchasing several dozen lemons during the season when they are cheapest the housewife can save considerable money. All the juice should be squeezed from the lemons, strained through a cloth and placed in glass jars. To one part of juice two parts of sugar are added. Lemon-juice stored in this way is all ready to use for puddings, ices or fruit-drinks.—MRS. J. L. E., Shawnee, Okla.

SAVE MISTAKES IN BUYING WALL-PAPER

By getting samples of wall-papers and submitting half of each sample to the direct sunlight for a week and by then comparing the two pieces of each sample one can determine the relative fading quality of the paper.—MISS G. S., North Stonington, Conn.

SAVE DIFFICULTY IN CLEANING CEILINGS

The ceilings of my kitchen and two other rooms on the same floor are painted and must be washed at least twice a year. Any woman who has ever washed a ceiling knows what a back-breaking undertaking it is. I now plan to wash the ceilings on the day I do the weekly washing and shorten the labor by boiling the clothes on the kitchen range instead of in the laundry, thus producing steam in the room in which the ceilings are to be washed. As soon as the laundry is finished, I start the work on the ceiling. The dirt comes off very easily, and this difficult but necessary work does not take more than one-quarter the time that was required before I chanced upon this method.—MRS. J. MACD., Schenectady, N. Y.

SAVE TIME IRONING NAPKINS

Very good results are possible when napkins are ironed in the following manner. Do not sprinkle all the napkins, but dip every third napkin into clear warm water. Place this between two dry napkins, fold and roll the three together tightly. In twenty minutes they will be ready to iron and will be evenly dampened from hem to center. Next fold each napkin right side out with the hems together and iron double until dry. In this way the corners are easily kept square. If the napkins are embroidered, that part of the napkin must be pressed on the wrong side first.—MRS. T. R., Chicago, Ill.

Are your rugs safe playgrounds?

The rugs upon which children romp are safe playgrounds only when they are clean to the very bottom of their deep, soft nap. For danger lurks where dirt hides—the danger of disease! And dirt hides in every rug that is not beaten regularly. Your Hair is Twice as Beautiful Shampooed this way

Try this quick and simple method which thousands now use.
See the difference it makes in the appearance of your hair.
Note how it gives new life and lustre, how it brings out all the wave and color.
See how soft and silky, bright and glossy your hair will look.

THE alluring thing about beautiful hair isn't the way it is worn.

The real, IRRESISTIBLE CHARM is the life and lustre the hair itself contains.

Fortunately, beautiful hair is no longer a matter of luck.

You, too, can have beautiful hair if you shampoo it properly.

Proper shampooing is what makes it soft and silky. It brings out all the real life and lustre, all the natural wave and color and leaves it fresh-looking, glossy and bright.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why thousands of women, everywhere, now use Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product brings out all the real beauty of the hair and cannot possibly injure. It does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method.

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then apply a little Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp, and all through the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

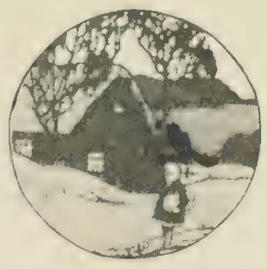
After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, give the hair a good rinsing. Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before. After the final washing, rinse the hair and scalp in at least two changes of clear, fresh, warm water. This is very important.

Just Notice the Difference

YOU will notice the difference in your hair even before it is dry, for it will be delightfully soft and silky. The entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find your hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it really is.

* * * *



If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

an insulating material between your shingles and rafters. There is manufactured material which can be used as a substitute for the wood sheathing which is necessary under a clapboard, stucco or brick side wall and which thoroughly insulates a house. This material is put up in large square sheets over the studding, on the floors, walls and ceiling. It is somewhat more costly than the wood sheathing, but it is cheap if you consider how much heat it saves. Insulating a house keeps it cooler in Summer, too, and assists in deadening sounds.

"And now let me give you a word of good general advice: If you want a well-built, durable house, you must face the fact that there is no economy in cheap materials or construction. Unfortunately there has been, especially since the war period, a tendency to erect cheap houses and to scrimp in many of the fundamental details of good construction. Building homes has been done by the block instead of by the house, and the house which has sprung up like a mushroom is really the most expensive kind of home to own.

"Unless the foundation, framework, masonry, plumbing and lighting equipment of a house are properly constructed and installed, the cost of maintenance is out of all proportion to what it should be. If you want to save in building, cut out the non-essentials. These can be added later. The idea in building a house is to have a permanent home, not a cheaply built shack that must be constantly repaired and made over. Remember these points and you'll have the best of luck with number twelve."

A little sleepy cry from a corner sent him hastening toward a child who sat up now in her white robe, a tangle of soft dark curls framing her rosy face, two dimpled arms stretched out toward her brother.

"So, my beauty! Awake at last!" he murmured, bending to lift her from the mat. "Such a sleepy little sister! And now she shall be dressed and sit in the doorway beside her big brother and have a fine dish of porridge. And to-day mother goes away, and we keep the house alone. Such fun we shall have!"

She laughed and clasped her round arms closely about his neck, while he carried her over to a low seat and proceeded deftly to dress her. The mother, watching them, smiled, though her eyes were heavy with the pain which had never quite died since she knew that her little daughter was blind from her birth.

But the child herself was happy. In her little blue tunic with its many-colored sash, her hair all smooth and shining, she ran lightly across the floor for a good-by kiss, and stood beside Philip, waving her hands as gaily as if she could see her mother turning at the crook of the road for a backward look at them.

"Now thou shalt have breakfast. Next we shall feed the pigeons, and later thou shalt stay with our neighbor while I go to the spring," Philip told her, and she nodded contentedly. A silent child was little Rhoda, sweetly docile, speaking mostly by smiles and nods and little winsome gestures. When, after their midday meal, he left her with the kindly Anna, he knew she would give no trouble.

THE boy walked swiftly, down a path that skirted the city, through a thickly-built suburb, along a wider path toward Elisha's spring, sweetened so long ago by the ancient prophet, and still the only source of pure water for the city.

As he neared the spring, the sight and sound of unwonted crowds came to him. He hastened his steps until he came up to a group of women, waiting to fill their water-jugs.

"He is a Nazarene, but some call him the Messiah," a woman said as Philip came up. "He doth marvelous deeds. I have a kinsman who hath a friend in Galilee who hath followed him for months. This friend declares that the Nazarene hath healed lepers and——"

"'Tis so with all of them," interrupted another impatiently. "They all have friends or kinsmen who beheld great wonders. But where is the man or the woman who hath actually seen one of these things? It is all hearsay—tales carried on the wings of foolishness."

"Well, he is here now," said the first speaker. "Maybe we shall see some great deed ere he leaves us."

"Who is this ye speak of?" Philip asked, edging closer to the women. "Some new healer?"

"Hast not heard of the Nazarene?"

"I have heard rumors. But he worketh in distant places."

"No, he is here, in Jericho. Yesterday, toward the evening, he came into the city. Last night he stayed in the house of Zaccheus, the publican. Strange company for a Messiah! 'Tis said he will go on to Jerusalem to-day, there to await the Feast. But be not excited."

In the boy's eyes she had read the flash of longing. "Let not thyself be deceived by false hopes, child," she added gently. "This man is but a poor peasant, with a band of rough-looking followers."

"Nevertheless," declared a bold-looking woman who stood near, "my uncle, who lives in Jerusalem, saw at the Feast of the Tabernacles a beggar healed as he sat by the Temple gate crying for alms. A beggar who had been born blind! For years had my uncle known this blind beggar, and now he sees!"

"Oh!" cried the lad, his dark eyes flaming with excitement now, "where will he pass? Tell me quickly!"

"Where all the pilgrims pass. Along the caravan road. It is the one road to Jerusalem, and to-day it is crowded with those who would reach the Holy City before the Sabbath day sets in. But thou shouldst not——"

But the boy waited for nothing more.

It was less than half an hour later that Philip, his little sister in his arms, came out on the highway where a great crowd was banked solidly. A roar of voices reached him, and he broke into a run, stumbling a little under the child's weight.

"Is he passing?" he half sobbed. "Are we too late?"

As if in answer, the solid mass broke, swayed, dissolved into fragments, and became little groups of men, women and children going off toward their homes, laughing and calling to one another in careless enjoyment. Philip caught at the robe of one who came near.

"The Nazarene! Hath he passed?"

"Passed? Yes. But a moment ago. Not much of a sight——"

A mighty roar drowned his words. It came from farther down the road. Women's voices raised in hysterical outcry. Men's deeper voices, no less excited. Philip ran forward, hope giving him new strength, darting through the tiniest openings of the crowd which had closed in again, until he came to a man, his face uplifted to heaven, tears streaming from his eyes as he cried over and over:

"I see! I see! I see!"

"'Tis Bartimæus! The blind beggar! Is he healed?" Philip demanded, catching at the arm of a man beside him.

"He says he sees. There, 'tis proven! Can a blind man see thus?"

For as they looked the man had whirled, made his way through the crowd, which opened at his gesture, and was off, lost amid the caravans which were passing swiftly down the road, his voice coming back:

"I see! I see! Master, I follow!"

"Hath the Nazarene gone? Oh, am I too late?" Philip cried out, such longing in his voice that many turned to look at him.

"He is far down the road by this time, poor lad," a woman spoke kindly. "He passed swiftly, stopping but an instant at the blind man's cry. And thy little sister is blind? Ah, the pity! If thou couldst overtake him – Hast no one to take thee up to Jerusalem?"

"My uncle, if he hath not gone," Philip faltered. His eyes scanned the passing groups piteously. Pious Jews, going devoutly to their Feast. Romans, Greeks, even Ethiopians, going for trade or for curiosity.

Suddenly he darted forward, under the nose of a passing camel, evaded the advance of a smartly cantering group, caught at the bridle-rein of a donkey whereon sat a tall, severe-looking man who stared with a frown at this unprecedented boldness.

"Uncle!" sobbed Philip. "Wilt thou take us up to the city? That Rhoda may be healed by the Nazarene? Thou wilt take us?"

"What foolishness is this?" stormed the man. "Why art thou here on the road with thy sister, like a little beggar? Screaming at thy elders! I am ashamed of thee!"

"But the Nazarene hath passed. He healed Bartimæus."

"Thou speakest of things which thou knowest nothing about," thundered Philip's uncle. "The Nazarene is an impostor."

"But he hath healed the blind," persisted Philip. "Here, but a few minutes ago."

"Enough of this. He hath healed beggars, because they were never blind. Now, be done with unseemly behavior."

Never had the boy received rebuke so sharp. Slowly, with misty eyes, he turned and made his way back, his heart torn with despair and hot rebellion.

ALL night and all day the boy stayed quietly at home, neglecting no observance of the holy day. All night and all day he pondered. And when the last banner of the Sabbath sunset had been furled in the west, when, with little Rhoda's head devoutly bowed beside his own, he had said the prayer of the closing day, he began, quietly and steadily, to make preparation for a journey.

"The leathern bottles of milk for thee, my beauty," he said, hanging them with a thong about his neck. "The cakes of wheaten bread for us both. Ripe figs and dates. Ah, it is not wrong! Did not my father bid me, as he was about to die, 'Be a strong man, and do all things for thy mother and sister'?"

Twilight was graying the pastures, purpling the mountains and filling the valleys with mists of pale lavender as the pair stepped out on the old caravan road. The boy had chosen this hour wisely. Few from Jericho would make their start to-night, and pilgrim bands would remain encamped until the morning. Once away from the city there was little likelihood of his being recognized or halted. He knew the journey was counted as four hours by camel, six by the slower-footed donkeys. Surely then, by going very carefully, by treasuring his strength, he might reach the beautiful city.

They were less than a mile out on the highway when night shut down, blotting out everything but the yellow thread of dusty road. Little Rhoda began to whimper with weariness and he sat with her until she sank into a sound sleep, curly head nestled on his shoulder. Then he trudged on, bravely fighting his own fatigue, now resting, now marching, now drawing aside in the shelter of bushes as an occasional group of travelers passed, now on once more.

He knew that he must be drawing near to the thief-infested road of which he had often heard—a desolate stretch, flanked by bare limestone hills whose caves were the hiding-places of cruel bands that crept out to prey upon travelers. He must find a sheltered place to hide until morning. He moved forward silently, straining his eyes for some friendly clump of bushes, when suddenly, a little way back from the road, a wild plum tree in full blossom stood white against the blackness. He made his way to it and found, as he had hoped, a tangle of low shoots at its base. There he made a place for little Rhoda and tucked his cloak warmly around her. Even in this land of Summer the night winds were cool. Then, cross-legged, he sat and watched the sky, where the clouds were scattering and stars beginning to prick through. When his eyes drooped, he rose and began to pace up and down.

"I must not sleep. Not until I know no one is near——"

Suddenly the boy started, and crept swiftly to shelter beside the sleeping child. His ear had caught voices, and as he peered, down the highway came a cavalcade of loud-voiced men, each on a loping camel, flaring torches lighting up here a turbaned head, there a bale of bright silk, yonder a shining spear or a glistening helmet.

"I say 'tis time to camp," one declared lustily. "When the morn breaks, three hours will take us into the city. In the meantime, a camp fire and food and sleep."

"Traders," Philip whispered to himself, "going down to sell their wares to the crowds at the Feast." He felt no fear of them, and their nearness brought a heartening sense of companionship.

PHILIP, too, slept now, unable longer to fight off an overpowering fatigue and drowsiness. But the winds grew colder as the night advanced; his blouse was thin and the ground hard and chill. He awoke and sat up shivering.

The skies had cleared, and a million stars threw their white light down over the hills, the ribbon of dusty yellow road, the camp where the torches had burned out, where traders and beasts lay sleeping.

And as Philip looked, out of a pass came filing small dark ponies, with riders lying low against their necks, moving down toward the road with swift, sinister purpose.

"Robbers!" the boy gasped.

There was no time for thought. Quick as a flash he sped down the hillside, and stood among the sleepers.

"Awake! Be quick!" he cried. "Robbers!"

Startled, the traders sprang to their feet, seizing spears, lances, arrows with cries of defiance. And the dark ponies, so nearly upon them, whirled and were off, swift as the winds, to the cover of their caves.

"By all the gods, a close call!" roared the leader. "And how comes it that a slip of a lad is abroad at night, watching, while careless sluggards sleep? Speak up, boy. Who art thou?"

"My name is Philip," said the boy. "Jericho is my home. I am on my way to Jerusalem."

"Alone?"

"Nay," hesitating for an instant, then going on. "With my sister, who is but a babe—a blind babe. I take her to the Holy City, to be healed by the Nazarene."

A shout of derision greeted this speech.

"The Nazarene! Thou hast faith in him, then. But where is thy father that he looks not after his children, but lets them out on the road alone?"

"My father is dead, and my uncle believes not in the Nazarene. But I shall take my little sister and I shall find him and she shall see," declared Philip.

It was a bold speech, but it caught the fancy of the men and again the night rang with their laughter. "By Zeus, a fine lad, and a clever one!" spoke the leader. "What say, men? Shall he ride with us on his holy pilgrimage?"

"Let him come. A fair exchange for his service," they chorused.

"Then bring thy sister, boy. Though we be what thy pious kinsmen call heathens, we will do better by their lad than they have done."

IT WAS a marvelous journey, along the road where camps were awaking to life, where fires burned, and men and women, boys and girls tramped and sang, where every one was bent on hastening to Jerusalem. A pageant of wonder and delight. Yet not for an instant did Philip lose sight of his quest—to find the Nazarene. When they came out at last on a slope overlooking the Holy City, the Temple, the stream of pilgrims all making their way up to the gates, he asked but one question, looking up trustfully at the dark, bold face above him. "Dost think he will be among those who go up there?"

"What should I know of thy Nazarene?" scoffed the man. Yet his keen eyes searched the crowd until he bent and shouted to a motherly-looking woman who stood at the edge of the road. "Dost know one called the Nazarene? Here is a lad of thy race who searches for him with such zeal as few men display. Canst help him with his little blind sister?"

His shrewd eyes had chosen wisely, for the woman answered: "Yes, I know where the Master abides this week. Let the lad down, and I will show him where he may see him."

"Then down with thee, my boy, and may all thy gods be with thee," said the man, bringing his camel to its knees.

4 out of 5
now lose

The law of averages is immutable. Dental statistics prove that four out of every five over 40—and thousands younger, too—are marred by Pyorrhea. Do you want to escape?

It takes healthy gums to keep healthy teeth

If you neglect your gums—let them get in a "run-down" condition—you may soon be numbered among Pyorrhea's countless victims.

Bleeding gums are Nature's first warning. Then the gums begin to recede, lose that rich, healthy pink color. Poisons collect in pus pockets and often drain through the entire system, causing indigestion, anaemia, rheumatism and other serious diseases of mid-life. In the final stages the teeth loosen and fall out.

Take no chances—use Forhan's

If used in time and used consistently, Forhan's will prevent Pyorrhea, or check its progress—something ordinary tooth pastes are powerless to do. It contains just the right proportion of Forhan's Astringent (as used by the dental profession in the treatment of Pyorrhea). It is safe, efficient and pleasant tasting. Even if you don't care to discontinue your favorite dentifrice, at least start using Forhan's once a day.

Forhan's is more than a tooth paste; it checks Pyorrhea. Thousands have found it beneficial for years. For your own sake ask for Forhan's For the Gums. All druggists, 35c and 60c in tubes.

"There is no God, save one, and He is Jehovah," answered Philip. "But with all my heart do I thank thee, and in my prayers will I never forget thee."

"Then to my credit there is one good deed," declared the man, and the band rode on, leaving Philip staring at the strange scene about him, with his heart madly beating.

"My little sister hath been blind from birth," he faltered. "But he can heal her, it I can but find him, and get near enough so that he may see us."

"He heeds the smallest child," said the woman. "There hath never been another like unto him. He is the Messiah, of that my heart is sure. Come with me out on the road toward Bethany, where the crowd is less dense."

A little way they walked, picking their steps among a seething mass, until they came out on a road where there was less confusion and they could walk easily, though even here the way was lined with those who seemed to await something.

"'Tis the Nazarene they look for," the woman said. "Every day, wherever he goes, they seek him. But what means this?"

For the sound of music came up from the road behind them. A mass of singers was advancing, waving green branches and chanting:

"Blessed be the King that cometh in the name of the Lord.
Peace in Heaven and glory in the highest!"

On they came and the chant grew into a roar. All along the way the people joined them, stripping branches from the trees, leaping and laughing and shouting:

"Hosanna! Hosanna! Blessed be the son of David!"

"Look!" cried the woman with Philip. "He comes. Yonder on the white colt."

She caught the boy's hand in her own, and they ran up the road where the crowd was closing in on every hand, jostled and pushed and shoved here and there, yet managing somehow to keep in the center of the smooth road, down which the snow-white colt was coming. Philip's eyes were smarting, his heart pounding, a feeling of suffocation tore at his throat, almost his courage failed. Yet still he ran, and still the child in his arms clasped his neck tightly and laughed at his running.

"Hosanna! Hosanna! Hosanna!" The cries grew louder. Branches flew through the air now. Palms and sweet-scented balsams. Roses, too, and lilies. The air was full of them. Philip caught at a great red blossom and thrust it into Rhoda's hand.

"Hold it tightly, my beauty. Wave it, high up. Wave it again! He may see and heed thee."

PHILIP was swept to the side of the road as the crowd parted and a man on a snow-white colt rode among them while flowers rained at his feet and shouts rent the air. A man with a sad, patient, tender face; a man who smiled with a pathos greater than any sob, who rode with a kingly dignity which was yet humble and infinitely meek. And in the heart of Philip, as he gazed upon him, grew a great longing, a great love, a great passion of faith.

"Master," his voice rang out in an agony of supplication, "Master, wilt only look?"

There was a hush as the Master lifted his hand and looked over the heads of those who pressed closest, straight down into the eyes of the boy, who held his little sister high and spoke no word save with his trustful pleading gaze.

For an instant they stood thus, the slim, straight lad, the laughing child, waving the huge red rose, the Master. Then, while the crowd fell back, he beckoned the children near, bent, took the baby's offered rose, laid a caressing hand on her soft curls and rode on again, the crowd breaking forth in new hosannas.

On trailed the throng, their shouts growing fainter, fainter, the noise of their passing fading into the distance. But in the dust of the yellow road knelt a little lad who laughed and sobbed and hugged to his heart a child—a child with round, wondering, seeing eyes, as clear and sparkling as the morning stars.

know it. I'm sorry you found out about the sewing, if it worries you, but it'll keep us along till I can get a school. After I get a school everything will be all right."

"James Carter is a good man. Your father liked him."

Kitty sighed. "Yes, but he's got clammy hands, and he's always giving that little affected cough, and he's careful of his health—I can't stand him!"

"Perhaps you prefer this country jay who just left us. All you'd need to do would be to encourage him."

"Perhaps I would. Anyway, he didn't have clammy hands, and he's rather good-looking in a hard, dark way. And he was kind. Jim never would have mowed that much grass for me. He'd have been afraid of getting overheated out in the sun and perhaps catching cold."

"You're a wicked girl. You take nothing seriously."

"I don't dare take things seriously. Come in, mother, and I'll make your tea."

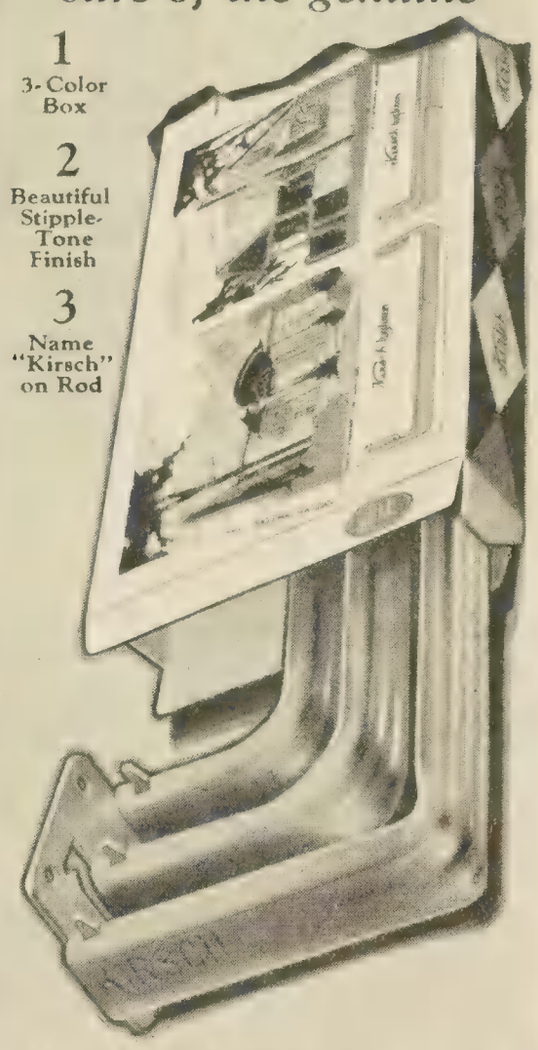
AS KITTY made the tea her thoughts followed Alec Bard. She was aware of her effect on him even before her mother defined it, and it flattered her, made a slight amused distraction in her tense privations. She had had plenty of beaus in those old days of peace and plenty, had dressed and danced and flirted, but her father's sudden death, her mother's weakness, the overwhelming revelation of their poverty loosed her desire to keep men dangling. Only Jimmy Carter—she shrugged him out of her thoughts. That straight, dark, embarrassed farmer was better than Jimmy. At least he was strong. How he had made the old lawn-mower go! She felt a rush of gratitude well up within her.

It would have pleased and heartened him mightily if he had known how he figured in her thoughts. She was in his—nay, she was—his thoughts. He did not bother with the tractor, nor with his other town errands. He climbed into his car and went home in a numb mood, part bewilderment, part longing. He had discovered that there was something still to want, something to need, to strive for—and with no assurance of getting it. Always before he knew that he would be successful. He knew that he was land-wise, market-wise. He knew that he had a way with cattle, a way with trees. But he did not know that he had a way with women.

His mood made him slight Elvira's supper, and the negress watched him shrewdly. "Yo' feelin' po'ly, Mist' Alec?" she asked.

"No—I'm all right." He was restless under her eyes. So she was silent.

He looked at his house and found it bare and rough, unsuited to a gentle lady with a blue dress and blue eyes, white hands and soft laughter. Hitherto he had thought if very good indeed. He wondered what was in that tumbling Pratt mansion. Gleam of silver, dark, stately old chairs fit for ladies and gentlemen, portraits of ladies and gentlemen on the walls. Of course he could refurnish, he could buy fine things in the Baltimore shops—but they would not be the same as the Pratt treasures.



As the week advanced, he grew more impatient, short-tempered. On Wednesday he could not endure the farm work any more. He picked a quart of the biggest, reddest strawberries and put green leaves at the corners. Then he dressed himself in his best and went to town, and straight to the Pratts. But he did not go to the front door, because he was afraid of seeing Mrs. Pratt again, with her sharp, condescending glance, her assured superiority. No, he went straight around to the back and met, by the greatest of good

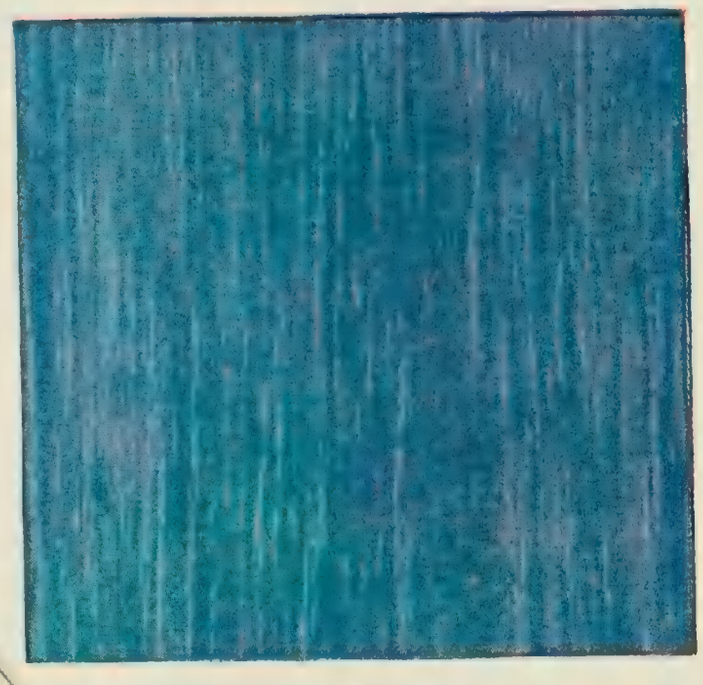
Beautiful new floor designs that will last a lifetime

They offer a real opportunity to the woman who needs new floors

HERE are four new floor designs — the same kind that interior decorators are using in planning modern color schemes.



In design and color these are striking examples of the present trend toward charm and vivacity in floors. The picture in the center shows how a decorator has used color in the floor to give spaciousness and dignity to the entrance hall, and to give a more tasteful background for the living-room rug.

Yet floors like these may be laid in old homes as readily as in new ones. Instead of refinishing or repainting an old wooden floor, a new floor of color and charm can be selected and laid in any home quickly and without dust, litter, or great expense.

And it will last as long as the house itself.

While this is a small entrance hall the tile floor gives it a fine dignity. The design is Armstrong's Marble Inlaid No. 71, laid with a border of black linoleum. Looking through into the living-room you see a floor of Armstrong's gray Jaspé No. 15.

One of the famous Armstrong Jaspés, or two tone patterns. This one (No. 18) is a rippling soft blue effect that makes a beautiful floor for any room. Can be laid with or without a border or can be used as a border for a pattern floor.

See these new designs at good stores

Have you an old floor that must be relaid? You really should see the new patterns and colors of Armstrong's Linoleum which good merchants can show you. If you are planning to redecorate any room in your house, or if you have old floors that you would like to make over into lovely new ones, be sure to write to our Bureau of Interior Decoration. Your letter will be answered by an experienced decorator who will suggest color schemes for any room or group of rooms you will describe. No charge.

Why these floors are so satisfactory

The idea of using Armstrong's Linoleum as a fine floor for fine rooms came about this way: Many years ago it was discovered that inlaid linoleum does not wear out.

But tacking linoleum directly to wood is not a permanent or artistic way to lay it. A better way to lay linoleum was needed.

It was found that the best way to lay a linoleum floor was to cement it in place over a lining of heavy builders' deadening felt. This way the seams were closely joined, and by using waterproof cement along all seams and around the edges a smooth, permanent, warm, dust-proof floor resulted.

Next came the idea of prettier linoleum designs Many new and beautiful effects were brought out in Armstrong's Linoleum.

Decorators saw that a floor of Armstrong's Linoleum was a better background for fine fabric rugs Using the color of the floor as a basis for their color schemes they were able to work out color harmonies in which the floor was actually a part of the room and not the one place where so many decorative plans stopped short.

The floor of linoleum never needs refinishing It should be waxed occasionally, and under this treatment it actually gets better-looking.

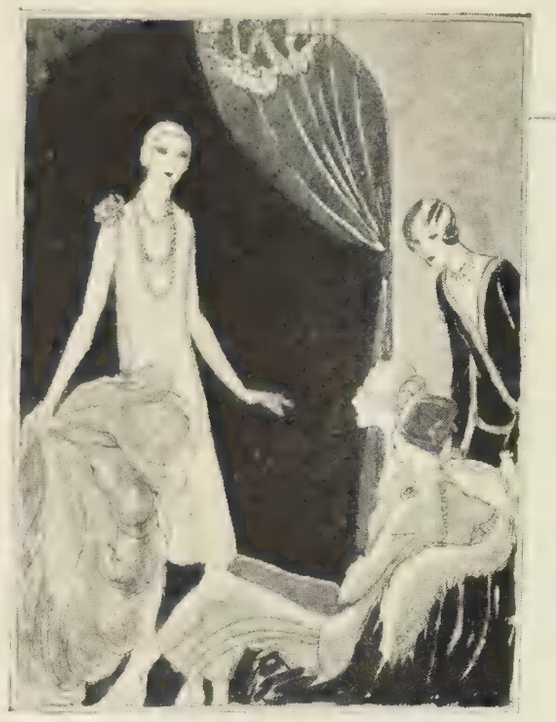
One of the new designs in Armstrong's Moulded Inlaid No. 5431. The colors go clear through to the burlap back.

Armstrong's Marble Inlaid No 70, an interesting alternative for the design in the illustration. For formal rooms. The blocks in the design are 6 inches square.

A new book on the art of furnishing and decorating homes

By Agnes Foster Wright

Mrs. Wright is a contributor to House and Garden and other magazines you read. She is an authority on home furnishing and decoration. Her new book, "Floors, Furniture, and Color," will be sent to anyone in the United States for 25 cents. Armstrong Cork Company, Linoleum Division, 865 West Walnut St., Lancaster, Pennsylvania.



Look for the CIRCLE A trademark on the burlap back

This is a printed linoleum—the most inexpensive grade of linoleum, yet beautiful, as you can see. It will give very satisfactory service. The pattern is No. 8287. Your merchant can show you many others.

THIS is the time of year when the whole world turns to Paris. Eager to see—to discuss—to report—the openings which will dictate for the next six months what women are going to wear!

Behind the doors of the dressmakers months of preparation have come to a climax.

Models have posed for hours—designers have built and destroyed, draped and redraped, worked in the frenzy of creation until the collections were complete.

Now those famous doors that face the Rue de la Paix and the Avenue de l'Opéra, are opening to the select who have been invited to view the new styles.

On the Avenue de l'Opéra itself is the Paris branch of the fashion house which brings this news to your very sewing-table.

Butterick's fashion experts have the entrée to the couturiers and attend all the important openings—they hurry the latest sketches, photographs and fashion news to the house of Butterick in New York.

From Paris, they go everywhere—they see what is being worn in the south—they visit fashion centers like Biarritz and the Riviera.

Fresh over the cables comes the news to this great New York house—to the array of Butterick artists and designers who incorporate each fresh development in their designs.

And with this wealth of style authority also comes a unique pattern service—the Deltor. From the very first step it explains how to make your frock.

First, the Deltor shows you how to cut from an amazingly small amount of material because it gives an individual layout for your size pattern, laid out on your actual width of material—something other patterns fail to give you. Even the smartest fabrics and color combinations are suggested.

Then you will find the Deltor illustrations show you step by step how to put your frock together. And each detail of finishing is so fully illustrated and described that you can achieve the meticulous finish of a real French model. With every Butterick Pattern the Deltor—the only pattern service that gives all this to you—is enclosed. Butterick of New York, Paris and London.

Butterick is the Only Pattern which gives you—

1 Complete list of the smartest materials and combinations of materials suitable for the design.

2 Complete cutting layouts, for your size pattern and the view you have selected, from your identical width of goods.

3 Complete illustrated directions showing you how to put your frock together.

4 Complete illustrated directions for the details of finishing and trimming which give your frock the authentic French touch.

luck, Kitty Pratt coming from the kitchen door, a bundle of sewing in her hand. She, too, was avoiding her mother, taking the work she had finished back to the dressmaker, Tillie Jenkins.

He snatched off his hat. "I reckon you're surprised to see me again," he said hurriedly, "but I couldn't get you out of my mind, you've got it so hard here. Isn't there something I could do for you?—maybe repairs around the house—anything, anything at all. I'd be pleased—and proud"—he was trembling and could hardly control his voice—"and look—will you accept this—please—" He held out to her the box of strawberries.

"Why—how very kind—" It was difficult to maintain a conventional tone, to pretend that there was nothing unusual in his speech, his manner. "Of course I'll accept them—you must have known how fond I am of strawberries. It was good of you to think of me——"

"And you—you'll let me do something—anything?"

"Now, Mr. Bard, of course I won't. I couldn't think of it. It would be too ridiculous. But I do thank you——"

He waved that aside. "I don't want thanks. I want—I want to do something for you."

Again she put the situation away from her. "I'll tell you what I wish you'd do," she said. "That's your car out there, isn't it? I wish you'd take me over to Second Street with this parcel. Would that be too much trouble?"

He managed to convey to her that he and his car were everlastingly at her service, he followed her out to it, he helped her in and knew the ecstasy of sitting beside her, with her arm almost touching his. Out of the corner of his eye he could see her clear profile, her fringing lashes. It was glorious. If only his car was not such a dirty old rattletrap! He would have washed it if he had known.

DURING the moment or two she spent at Tillie Jenkins' he conjured a daring scheme. "I'll take you back home if you want," he said, "but it's such a nice day—why don't you come for a little ride in the country?"

Kitty Pratt had been doing buttonholes in linen sports dresses for two solid weeks in such times as she did not have to cook and wait on her mother. Her eyes and her spirit were worn and tired. All that she had had to look forward to, at the moment, was another two weeks of fine hemstitching, more trying than buttonholes. And here was an offered respite of leisure and sunshine and the sight of woods and fields.

"I'd love it!" she exclaimed. Then, with a return of caution, "but it must be a very short ride—I can't leave mother alone very long, you know."

They ran swiftly down the street, out and away. If only he could think of something to say to her, the right things, the things that would interest her! But he was tongue-tied and wretched. Happy, too, intensely, madly happy—but wretched. And he dared not say a word of either feeling.

The silence was oppressive. Kitty began to feel that she had been stupid to have jumped at this chance for a ride.

"Oh dear," she said at last, "this is Quaker meeting, isn't it! But it's so heavenly sweet to see the country again that I can't talk. I haven't been out all this Spring."

Alec Bard thought of her as a prisoner to that sharp-eyed, sharp-tongued old mother, and it distressed him. "I'd be pleased to take you riding every"—he had started to say every day, but checked himself—"every time I come to town, if you'd go," he said.

Kitty was sure now that she had been stupid. "Oh, that's awfully good of you, but I can't be away from mother so much."

At this Alec Bard was moved to reality. "I reckon she wouldn't want you to be out with me," he said. "She'd feel it was beneath you. And at that she'd be right. I'm not anything, I haven't got any grandfathers or blue blood or anything like that. I was born in a poorhouse, and there's no telling who my mother or my father was. My mother come there, sick, from tramping the roads, and she never did rouse up to say even so much as her name. She died the day I was born. I lived in the poorhouse till I was eight or nine, and then I run off with a dog and pony show. And then—I did most everything. I got with a circus, after a while. And then, because I was handy with my fists, I was in the ring a while. But always I kept hankering to get out on the land. My mother must've been a farm girl, for she marked me with the craving for it. Most every Spring I'd go tramping through the country, and it was one of them times that I come through here. I'd done pretty well in the ring that Winter and saved some money, and it was with that money I paid the first cash on my farm. There—I never told as much as that to any living human before. And you know me now. I'm nothing, from nowhere. Even my name's just something the poorhouse people stuck on me."

There was a harsh, passionate silence. "Why did you tell me all this?" asked Kitty Pratt at last gently.

"I wanted you to know it. I wanted you to know exactly what I am."

She did not know how best to answer his autobiography, but she knew that the conversation had better be taken away from the personal at once.

"Look at the pink honeysuckle," she said, seizing the first excuse. "Do stop and let me get some. I love it."

"I'll get it for you," he said instantly, and was out of the car and up the bank in a moment.

When he brought the flowers back to her, she thanked him prettily and declared that they must turn back. "Mother won't know what's become of me."

"A little farther on there's a patch of bird's-foot violets."

"Don't tempt me, for I ought to go home now. I'm sorry."

Alec Bard made no further demur, but turned the car. She talked with determined casualness all the way home, for she felt that if she paused for a moment—well—there was no telling what this strange creature would say. At her gate she dismissed him easily.

"You've given me a delightful hour," she assured him; and was relieved when he said good-by and shook hands naturally and made no reference to coming again.

"I certainly was a ninny to go," she told herself, as she went in the house. "And yet—he tickled my vanity. I'm pleased because he's so taken with me. Well, I am. Any woman would be. Only—I mustn't let it go too far."

IN THE meantime Alec Bard was downtown buying a new car, a smart sedan, dark-blue lined with gray, cushioned, fitted. If Kitty Pratt ever rode with him again, he need not be ashamed. Now no one in town had a better-looking car—or a more expensive. Even that sour old mother of hers couldn't look down her nose at his car.

He went home elated. She had accepted his gift, she had ridden beside him, she had heard his story and she had not been scornful or pitying.

Three days later when he went to town he took a cluster of bird's-foot violets, droll and sweet in their two colors, their mocking little yellow tongues. And he picked another basket of strawberries, scarlet, perfect.

This time he was not fortunate. She was sitting on the veranda between her mother and a young man. Alec Bard saw this bodyguard, stopped dismayed, angry.

Kitty was somewhat dismayed herself, but she was friendly as before. "Come up and sit down," she said hospitably, and then, noting his gift: "You brought these for me? Why, that was good of you." She turned to the others. "Mother, I think you've met Mr. Bard. And perhaps you know Mr. Carter."

James Carter proffered a flabby hand, and winced under the fierce grip Alec Bard gave it. The movement gave Alec courage enough to sit down.

"Are you still buying town houses, Mr. Bard?" asked old Mrs. Pratt with malice. "I've not changed my mind about keeping ours."

She thus deliberately spat upon him, wiped her feet on him, tried to blot him out, but she failed. "I've not bought anything yet," Alec Bard answered deliberately. "I'm waiting till you do change your mind."

James Carter, quite unaware of the stabs that had been exchanged, began to tell an aimless story of a purchaser who waited two

Cool and smooth . . with graceful finger tips

With this simple manicure, their shapely grooming is assured

These hands can be Yours

When your hands are cool and smooth with finger tips graceful from a perfect manicure—you actually love them. They are so pretty and respond so flatteringly to every need, every fleeting thought.

Thousands of women know it is easy to keep them that way. For the maker of Cutex has foreseen every need for the perfect grooming of the finger tips.

If the cuticle is not properly cared for the nails never can be lovely. Dry or coarsened cuticle, little red hangnails, make an ugly rim that cannot be disguised.

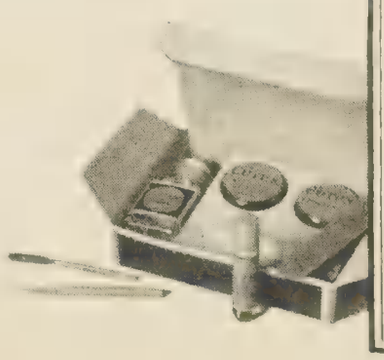
Never cut the cuticle. First wash the hands and dip the end of a Cutex orange stick in the bottle of Cutex Cuticle Remover. Twist a bit of cotton about the end; dip it in the bottle again and gently shape the base of each nail, working under the cuticle edge. Every little white shred of hard skin is loosened and the cuticle rim freed from the nail. Rinse the fingers and wipe each nail. All the old dead skin and the ugly little shreds wipe away.

What lovely fresh cuticle is left—how soft and evenly it outlines the nail base! A touch of the orange stick still wet with Cutex under each nail tip leaves it white and stainless, ready for the polish.

As a finish for this manicure, the deep rose petal coloring, the jewel-like brilliance of Cutex Liquid Polish will delight you, or if you prefer, Cutex has equally good Powder, Cake and Paste Polishes.



Glance at your watch! This exquisite Cutex manicure has taken hardly more than five minutes. What a feeling of added poise and security you have when you finish it. You are proud to display your hands—they look so graceful and the nails are positively bewitching.

Complete Cutex manicure sets from 60c to $5.00 at any drug or department store in the United States or Canada or at chemist shops in England. Each separate item is 35c.

Is this the End of Falling Hair and Baldness?

Hollow nipples feed the lotion directly to the hair follicles as you massage

4 in 7 Bald at 40

—91% needlessly, Investigation Shows!

Our experience shows falling hair and baldness most always due to Infected Scalp Oil (Sebum). Now usually overcome. Hair actually grown on 91 heads in 100.

Written Guarantee to Grow Hair

This is a direct offer to grow hair on your head. An offer backed by written guarantee, given by your own drug or department store. If we fail, it costs you nothing. Over 600,000 women have made this test in the last three years.

Science has recently made amazing discoveries in hair treatment. We have proven that while 4 in 7 are either bald or partly bald, at 40, only about nine in a hundred need ever be bald. Hair roots seldom die from natural causes. They can be revived. We have proved this by regrowing hair on 91 heads in 100.

Highest authorities approve this new way.

Remember, it is guaranteed.

The guarantee is positive, and promptly met. You are the judge. Your own drug or department store gives it with each 3-bottle purchase. Go today to any drug or department store, ask for the Van Ess Treatment.

Orders from outside U. S. A. will be filled direct from Van Ess Laboratories, 144 E. Kinzie St., Chicago, Ills. Foreign orders must enclose postal money order at rate of $1.50 per bottle.

Note This New Way—

It Massages the Treatment Directly into the Follicles of the Hair

You can see from illustration that Van Ess is not a "tonic." You do not rub it in with your fingers. Each package comes with a rubber massage cap. The nipples are hollow. Just rub your head, and the nipples automatically feed lotion down into follicles of the scalp. It is very easy to apply. One minute each day is enough.

years to buy a profitable corner, and then was taken sick with influenza and couldn't go to the sale. While he was talking Alec Bard had been looking at him, taking in every detail of his easy flannels, his silk shirt, his well-made, polished brown shoes and clocked stockings. Even his hair-cut—hating him, but not ashamed to learn from him— But Kitty was speaking to him.

"That's not the same car you had the other day."

"No, I got a new one. I'd like to show it to you."

"You chaps on the land, you get everything," said James Carter, in humorous complaint. "I don't believe there's a farmer in the county who hasn't got his car, and maybe two. As for us poor lawyers—we've got to depend on shank's mare."

Kitty was amused to see that Alec Bard paid no attention to James. He kept his eyes on her, expectant. Would she go out and look at his car? He was waiting.

"We'll all go," she said, and rose.

James went willingly, but Mrs. Pratt delicately adjusted her lace shawl. "I prefer to remain seated," she remarked cuttingly. "I'm not interested in automobiles."

While James Carter exclaimed over the car, Alec watched Kitty. Did she know he had bought it for her to ride in? Did she guess? He could not tell, but silently he informed her of it, with all the power of his mind and will. "This is yours, I got it for you, and you alone," he kept thinking to her. "I would get you everything. I would take you out of this decay and poverty and underpaid work. I would give you everything I have."

Even when he had to say good-by and see her stroll up toward the house beside James's unheroic figure he could not be sure that she had understood. There was a glint in those blue eyes of hers, amused, wise. But she hadn't made a sign.

The new car sprang down the street, and Alec suddenly laughed aloud. It was his first mirth since he had met her. Why, this was a game—a game to play, win or lose. Now, when he got some new clothes— Damn that barber for shaving his neck!

He spent the next three days and much money in Baltimore, and returned so metamorphosed that Elvira had difficulty in recognizing him.

"Yo' sure puttin' on style, Mist' Alec," she commented dryly. "Who goin' wash dem silk shirts, hey? Too fine foh my rough ole hands."

"I reckon you can do it if you put your mind on it," answered Alec, as dryly as she. He knew Elvira perfectly.

He hoped that there would be no one at the Pratt home when he called in his new finery, no one except Kitty. To his amazement the quiet street was filled with cars and carriages, black, dismal. A hearse stood before the entrance and for one cold moment he thought Kitty might have died. The undertaker's driver enlightened him. "It's the old lady—yes, she went three days ago. They're just starting the service now. Go right along in."

So his first entrance inside Kitty's home was for her mother's funeral.

AFTER the funeral and burial Alec Bard went at once to the undertaker's. The business there was soon settled. "I'll pay for everything," he said. "Miss Pratt wishes me to do so." The man was surprised, but relieved. There are no prying questions to be asked of ready cash.

Later he went to the Pratt house and waited to see Kitty in the dreary parlor. He had intended to come to her so grandly, to show himself as a man of the world, a man of her world. But he had forgotten all about his new clothes, his style.

She came in slowly, still holding up her head, but with defeat and daze in her eyes.

"If every one would only go and leave me alone," she said. "I only want to be alone. They keep staying, they think they're kind."

"I'll only stay a moment."

"I didn't mean you. Mother's friends"—she nodded back toward the rooms behind. "They didn't come when she was alive—they might better leave me alone now. They talk—and talk."

"I've paid the undertaker for you. You haven't got that to worry you."

"I'll pay it back as soon as I can, Mr. Bard. Oh, I must get to work now. I couldn't do much while mother—she hated it so. It was so quick, Mr. Bard. She was sitting looking at me, and—her head fell back—and that was all." The strain was breaking.

"You needn't ever pay it back. All I want is to do something for you."

The feeling of death and decay in the room was beaten down before his love.

Kitty Pratt stared at him and tried to collect her thoughts. It had been such a hideous three days, and she had been so desperately alone. But now there was some one with her.

"I love you," said Alec Bard desperately. "I love you more than any man ever loved any woman. I'm crazy with loving you. Let me take care of you. I can do it."

Kitty Pratt stared at him still. "Why, yes, I believe you can," she said half to herself, realizing him, his strength, his power.

"You marry me, not that flabby Carter. He's no kind of a man or he'd never have let things come to such a bad pass with you. You marry me. It's not just love I can give you—I'd understand you, I'd look out for you, there'd be easy ways and plenty for you. Whatever you wanted I'd see that you got it."

"That's a queer way to make love," said Kitty Pratt.

"My love's not like other men's. Look—if you marry me, and don't like it, if I don't do what I've said, I'll set you free. I swear it to you by God above."

"Do you mean that? Or is it just big talk?"

"You know it's not. You know I mean it."

"But it's all so strange—why you should fall in love with me," began Kitty Pratt wearily. And by that Alec Bard knew he had won her.

He took her hands, both her hands, and kissed them. He had seen the gesture in the films, and it had seemed to him ridiculous. But now he found it sublime.

SO THE thing was settled, in spite of the nine days wonder, the protests of friends. She was not at all sure that she wanted to marry him when she searched her heart, but all her life she had done the accepted thing, and some spark within her, legacy of some daredevil Pratt ancestor, flared urgently at the prospect of yielding for once to the unexpected. Moreover, there was the compulsion that Bard put upon her with his affection. It drew her more than she knew.

They were married three weeks and two days after her mother's funeral, in the great parlor, with no one present save the minister and his wife and a sniffling old woman who had been a friend of Mrs. Pratt's. Kitty took off her black and wore a thin white dress. She could not, she felt, be married in stifling folds of crêpe. Her white dress was old, but at least it had about it something of the air of a bride. Alec had sent to Baltimore for the most incongruous elaborate bouquet—a round monster of wired roses and lilies-of-the-valley, with bow and streaming flower-decked ends of silvery gauze. And he brought her two rings, a diamond that had cost him a thousand dollars and a platinum band starred with tiny diamonds for a wedding-ring. His lavishness amused and dismayed her, but he would not be denied of it.

"The house out on the farm," he told her, "is very plain and poor. You can change it any way you want. I would do it myself, but perhaps you'd rather not. I hate to have you come into it the way it is."

"I don't mind—anything," she said. "I'm so tired."

Instead of tired, she meant terrified. Now that she had made her decision, she was conscious that it was a far swing to the unknown, a distance that chilled and frightened her. So she was still and aloof from him, and that, in turn, terrified him.

But once the wedding was over and she was established in the farmhouse, she was reassured. The quiet, the peace, the ordered lavish growth about her pleased her, and between her and Elvira there was a quick understanding.

Kitty had taken with her—her only dowry—part of the furnishings of the old house in town, and these she placed and arranged, made curtains, hung pictures. And because there was sunshine in the rooms, the old mahogany and silver, even the old portraits,

Are you trying to acquire someone's else type of beauty?

IT is one of the commonest mistakes in the whole matter of skin beauty—this attempt to imitate some other woman's attractiveness—some woman of perhaps an entirely different type.

It simply cannot be done, and thousands of permanently ruined complexions are witness to the damage women can do their skin by treatments that promise too much. The skin needs not cosmetics and complicated preparations but merely a mild cleansing agent that will release and preserve its own normal health and glow.

Resinol Soap is ideally cleansing and refreshing. Its gentle action thoroughly rids the pores of dust, soot, germs, etc., which interfere with their normal activity, and mean ruin for the complexion.

Its rich color and distinctive fragrance come naturally from the healthful Resinol properties it contains—those properties which are causing Resinol Soap more and more to take the place of the ordinary, highly perfumed soap whose strong odor is only too often a cloak for mediocre quality and harmful ingredients. Buy a cake of Resinol Soap from your druggist, and begin today to give your skin a chance to restore its own natural beauty.

If your complexion is now marred by blackheads, blotches, roughnesses, etc., apply Resinol and see how quickly it clears them away. This soothing, healing ointment has been successfully prescribed for years for skin disorders. Itching rashes, slight or serious, chafings, or the smart of a burn, cut or sore quickly respond to its first application. No home should be without it.

——— and threw her razor away!

IN THIS WAY the New York World summarizes the recent excellent comment given ZIP by the Federal Trade Commission's Trial Examiner:

"Uncle Sam Pronounces HAIR REMOVER (ZIP) O.K."

"Gone To Stay Gone!"

"The climax came," says the New York World, "when one woman, described as a 'prominent Long Island society matron' took the stand and testified she had been afflicted with such a heavy beard that she had to shave four times a week. Then she tried the preparation (ZIP) and threw her razor away. These fair witnesses offered their complexions to the judge in proof of their assertions. They said they testified simply out of gratitude."

Thousands of other women today are grateful for what ZIP has done for them.

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR

is absolutely unnecessary and is as uncleanly as it is odious. In earlier years, it was difficult to overcome. Today, the sight of superfluous hair marks one as careless and untidy for it is such a simple matter to destroy it—completely—with the roots.

"ZIPPED"—not clipped—is the secret of the perfect hair line and the beautiful neck. When you have your hair trimmed, demand a ZIP treatment back of the neck.

Make yourself more beautiful. Don't delay. If you have never used ZIP, you will marvel in its magic. Fragrant, painless, harmless and easy to use at home, it is pronounced by experts as the scientifically correct method.

lost their look of gloom and formed an interior of dignified cheerfulness. It all made Alec comfortable—and yet uncomfortable. And he could hardly realize that Kitty was his wife.

He redoubled his efforts to please her. She must have a riding-horse. She must go to Baltimore and have a habit made and buy a saddle of the finest. She must order silk dresses, hats and coats from the city, too. The new car was hers, and hers alone. Would she like a veranda built to the south, an enclosed veranda, a sort of sun-room? He had Elvira bring her niece to be Kitty's maid, against Kitty's own protest.

"But I don't need a maid. I've not got enough to do now. Elvira won't let me help her with the chickens or the milk, and as for cooking, she hasn't let me poke my nose into the kitchen."

"I didn't marry you to have you cook and do farm work," said Alec Bard.

"I sometimes wonder," said Kitty, "what you did marry me for. Was it just to make me an idle do-nothing? Be careful—I'm getting frightfully fat and lazy."

He could not meet this lightness. His love for her was pitiably dumb before the constant light of amusement in her eyes. He was almost afraid to speak before her, because he felt his speech shamed her.

"If you want to ask your friends out to supper—or anything," he suggested wistfully.

"Maybe—after a while," she said. "But in my mourning, Alec, and to tell the truth it's so good to have nothing to do, no anxiety, I'd like to bask in it a while."

All very well, but did she mean that? Wasn't it rather that she couldn't face her friends beside him, belonging to him?

YET now and then her friends did come, and he listened to them dumbly, quite outside their casual familiarity, with nothing to say to them. They made him uneasy—and he made them uneasy, too, with his silence, his dark, straight, well-dressed presence. They found there was nothing to laugh at about him, but he thought they ridiculed him secretly. While they were there and after they were gone he was achingly unhappy.

He cast about in his mind for something to do that would make her admire him, force her gratitude, and to this end he bought up the mortgages on her old home and deeded it to her.

He gave the deed to her carelessly. "Some time you might want this place," he said. "How would it be if you fixed it up and rented it, to a good tenant, who'd take care of it?"

"You shouldn't have done it!" she cried. "I didn't really care about it." Yet she was pleased and touched. It gave her another interest, for now she could consult carpenters, plumbers, painters, bring order and repair to the old shell. She asked Alec about how much she should spend.

"I'll do just enough to make it habitable and weather-tight," she said. "That oughtn't to cost so much."

"You go ahead and fix it right," he commanded magnificently. "Make it like it used to be, and add all the modern improvements. Then it'll be worth something. A lick and promise don't do property any real good that'll last."

So she went happily to work, driving in and out of town in the new car, finding the importance of the occupation exceedingly pleasant. The cost ran up and up, but she paid no attention. Perfectly simple and truthful herself about money, it did not occur to her that Alec's resources were less than he let them appear. She was serene under an avalanche of bills. She handed them over to Alec with the confidence of a child—only he did not see it as confidence. To him it was an almost malicious indifference.

She didn't love him, he thought. She took this way of showing him that she she didn't. She was going to get everything she could out of him, and then remind him of his

Nestle "LANOIL" Home Outfit for Permanent Waving

THE Nestle LANOIL Home Outfit does its work quickly, safely and comfortably wherever it goes.

Sent Everywhere on THIRTY DAYS' FREE TRIAL

IT is thrilling to see your straight hair, whether long or bobbed, transformed quickly into charming, soft waves, curls and ringlets that curl of themselves! Send for our free, interesting booklet.

An Outstanding Success

LET your straight hair be permanently wavy this Spring. Enjoy the relief and confidence which natural waves, curls and ringlets alone can give you. Sign your own Declaration of Independence from lifelong slavery to nightly crimpers and hot curling-irons. In other words, in your own home, let the eminent Mr. Charles Nestle's famous invention transform your hair—no matter how straight or stubborn—into waves, curls and ringlets that last ALL THE TIME, and look even prettier under the influence of perspiration, shampoos, bathing, dampness, etc.

Mr. Nestle's Wonderful LANOIL Discovery has enthusiastic endorsement from the world's leading scientists, hairdressers and beauty editors. In his two New York establishments several hundred women daily enjoy LANOIL waves. Professional LANOIL-wavers elsewhere give many thousands this wonderful treatment. But in private homes, even more than this is done by means of the dainty, reasonably-priced Outfit illustrated above, which works so simply, so quickly and so comfortably that mothers take pleasure in waving their children's hair, children their mother's; school girls, nurses and teachers club together to do this work, and even husbands have been known to take a hand in it!

Interesting, Simple and Safe is the Nestle LANOIL permanent waving process. You merely wet the hair with the sympathetic LANOIL lotion, wind it, strand by strand, on the Nestle mechanical curlers, slip the little heater over each curler for just seven minutes, remove, unwind and shampoo. And now the wonder grows—for the harder you rub, comb, wash or brush your waves and curls, the prettier do they become, because the gentle LANOIL steam has made your hair naturally wavy.

Each Nestle LANOIL Home Outfit Contains Free Trial Supplies

You may have our free, interesting booklet of further particulars if you like, but a trial of the Outfit itself is also free. Send a postal, letter or the coupon below, enclosing its $15 purchase price (or let us forward your Outfit C.O.D. and pay the postman when it arrives). Wave your hair with the free trial supplies, following the simple, clear directions. Then, if you are not delighted with your results and satisfied that the Outfit does ALL we represent, return it within thirty days—and we guarantee to refund immediately every cent of the $15 with absolutely no deduction for postage, packing, free trial materials or use of the Outfit.

Many thousands of Outfits have been sold on this liberal trial basis since September, 1922. They bring happiness wherever they go. So do not delay. Send for yours today, that you may the sooner know the joy, pride and comfort of waves, curls and ringlets that last ALL THE TIME.

What could be more tempting or healthful at this season than spinach?

No dish that we know of!

Spinach supplies us with almost every mineral salt that our bodies require. No other vegetable provides more healthful elements—none offers a finer spring tonic.

But DEL MONTE Spinach is not only good for us—it is good to eat—savory and full-flavored—for it's canned that way, with all its tenderness and fresh flavor preserved.

And what a delight to serve! Ready-cooked and free from grit—no tiresome washing—no slow preparation. The work has all been done.

You'll want spinach often this spring. But you'll want it at its best! Insist on DEL MONTE. Then you're always sure of the flavor and goodness you like.

promise that, if she didn't want to stay married to him, she needn't. Again he had no defense no barrier to shield himself.

He borrowed money at the bank, as much as he could. Some of the creditors he satisfied with notes—they knew his farm was good for it. He turned desperately to his crops—and now that it was too late he saw that they wouldn't be the record-breaking yields he had counted on. Everywhere, everything conspired to pull him down. He might—he might have put a mortgage on "No Man's Gift!" But this he would not do unless in the last ditch, for Kitty's signature, as his wife, would be required, and then she would know. That would be the final humiliation.

"MISS KITTY—Mist' Alec looks poo'ly," said Elvira warningly.

"I think so too, Elvira. He doesn't eat properly, he doesn't sleep. I've been after him to go to the doctor, but he won't."

"He got somep'n on his mind an' drug-sto' stuff ain't do him no good. He got somep'n after him, an' it gwine ketch him if he ain' keerful."

Kitty and Elvira exchanged a long, understanding look. Elvira lifted a lean hand and adjusted her turban. It was again tied in a voodoo knot. "You might do a little projeckin' 'roun', keerless like," she said in a tone of utter disengagement. "He'll never tell, no, not if he drop down dead. He's got a close mouf."

But she conveyed silently what every woman knows—that no man can hide anything from his wife that she wants to find out.

Slowly, and with patience, she unraveled his coil. Without a scruple she first went through his desk and then paid a visit to the bank. Patrick Hall, the president, had been a beau of her mother's, and remembered it gallantly. At every step of the way through the tangle something new and very sweet came to Kitty Bard. This queer, strange, silent man, who had seemed so strong, so assured, so sufficient and powerful, was after all capable of overwhelming folly. The more she saw the extent of his folly the more she wondered at it. And yet she divined its reason.

She said not one word to him until her final move was made. She was waiting for him on the new veranda—to the south—as he came from a final round of the stables.

"Here is something for you," she said, and exactly as he had handed her the deed to her old home she handed him a package—his canceled notes, his bills (all she could find) receipted, his bank loans marked paid.

He looked at them and did not understand, could not comprehend. He would not ask her, he would not even lift his head and look at her. "I suppose," he said at last, "you want to be free of me."

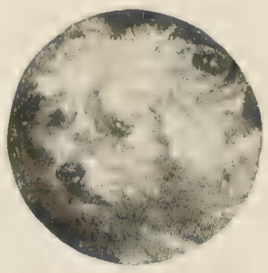
"And what made you suppose that?"

He fingered the papers in his hand and did not answer.

"You know, Alec," said Kitty quietly, "for a clever man you are such a silly! Why do you think I married you? For a place to go, for food, for clothes, for an automobile? Do you really set me down as cheap as that?"

"No, no—but I wanted to give you everything."

"You—you wanted to give me everything and take nothing. You've let me spend money hand over fist and not said a word when it was worrying you nearly to death. I've sold the house in town and that's done with. I got a good price for it, too—and everything's paid. And never, never, never do you do this again—it's not fair! 'No Man's Gift'—the very name of our farm—is you yourself, Alec. You pride yourself on it. Very well, so far as the rest of the world is concerned. But oh, not with me—not with your wife! What am I, if I can't give something, too, to you?"



There was something in her voice that he had never heard there, and it pierced him through with an almost painful joy.

"Kitty—Kitty, do you want to give me something?" he asked. For the first time he spoke to her as to an equal.

"Do I want to give you something! But how else can we live? Don't you see—don't you understand? Love can't be one-sided!"

"Love!" Then she loved him—she actually loved him. He looked up now, and saw that it was true—incredibly, perfectly true.

"HO-HUM," sighed one of the ironic gods to another, "I never did take much interest in that Bard case. I said from the first it would all turn out in the old-fashioned way. Now we've got to look around for somebody else to play with."

never dare to show one of them to Miss Royal. Was this outraged empress the writer of that friendly letter? It was impossible to believe it. She felt crude and bread-and-buttery and ignorant—and young! Oh, so horribly young!

In her misery she squirmed in her chair, and her little packet of manuscripts slipped to the floor. Emily stooped to retrieve it. At the same moment Chu-Chin made a flying leap at it. He caught the spray of violets hanging from Emily's hat and tore it loose. Emily let go of her packet and clutched her hat. Chu-Chin let go of the violets and pounced on the packet. Then, holding it in his mouth, he bolted out of the open glass door leading to the garden.

"Oh, what a relief it would be to tear my hair!" thought Emily violently.

That diabolical chow had carried off her latest and best story and a number of her choicest poems. Heaven knew what he would do with them. She supposed she would never see him again. But at least there was fortunately now no question of showing them to Miss Royal.

Emily no longer cared whether Miss Royal was in a bad humor or not. She was no longer desirous of pleasing her—a woman who would let her dog behave so to an invited guest and never reprove him! She even seemed to be amused at his antics. Emily was sure she had detected a fleeting smile on Miss Royal's arrogant face as she looked at the ruined violets scattered over the floor. There suddenly popped into Emily's mind a story she had heard of an old Blair Water Irishman who was in the habit of telling his wife, "When people do be after snubbing you, Bridget, pull up your lip, Bridget, pull up your lip."

Emily pulled up her lip. "A very playful dog," she said sarcastically.

"Very playful, indeed," agreed Miss Royal composedly.

"Don't you think a little discipline would improve him?" asked Emily.

"No, I do not think so," said Miss Royal meditatively.

Chu-Chin returned at this moment, capered about the room, knocked a small glass vase off a taboret with a whisk of his tail, sniffed at the ensuing fragments, then bounded up on the davenport again, where he sat panting, "Oh, what a good dog am I!"

Emily picked up note-book and pencil. "Mr. Towers sent me to interview you," she said.

"So I understand," said Miss Royal, never taking her eyes off her worshiped chow.

"May I trouble you to answer a few questions?"

"Charmed," said Miss Royal, with exaggerated amiability.

Chu-Chin, having saved enough breath, sprang from the davenport and rushed through the half-open folding doors of the dining-room. Emily consulted her note-book and recklessly asked the first question jotted therein. "What do you think will be the result of the presidential election this Fall?"

The best among 28 prize-babies

"Lawrence Baskin fairly radiates vitality and health," says the Canton (O) Daily News—sponsor of the baby contest in which this husky little lad won first prize as the most perfect boy baby. "Though but 15 months old, he looks almost twice that age, judging from his physique, which is rugged and heavy."

"Lawrence was raised exclusively on Borden's Eagle Brand Condensed Milk," writes his father, Mr. M. F. Baskin, 2174 E. 71st St., Cleveland, O.

Many like him

Many Eagle Brand babies have won such prizes, because Eagle Brand has the essential food properties for healthy growth.

If you cannot nurse your baby, or if he is not thriving on his present food, start him on Eagle Brand. Give him the sound foundation for life that every little prize winner has.

Eagle Brand is easily assimilated by even the most delicate baby stomach. It is just pure whole milk and sugar, combined by a special process that makes it exceptionally digestible, without affecting any of the food elements, not even the precious vitamins. Safe, clean, always the same—you can get Eagle Brand wherever you go.

"I never think about it," answered Miss Royal.

Emily with compressed lips wrote this down. Chu-Chin now reappeared, darted through the parlor and out into the garden, carrying a roast chicken in his mouth.

"There goes my supper," said Miss Royal dreamily.

"Is there any likelihood," demanded Emily, "that the United States Congress will look favorably on the reciprocity proposals of the Canadian Government?"

"Is the Canadian Government making reciprocity proposals?" asked Miss Royal absently. "I never heard of the reciprocity proposals."

Emily wrote, "She never heard of them."

Next she said: "Is it your opinion that the historical novel has had its day?"

"I always leave my opinions home when I take a holiday," replied Miss Royal languidly.

As Emily wrote this down, literally and savagely, Chu-Chin reentered, helped himself to one of Mrs. Royal's crocheted tidies, crawled under the piano with it, and fell to chewing rapturously.

"Dear dog!" said Miss Royal fervently.

"What do you think of chow dogs?" demanded Emily in sudden inspiration.

"The most adorable creatures in the world," said Miss Royal.

"So you've brought one opinion with you," thought Emily. Aloud—"I do not admire them."

Miss Royal smiled icily. "It is evident that your taste in dogs must be quite different from mine."

A large gray cat passed across the doorstep outside. Chu-Chin bolted out from under the piano, shot between the legs of a tall plant stand, and pursued the flying cat. The stand went over with a crash and a beautiful begonia lay in ruins on the floor.

"Poor Aunt Angela! Her heart will be broken," said Miss Royal.

"But that doesn't matter, does it?" said Emily.

"Oh, no, not at all," said Miss Royal.

Emily again consulted her note-book. "Do you find many changes in Shrewsbury?"

"I find a good many changes in the people. The younger generation does not impress me favorably," said Miss Royal.

Emily grimly wrote this down. Chu-Chin reappeared, evidently having chased the cat through a fresh puddle, and resumed his repast of the tidy.

EMILY shut her note-book and rose. Not for any number of Mr. Towers would she prolong the interview.

"Thank you, that will be all," she said, with a haughtiness quite equal to Miss Royal's. "I am sorry to have taken so much of your time. Good afternoon."

She bowed slightly and went out to the hall. Miss Royal followed her to the parlor door.

"Hadn't you better take your dog, Miss Starr?" she asked sweetly.

Emily paused in the act of shutting the outer door and looked at Miss Royal. "Pardon me?"

"I said hadn't you better take your dog?"

"My dog?"

"Yes. He hasn't quite finished the tidy, to be sure, but you might just as well take it along. It won't be much good to Aunt Angela now."

"He—he—isn't my dog," gasped Emily.

"Not your dog! Whose dog is he then?" asked Miss Royal.

"I thought he was yours your chow," said Emily.

Miss Royal looked at Emily for a moment. Then she seized her wrist, shut the door, drew her back to the parlor, and firmly pushed her down into the Morris chair. This done, Miss Royal threw herself on the muddy davenport and began to laugh—long and helplessly. Once or twice she rocked herself forward, gave Emily's knee two wild whacks, then rocked back and Maybe your teeth are gloriously clear, simply clouded with a film coat. Thousands have gleaming wonderful teeth without knowing it . . . you may be one. Make this remarkable test and find out.

"Off Color" Teeth

how to overcome them —give them dazzling whiteness

This simple, NEW method, removes the stubborn film that hides the natural beauty of your teeth

TEN years ago dull and dingy teeth were seen on every side. Today they are becoming a rarity. Note the gleaming smiles you see now wherever your eyes turn.

Please don't believe your teeth are "different"; that they are naturally off-color and dull. You can correct that condition remarkably in even a few days.

Modern science has discovered new methods of tooth protection and tooth beauty. Millions now employ them. Leading dentists advise them. In fairness to yourself, make the test offered here.

DO THIS—Remove that dingy film; it invites tooth troubles and ugliness

Run your tongue across your teeth, and you will feel a film.

That film is an enemy to your teeth. You must remove it.

It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It absorbs discolorations and gives your teeth that cloudy look. Germs by the millions breed in it, and they, with tartar, are a chief cause of pyorrhea.

Most tooth troubles and decay now are traced to this film. Old-time methods could not successfully combat it. That's why tooth troubles were on the increase, and ugly teeth the order of the day.

3 times daily— then note the difference

In Pepsodent dental science has discovered two effective film combatants. Their action is to curdle the film, then remove it.

Now what you see when that film is removed—the clearness and whiteness of your teeth—will amaze you.

Old methods of cleansing fail in these results.

Harsh gritty substances are judged dangerous to enamel.

Thus the world has turned, largely on dental advice, to this new method. It marks the latest findings in modern scientific research.

It will give you the lustrous teeth you wonder how other people get. It will give you better protection against tooth troubles. And, too, against gum troubles; for it firms the gums.

A few days' use will prove its power beyond all doubt.

Mail the coupon. A 10-day tube will be sent you free. Use it three times daily—morning, evening, at bed time—then note the remarkable difference in your teeth.

continued to laugh. Emily sat, smiling faintly. Her feelings had been too deeply harrowed to permit of Miss Royal's convulsions of mirth. Meanwhile, the white dog spied the cat again, and again rushed after her.

Finally Miss Royal sat erect and wiped her eyes. "Oh, this is priceless, Emily Byrd Starr—priceless. When I'm eighty, I'll howl over this. But who does own that brute?"

"I'm sure I don't know," said Emily demurely. "I never saw the creature in all my life before."

"Well, let's shut the door before he can return. And now, dear girl, sit here beside me—there's one clean spot here under the cushion. We're going to have a real talk now. Oh, I was so beastly to you when you were trying to ask me questions. I was trying to be beastly. But to think you took that horrid, curly, white creature for my glorious red-gold chow! I'll take you up to my room before you go, and you shall apologize to him. He is asleep on my bed. When I saw you coming up the walk with that dog frisking around you, of course I concluded he was yours. I had put on my favorite dress because it really makes me look almost beautiful, and I wanted you to love me. And when the beast muddied it all over and you never said a word of rebuke or apology I simply went into one of my cold rages. I do go into them—I can't help it. But I soon thaw out if no fresh aggravation occurs. In this case fresh aggravation occurred every minute. I vowed to myself that if you did not even try to make your dog behave I would not suggest that you should. And I suppose you were indignant because I calmly let my dog spoil your violets and eat your manuscripts? And your questions! Emily, you were too delicious. Did you really write down my answers?"

"Word for word. I meant to print them just so, too. Mr. Towers has given me a list of questions for you, but of course I didn't mean to fire them off point blank like that. I meant to weave them artfully into our conversation."

"But here is my aunt."

Mrs. Royal came in, smiling. Her face changed as she saw her begonia. Miss Royal interposed quickly.

"Dearest Aunty, don't weep or faint—at least not before you've told me who around here owns a white, curly, utterly mannerless, devilish dog."

"Lily Bates," said Mrs. Royal in a tone of despair. "Oh, has she let that creature out again? I had a most terrible time with him before you came. He's really just a big puppy, and he can't behave. I told her finally if I caught him over here again I'd poison him. She's kept him shut up since then. But now—oh, my lovely begonia!"

"I'll get you a new plant, Aunty darling. Think of all the fun you'll have coaxing it along."

"I'll settle Lilly Bates," said Mrs. Royal, marching out to look for a dust-pan.

"NOW, Emily dear, let's gab," said Miss Royal, snuggling down beside her. This was the Miss Royal of the letter. Emily found no difficulty in talking to her. They had a jolly hour, and at the end of it Miss Royal made a proposition that took away Emily's breath.

"Emily, I want you to come back to New York with me. There's a vacancy on the staff of our magazine. No great thing in itself—you'll be sort of general handy man, and all odd jobs will be turned over to you. But you'll have a chance to work up. And you'll be in the center of things. You can write—I realized that the moment I read your story in Roche's. You mustn't waste your life here. You must have a chance to grow and develop and be yourself. You must have the stimulus of association with great minds—the training that only a great city can give. Come with me."

Emily sat in a maze of bewilderment, too confused and dazzled to think clearly. She had never dreamed of this. It was as if Miss Royal had suddenly put into her hands a key to unlock the door into the world of all her dreams and hopes and imaginings.

"Oh, Miss Royal—I'd love to go—but I don't know if Aunt Elizabeth will let me. I live with her and Aunt Laura, you know—out at New Moon Farm. I'm only boarding with Aunt Ruth while I go to school. I'm afraid—I'm sure—Aunt Elizabeth will think I'm too young."

"Tell her you will live with me and I'll look after you. I never saw a young girl before that I wanted to live with. You have a sort of luminous personality, Emily Starr. You'll give off light in dull places and brighten drab spots. Come with me, my dear, and I will do all I can to help you."

"Thank you—thank you," was all Emily could say. Tears of gratitude for this ungrudging help and sympathy were in her eyes. She had not received too much of sympathy or encouragement in her life. It touched her deeply. She went away feeling that she must turn the key and open the magic door beyond which now seemed to lie all the beauty and allurement of life. If only Aunt Elizabeth would consent! But Emily was wofully sure she wouldn't.

Half-way home she suddenly stopped and laughed. After all, Miss Royal had forgotten to show her Chu-Chin.

"But it doesn't matter," she thought. "I'll see him often enough if I go to New York with Miss Royal."

Would she go to New York with Miss Royal? That was the question Emily had now to answer. Or rather, the question Aunt Elizabeth Murray of New Moon must answer.

And she had no real hope that Aunt Elizabeth would let her go. Emily might look longingly toward those pleasant, far-off green pastures pictured by Miss Royal, but she was quite sure she could never browse in them.

EMILY told Aunt Elizabeth Murray of Miss Royal's scheme when she went home to Blair Water that night. And Aunt Elizabeth surprized Emily.

"Would you like to go, Emily?"

"Yes—I think so—if you don't mind," faltered Emily.

"Well, you may decide for yourself," said Aunt Elizabeth. "We shall miss you—we would rather have you with us for a few years yet. I know nothing about New York. I am told it is a wicked city. But you have been carefully brought up. I leave the decision in your own hands. Laura, what are you crying about?"

Emily felt as if she wanted to cry herself. To her amazement she felt something that was not delight or pleasure. It was one thing to long after forbidden pastures. It seemed to be quite another thing when the bars were flung down and you were told to enter if you would. Emily thought very hard, all Saturday and Sunday. She continued to think hard all the following week, wondering why she did not at once write a joyous letter to Miss Royal, who had gone to visit friends in Charlottetown. Of course she would go. Wouldn't it be terribly foolish not to? She would never have such a chance again. It was such a splendid chance—everything made easy — success certain, speedy, brilliant. Why, then, did she have to keep telling herself all this? Why was she driven to ask Mr. Carpenter's advice the next week-end? Mr. Carpenter was the district school-teacher, and he did not help her much. He was rheumatic and cranky—told her to go—"it was an excellent chance to get Yankeefied." On her way home she met another special friend of hers—old Jock Kelly, the tin-pedler. She told him all about the matter—not without a full realization of Aunt Elizabeth's horror at the thought of a Murray—or half-Murray—asking old Jock Kelly's advice. She herself was a little ashamed of doing it. Old Kelly shook his head.

"What do the b'ys around here be thinking? But what does the ould lady say?"

"Aunt Elizabeth says I can do as I like."

"Then I guess we'll be laving it at that," said old Kelly—and drove off. Plainly no help was to be had in old Kelly.

"WHAT has got into me that I can't make up my own mind?" thought Emily desperately. "Why can't I say I'll go. Of course I'll go. I must go."

She said it fiercely, as if arguing against some invisible opponent. When she reached home in the twilight, no one was there and she went restlessly all over the house What charm and dignity and fineness the old rooms had, with their candles and their ladder-

Dangers of Constipation in Advancing Years

ELDERLY people are especially subject to constipation—with its train of headaches, sleeplessness, bilious attacks, etc. But at this period of life constipation presents an added danger—it brings on those diseases to which elderly people are liable. Kidney trouble, high blood pressure and heart disease, all are aggravated by constipation. Says a noted medical writer: "There is now a vast accumulation of evidence to show that the poisons produced in a constipated intestine are the cause of a multitude of destructive changes in the body, involving practically every organ, as well as being the cause of premature old age."

Necessity for Lubrication

After middle age the glands in the intestine whose work it is to supply a fluid to lubricate and soften the food waste become less active and do not produce sufficient of this lubricating fluid. Hence a lubricant is needed to keep the food waste soft and moving. The lubricant, Nujol, fills this need. Nujol is not a medicine and does not gripe. Unlike laxatives, which irritate and inflame the intestinal walls, Nujol simply lubricates and softens the food waste. Thus it insures internal cleanliness—regular and thorough evacuation.

Mothers! Protect the health of the older people and children in your care. See to it that internal cleanliness is maintained regularly, for only through internal cleanliness can health be preserved.

Millions of people are taking Nujol not only to overcome but to prevent constipation; because, like pure water Nujol is harmless. It may be taken as regularly as you wash your face and brush your teeth. Nujol is used in leading hospitals and recommended by physicians all over the world for people of all ages. Nujol makes internal cleanliness a habit—the healthiest habit in the world. For sale by all druggists. Made by Nujol Laboratories, Standard Oil Co. (New Jersey.)

HER DOG DAY

backed chairs and their braided rugs! How dear and entreating was her own little room with its diamond paper, its fat black rose-jar, and its funny kinky window-pane. Would Miss Royal's apartment be half so wonderful?

"Of course I'll go," she said again, feeling that if she could only have left out the "of course" the thing would have been settled at once.

She went out into the garden, lying in the remote passionless beauty of early Spring moonlight. From afar came the whistle of the Shrewsbury train—like a call from the alluring world beyond—a world full of interest, charm, drama. Should she not "take the current when it serves?"

How beautiful was this old garden! How beautiful was old New Moon Farm! Its beauty had a subtly romantic quality all its own. There was enchantment in the curve of the dark-red, dew-wet road beyond—remote, spiritual allurement in the lombardy poplars—magic in the orchard—a hint of intriguing devilment in the fir wood. How could she leave this old house that had sheltered and loved her—never tell me houses do not love!—the wide fields and haunted woods where her childhood dreams had been dreamed? All at once she knew she could not leave them—she knew she had never really wanted to leave them. That was why she had gone about desperately asking advice of impossible outsiders. She had really been hoping they would tell her not to go.

"I belong to New Moon—I stay among my own people," she said.

MISS Royal stared at Emily—realized in a moment that it was not the slightest use to plead or argue—but began to plead and argue just the same.

"Emily, you can't mean it? Why won't you come?"

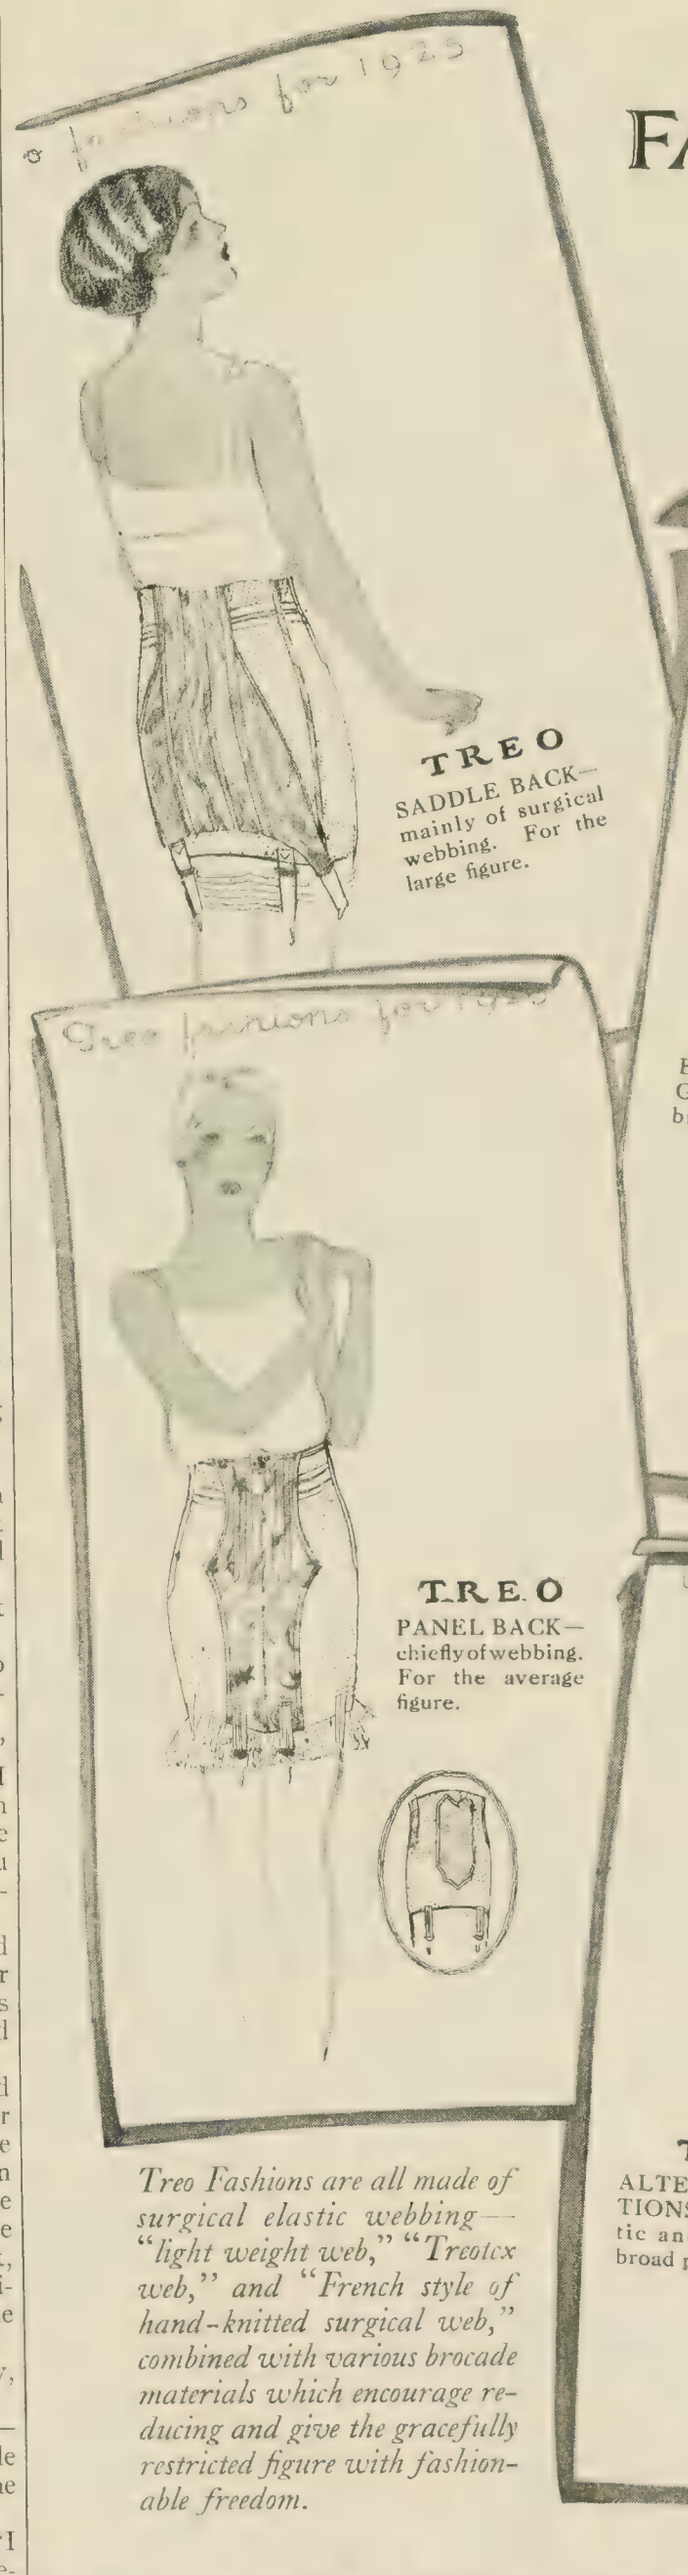
"I can't leave New Moon—I love it too much. Don't think me foolish or ungrateful, Miss Royal."

"Of course I don't think you ungrateful," said Miss Royal helplessly, "but I do—yes, I do think you're awfully foolish. What can you ever do here that is worth while? You've no idea of the difficulties in your path. You can't get material here—there's no atmosphere—no——"

"I'll create my own atmosphere," said Emily with a trifle of spirit. "And as for material—people live here just the same as anywhere else—suffer and enjoy and sin and aspire just as they do in New York."

"You don't know a thing about it," said Miss Royal, rather pettishly. "You'll never be able to write anything really worth while here—no big thing. There's no inspiration—you'll be hampered in every way. You're commiting literary suicide—and you'll realize that at three o'clock some white night, Emily. You'll be smothered by the pettiness of these small-town places where people can't see beyond their noses."

"I can see farther than that," said Emily, putting up her chin. "I can see the stars."



"Well"—Miss Royal threw out her hands—"I give up. I think you're making a terrible mistake, Emily. But you'll always find me ready to help you in any way I can."

"Miss Royal," said Emily earnestly, "I know I'll have difficulties and discouragements here. But if I can't succeed here, I wouldn't succeed in New York either. Some fountain of living water would dry up in my soul if I left the land I love. And you believe—don't you?—that I appreciate your kindness?" Your sympathy and encouragement have meant more to me than you can ever dream.

Miss Royal put her hands on Emily's shoulders and kissed her.

"All the good wishes in the world go with you," she said. "And I think it would be—nice—if any place could ever mean to me what it is evident New Moon means to you."

AT THREE o'clock that night a wakeful but contented Emily remembered that she had never seen Chu-Chin.

From potatoes au gratin to boiled spinach, STEERO bouillon and flavoring cubes make a world of difference

Found~ the piquant taste that great chefs sought

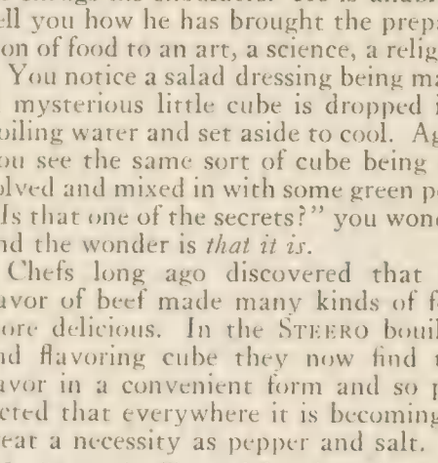
One little cube, yet it makes many dishes far more tempting

By
MRS. JANE STARR GRANT



LET me take you with me to the kitchens of a famous hotel. Meet my friend the chef—he of the fabulous salary. Watch his lieutenants at work on dishes that bring captains of finance, well-known professional people, epicures of all sorts, miles out of their way to taste. "What is the secret?" you ask him. But he shrugs his shoulders. He is unable to tell you how he has brought the preparation of food to an art, a science, a religion.

You notice a salad dressing being made. A mysterious little cube is dropped into boiling water and set aside to cool. Again you see the same sort of cube being dissolved and mixed in with some green peas. "Is that one of the secrets?" you wonder, and the wonder is that it is.

Chefs long ago discovered that the flavor of beef made many kinds of food more delicious. In the STEERO bouillon and flavoring cube they now find this flavor in a convenient form and so perfected that everywhere it is becoming as great a necessity as pepper and salt.

Use STEERO bouillon and flavoring cubes in the preparation of gravies and sauces, vegetables, soups, macaroni and spaghetti, eggs and omelets, fish and other sea food, salads and salad dressings, poultry and fish dressing, meats and left-overs, souffles, jellies and game. In fact, there are so many dishes that these cubes improve that thousands of women have made for them a permanent place in their kitchen cabinets.

THE STORY OF AN AMERICAN SINGER

their house, gaily caparisoned in their Spanish dress. As the news came to us from the war, many were the anxious glances cast by Mr. Homer and myself across the street; with little Louise in the garden, we were anxious. But the men never paid the slightest attention to us. I do not think they even knew that we were Americans.

M. Bussac welcomed me to Vichy with every courtesy, and in order to introduce me to his public before my début he was tactful in having me sing at two symphony concerts. After this I was immersed in rehearsals. The artists who came to Vichy were all well-known singers; to them this Summer engagement was in the nature of a vacation.

Perhaps they knew then, as we did not, that great excitement was shown over my début. I was the first débutante Vichy had had in fifteen years. And the camps were divided. Some scored M. Bussac heavily for engaging me. "How do we know," they exclaimed, "that in her inexperience this débutante, however promising, might not compromise the entire season? This is contrary to our tradition." Each citizen felt that, inasmuch as the Opera House was subsidized, he had a voice in the matter, an official right to his opinion. I knew nothing of all this furor, and it was not until toward the close of the season that I was told.

At last the evening of the début came! The theater was packed to hear "La Favorita," and there seemed to be unusual interest. My first duet with the tenor was greeted with prolonged applause, and the conductor made us repeat it, a very undramatic thing to do. But it helped to put me entirely at ease.

AT THE close of the season when the company scattered, each to his own opera house, we took with us the memory of a happy Summer, new friendships and a feeling of artistic achievement. We then hurried to Brittany for a two-weeks' rest by the sea before the opening of my Winter season at the Angers Opera, for which I had signed a contract in Paris before my début at Vichy.

The Opera House at Angers was controlled by a group of music-lovers who had organized a series of symphony concerts and a season of opera. Such leading composers as Vincent d'Indy, Widor, Dubois and Leroux were asked to conduct the symphonies. It was here that for the first time I sang in "Aïda."

It was while at Angers that I was asked to go once more to the Paris agency to sing for M. Calabrési, the director of La Monnaie, at Brussels. He was a genius in discovering new singers, and had been the first to bring out Calvé, Melba, Renaud, Plançon, Victor Maurel and others. Altogether he was a very remarkable man, and quite old at the time I met him. I can see him now as he sat listening to me with his whimsical fat face and his twinkling eyes. He was so round and short that his feet did not touch the floor.

He was very appreciative of my singing, but did not offer me a contract. "Madame Homer," he said, "you must sing another season at Angers, and then come to us." I was completely dismayed, but there flashed into my mind the fact that he was an intimate friend of my director at Angers, who wanted me for another season. I turned to M. Calabrési and said: "I am very sorry, monsieur, that you do not care to have me. But I assure you I am not going to sing another year at Angers." The little man roared with laughter. "Très bien, madame," he exclaimed, "then we will sign the contract for the coming Winter."

In the meantime Mr. Homer carried out his promise to write Mr. Grau describing the progress we had made. The result of this was that very soon I heard from Covent Garden in London asking if I would consider an engagement in the Spring. Lord de Grey, one of the directors, was to be in Paris, and an audition was arranged by M. Koenig.

No other place of meeting would suit him but the Paris Grand Opera stage, and so another series of exciting experiences was faced, with the result that I signed a contract with the understanding that I was to make my début in "Aïda," and among other rôles to sing Ortrud in "Lohengrin." Lord and Lady de Grey rose to go. "Of course you understand," Lady de Grey remarked casually, "that you will sing Aïda in Italian and Ortrud in German." "Certainly," I replied, with all the sang-froid of an American girl. I did not know a word of either German or Italian, but had studied these two parts in French. The prospect was staggering, but I did not let them see it. Not a moment was to be lost. I engaged an Italian lady and a German coach, and began to study. No parrot was more zealous in reproducing sound than I was while I went through my rôles word for word, sound for sound.

IN MY experience I have always found the really great artists to be unaffected and without superiority or condescension. It is a great pity the public can not be brought closer to them and learn to know their fine human qualities. Any one who had watched carefully the lone American girl when she went to La Monnaie at Brussels, would have seen how continually the helping hand was held out to her.

It is always a joy to me to emphasize these aspects of the opera, which show its human warmth. I can remember a performance of "La Gioconda" at the Metropolitan, when I had a bad cold. No one could take my place, and I did not want to cause a change of performance. So I said I would do my best. Most of my singing was with Caruso. He saw my condition, and reduced his tone so that the weakness of my voice would not be noticeable. This was characteristic of him.

The mention of "La Gioconda" recalls an incident which happened in Cincinnati. At six-thirty in the evening I reached the theater to dress. I found my trunk had been left in Pittsburgh. I was a Venetian lady of high degree, and something had to be done to dress me. Every one came to the rescue—Nordica lent me her jewels, Plançon sent me his make-up box, Edyth Walker, who played the blind mother, rushed into my room as soon as she came off stage and helped my maid sew and fit me. And just as I was about to go on, Caruso waylaid me. "If only my shoe-box were here, I would lend you the proper footgear," he declared. But that night the Venetian lady of high degree stood singing in modern American shoes.

The Covent Garden season ended in July and we went to Brussels the following September. Here I had eight months of varied and wonderful advantages. The season had no more than begun when the company was thrown into breathless excitement by the sudden appearance of Mr. Grau, who had come over from London for a few days. He did not come behind the scenes; but we could see him sitting in one of the most conspicuous boxes—a formidable judge. We all wanted to go to the Metropolitan; and, as a matter of fact, four of us were engaged for the following season: Imbert de la Tour, Gilibert, Journet and myself.

Before we reached New York, however, I was to have a second season at Covent Garden, and then it was that I received a "royal command" from Queen Victoria to sing at a court concert. This festivity at Buckingham Palace is one of the highest functions of the season. I had never seen a more impressive sight than the court dresses, the scarlet uniforms, the beautiful robes of the Indian potentates, ablaze with jewels and weighted with ropes of diamonds. The Queen lived in retirement at Windsor, but the Prince and Princess of Wales represented her. I had been warned beforehand about the dictates of court etiquette: I was to courtesy in response to royalty, but I wasn't to say a thing. But after the concert the Prince and Princess descended from their dais and made a stately progress through rows of bowed heads until they stopped before me. They were very gracious in their warm praise of my singing. I did not fail to sweep my skirts in the deep courtesy I had practised before my mirror, but, alas! I did fail to keep silent. I murmured, "Thank you."

AS THE time approached for my début at the Metropolitan Opera House, I may have had a feeling that there was something to be proved merely because I happened to be an American girl. And it may be that the times have changed since then, that we Americans of the Metropolitan Opera—Nordica, Eames, Bispham and myself—were perhaps conscious that it was necessary to prove or to emphasize to the American public that American singers could take their positions with foreign artists. It is just as difficult for any American singer to reach prominence to-day as it was then, perhaps more difficult, because there are more singers than ever before. But the prejudice against singers merely because they are Americans, which was sometimes felt in the past, has entirely disappeared. At the Chicago Opera, where I have greatly enjoyed singing "guest performances" these past three years, it is quite evident that the public is really anxious to welcome the American singer. All they ask in addition to the voice is that the singer have dramatic talent and sufficient imagination to sink any provincial or local Americanism in the atmosphere of the work being sung.

I came back to America—after my foreign experiences—quite as much an American as ever, so far as my personal life was concerned. And when I faced the vast Metropolitan audience on my début in "Aïda," it was with great happiness that I was at last singing to my own people. But there must have been another feeling—that it was perhaps one of the most critical audiences in the world, used to an exceptional gathering of the world's best singers brought together through the assiduous labors of the impresarios entrusted with the New York Opera seasons. Under Grau and Conried I came to understand what elation it was to feel oneself being taken into the whole-hearted acceptance of such audiences.

MY CONNECTION with the Metropolitan Opera enabled us to have a permanent home in New York and to be with our children all the time, just like families all over the world. We sometimes took them to the opera, but not too often. And we never forced the study of music upon them. We have seen too many children develop a distaste for that which they should have learned to love. But we gave them every opportunity for study. We did not insist that our little son of three years should sit through the long hours of the entire performance of "Parsifal." We took him to hear the first act, but when we suggested going home, he would not budge. To go home before the very end was to him a tragedy.

Naturally all the children felt identified with our life in music. I remember a friend once asking one of the twins at the early age of four what she was going to be when she grew up. "Why," scornfully, "don't you know, I'm going to be an opera-singer." But a few years later this same twin, when she was asked, "Are you going to be an opera-singer?" exclaimed, "No, indeed; I don't want to be the slave of the public." And, as it happens, it is the other twin, Katherine, who has the voice. It is she who, during the past Summer, has urged me to give her lessons and to take her once a week to study with Madame Sembrich, who has a home near us at Lake George. But it was for her to choose thus to break into her vacation.

However, from the very first, our little Louise took it for granted that because we were artists so was she. I remember when she was four, an organ-grinder stopping beneath our window in Paris. As we stood looking out at him, "What would he think," she exclaimed, "if he knew he was playing to three artists?" That was all in her babyhood; but to-day she is really before the public as Louise Homer Stires, singing both with me and alone.

The children have always taken the deepest interest in my career, and they make a very inspiring and partial audience in their box at the opera or at the concert, applauding me violently and embarrassingly long.

THE years that now passed were filled with constant work—the adding of new rôles, the reaching of new audiences through my concerts. The latter is most inspiring work, bringing one in close contact with people

Taken at night, a cup of Ovaltine brings sound restful sleep, quickly and naturally. This is why:

First—it combines in easily digested form, certain vitalizing and building up food essentials in which your daily fare is lacking. One cup of Ovaltine has more real food value than 12 cups of beef extract.

Second—Ovaltine has the power actually to digest 4 to 5 times its weight in other foods which may be in your stomach. Thus, a few minutes after drinking, Ovaltine is turning itself and all other foods into rich, red blood.

There is quick restoration for your tired mind and body. Frayed nerves are soothed. Restful sleep comes. In the morning you awaken, looking and feeling years younger. You are a new being for a new day. You are alive with energy to carry you buoyantly through the day.

Hospitals and doctors recommend it

Ovaltine is a delightful pure food drink. It has been used in Switzerland for 30 years and is now in universal use in England and its colonies. During the great war Ovaltine was included as a standard war ration for invalid soldiers.

A few years ago Ovaltine was introduced into this country. Today it is used in hundreds of hospitals. More than 20,000 doctors know and recommend it not only as a restorative but also for nursing mothers, convalescents, invalids, backward children and the aged.

Many take a cup of Ovaltine two or three times a day for its natural stimulation. It's truly a "pick-up" drink.

Energy to meet the evening's social demands.

who, as the opera is now organized in this country, can never hope to hear the Metropolitan away from New York and in such removed places. There is no limit to the joy that such engagements in concert singing bring. One penetrates all corners of the United States, reaching all sorts of people craving good music. It is a veritable joy to watch their faces and to realize how deeply they feel every note and word.

I shall never forget the time I sang at one of my concerts the setting my husband made for Thomas Hood's "The Song of the Shirt." It made an immense appeal, and when I ended, much to my astonishment, a clergyman arose in the balcony. With hands uplifted, he cried out, "Let us pray." We all bowed our heads, and he uttered a prayer aloud.

Such responses fill one with gratitude. When I go to a college town to sing, the unaffected youthful enthusiasm of the students is the pleasantest reward one can ask. How eager they are, wholly unconscious that they might by their crowding around the stage door and their urgent demands for autographs be making you lose your train! But they are so joyous and full of youth and vigor that I am confident our country is safe in the hands of the younger generation.

"HOMELAND," on Lake George, is our dearest home, planned after our own needs and desires. Here it is that in a studio built on the lake Mr. Homer can compose his songs in peace. I placed my studio deep in the pines, but later built a second one on the lake. Indeed we all have studios, for our twins are studying, and since none of us wishes to hear the others practise, we are well scattered. We all sing, down to our baby girl, Joy. Sometimes our neighbors come in on Sundays—and we gather around the piano and join in hymns. It is then, as Mr. Homer and I glance at the six children—two of them now married—that there comes to my mind another group: my sister at the piano, my father with his flute, my brother with his "bones," and the girl that I was, tapping away at the triangle.

And so life goes on with its rich inheritances and its loving histories that repeat themselves.

YOUR CHILD'S CHARACTER

Mothers, you have these habits under your direct control in the very first year of your baby's life. Keep them in hand through vigilance and training, rather than through tense discipline. Keep the atmosphere of the home wholesome and quiet, so that the child will not be exposed to unfortunate emotional suggestions, and the preschool personality of the child will almost take care of itself.

Zealous parents frequently try to do too much. They make a fetish of obedience or of neatness or unselfishness, or even of honesty; and in this pursuit of the higher perfections they neglect the fundamentals of meal-time, playtime, bedtime, dressing and toilet. The kernel of the child's make-up is penetrated and influenced by these every-day essentials of life, but it will be years before he is ready for a rational ethical approach to the business of living.

Premature and excessive zeal on the part of the parent leads to scenes, to rebelliousness and to domination. If the mother herse f is nervous, her tenseness and injudiciousness aggravate the very traits which she is trying to manage.

She becomes oversensitive in regard to her child's behavior. She injects herself into the situation and fails to look at her little one's behavior problem in an objective, philosophic way. In her restless perplexity she does not think out a sound policy, and unfortunately she often does the wrong thing. So matters grow worse for her nerves and for the child's. It is better to do nothing at all to correct the faults in your child's personality than to attempt the wrong thing. Children have an insidious yet powerful knack of drawing attention to themselves for punishment as well as for protection. The simplest, but, one should never forget, almost the hardest, rule to apply at times is "learn to let the child alone."

A child, even in infancy, must achieve his own health and strength of personality. Nobody can provide them for him directly. We can only furnish the best conditions for natural mental growth. The basis of that growth, we repeat, lies in the every-day habits of living.

If these are wholesome, and if the child is stimulated by influences of encouragement and good cheer, he steadily acquires a trust in life and a confidence in himself, and escapes those corroding feelings of inferiority which lie at the basis of so many personality difficulties.

The great secret of success in personality training, then, is to achieve a balance in which one gives the child neither too much nor too little attention. If he gets too much attention, he may exploit the household and become a spoiled monarch. If he gets too little, he may become overdependent and overcompliant. The great art is to put him on his own resources, even in infancy, and to keep him there as he grows up. There is always the danger of spoiling him either through overindulgence or through misplaced zeal. Intelligent neglect is much to be preferred to oversolicitous interference. The parents should give the child an opportunity to acquire his own morale.

HOW IS EARLY TRAINING IMPORTANT?

AT EVERY age within the limits of his capacity a child should be taught to be self-reliant. He should learn to go to sleep by himself. In due time he should learn to take off his shoes, to put them on, to dress, wash and feed himself. It is a good sign if he wants to eat with a spoon at the age of one, a splendid one if by the age of two he uses it independently. It is a bad token if he is still being spoon-fed by his mother when he is four years old.

He must learn to play by himself and to remain alone in a room while his mother goes out to the yard. In countless ways in the every-day situations of life he must lay the foundations for that fortitude which some day will make him a truly independent person, with what Emerson called self-reliance, and what we nowadays are accustomed to call morale.

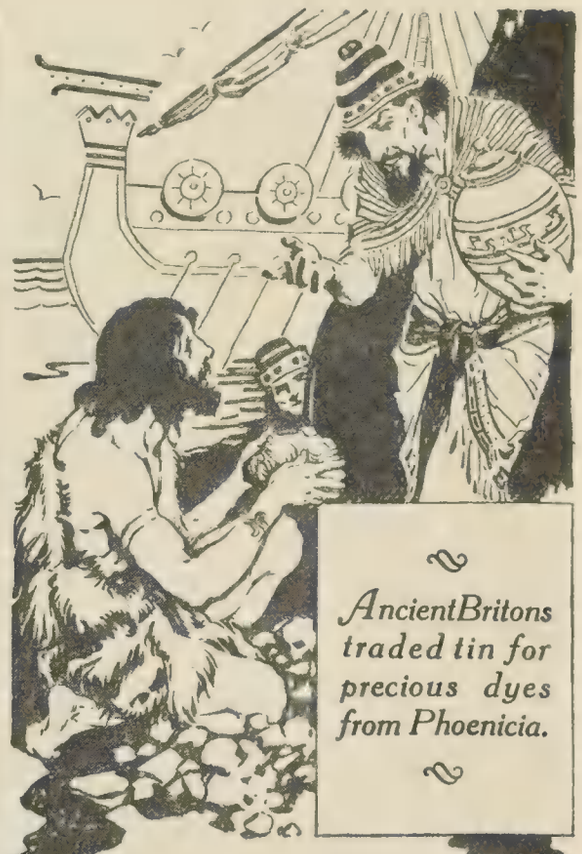
Health of personality is chiefly a matter of morale. And the wise parent gives her child progressive opportunities to acquire it, even as early as in the nursery.

We will sum up, then, by giving a few suggestions for the cultivation of morale in the young child:

Regular, sensible habits of eating, sleeping, rest, toilet and play—these will make not only for physical health, but for mental stability.

Poise and good cheer in the home life will seep into the child's mental constitution through unconscious imitation.

Generous encouragement, frequent well-timed praise and discerning affection will help him to build up trust in life, in those around him and in himself.



Repeated experiences in success in the accomplishment of simple tasks, with commendation, will build up self-confidence.

Do not kindle jealousy. Overcome it by giving him ample evidence of affection and security.

Respect his fears and shynesses, but counteract them tactfully and circumvent them by a process of gradual training.

Ignore tantrums or prevent them by diversion. Do not allow them to become the instrument of domination.

Even when the child is tediously convalescing from a long illness it is necessary to temper instinctive kindness with wise discrimination. You must not give in to the child altogether, but rather guide his recovering strength in such a way that he will gain in self-control as well. Otherwise you may have a personality problem on your hands after physical health has been restored.

Do not regard obstinacy, whining, irritability and disobedience as vices. Think of them as symptoms which call for interpretation and preventive management rather than for sharp discipline.

Do not try to build up the child's self-control by frequent and severe discipline. Remember that self-control is the by-product of wholesome living and gradual training.

Treat the child as an individual, even though he is tiny and dependent on you. It is this very dependence which may make you feel too personal about his misbehavior.

Remember that growing up mentally means attaining sufficient stamina to meet the demands of life squarely on one's own resources. It is a steady process of gradual detachment, first from the apron-strings, later from the home itself.

It is a long process and not an easy one. It can be normally completed only by starting early and by starting right. And it is a matter of morale. It requires health of personality. And remember, mothers, it begins in the nursery.

the old billboard type of fence, the plain blank and about six feet high kind, is to box in the posts, making them more decorative, and to put a lattice between them. The fence so treated gives the effect of a wall with a trellis against it, and is both a charming background for tall hollyhocks or monkshood and also an excellent support for roses. Vines trained against it are far more decorative in their effect than when they are grown on a plain fence, which must be thickly covered by them before it can really be beautiful.

Another type of fence that is common in the suburbs is made of heavy wire supported at fifteen-foot intervals by tall heavy posts. These may be as large as two-and-one-half-inch iron pipe, and may also do service as clothes-posts. An excellent way of making this sort of boundary more pleasing is to stretch other lengths of wire between the posts horizontally, and to train dwarf fruit-trees against it. Sweet peas may also be grown along the fence line and will make a pleasant barrier.

In the garden "pattern" given here, one side is the old-type fence against which the owner has trained roses, as this is the best exposure for them. Roses also fill the rest of the flower-bed which has the sun all day. Pansies are planted to carpet the ground. Next the house is a small cold-frame of the sort gardeners call a "pony frame," consisting of two sections each three by three feet. Here lettuce is grown for use from October until Christmas, and from February on again. In the other little frame are violets and pansies for Winter blooming.

The other fence, across the little garden, is of the wire and iron-post type. Fruit-trees are trained against it, and the old-fashioned corchorus, double-flowered plum (prunus triloba) and forsythia are also grown. This

No baby powder can be too good, too safe for a new baby's skin

Why over a million mothers of new babies choose this same baby powder

"THE skin of the young baby is very delicate," says the great authority on infancy, Dr. L. Emmett Holt, "and chafing and other eruptions easily occur unless special care is exercised."

A skin specialist in the Harvard Medical School says, "the delicate skin of a baby is very susceptible to the many irritating discharges which assail it. . . . One cannot be too careful to remove these deleterious substances at the earliest possible moment. If the baby is fat, wash out the folds of the neck, groins and buttocks, and thighs in the daily bath, and dust in an abundance of talcum powder to absorb the future moisture."

No Baby Powder too Good

For this delicate young skin, the tenderest thing in the world, no baby powder can be too good—too safe. For it is in constant use.

It is gently massaged over the entire body after the bath.

It is used repeatedly through the day, on the parts where wetting or soiling so often occur.

Its aid must be resorted to frequently even on the face—around the mouth where saliva is apt to moisten the skin and irritate it—or around the nose in cases where it runs.

All this devotion would be futile, were not the baby powder itself safe beyond any possibility of question. For this reason more than half the mothers in America use Johnson's Baby Powder.

Indeed, it was made at physicians' request by Johnson and Johnson to whom they turned as a house long known to them as manufacturers of hundreds of surgically safe articles.

A Trained Nurse's Way of Powdering Baby

The following is a trained nurse's description of the right way to dust baby after his bath:

First make your own hand soft as velvet with a thick coating of the fine white powder.

Then gently massage the chubby limbs, smoothing the powder into all the folds and crevices—over every roughened, irritated area. Your gentle rubbing lulls the nerves. The powder will absorb future moisture from perspiration or the dampness of diapers. And its faint delicate odor will keep baby sweet and fresh throughout the day.

Begin today to give your baby the added comfort Johnson's Baby Powder brings. Your own druggist carries it.

To enable all mothers to know for themselves the blessing of this safe baby powder, Johnson and Johnson are making to the readers of this magazine the interesting free offer below.

An advertisement on a delicate subject

—but it should be read by every thinking woman

MOST women possess a natural delicacy about the discussion of certain phases of health and hygiene that are peculiarly feminine problems. Perhaps they have heard physicians refer to personal hygiene for women as a healthful and necessary practice. And probably they have heard the same physicians deplore the use of poisonous compounds for this purpose. All this may have led to a certain confusion in the minds of many who would welcome a frank statement of facts on the subject.

How science has solved woman's problem

Bichloride of mercury is a dangerous poison. Carbolic acid is a dangerous poison. Yet for years women have been forced to depend for germicidal purposes upon compounds containing powerful poisons such as these. But now science has produced an antiseptic-germicide which possesses great germ-killing power and is at the same time absolutely non-poisonous and safe to use.

This great antiseptic is Zonite, and it has already proved a blessing in thousands of homes. The tragedy of accidental poisoning will never darken the doors of the home where Zonite is used. For Zonite is safe.

Use Zonite and avoid risk of poisoning

Zonite is actually far more powerful than any dilution of carbolic acid that can be safely applied to the human body, and it is more than forty times as strong germicidally as peroxide of hydrogen.

No wonder Zonite has been received with satisfaction by members of the medical profession. For Zonite, notwithstanding its great germicidal strength, is, in its many uses, absolutely harmless to delicate membranes and tissues. In fact, so beneficial is its action that dental authorities are using and recommending Zonite as a mouthwash.

The Women's Division has now prepared a booklet

Space here is of course too limited to give a complete account of the important changes that Zonite has brought into the lives of fastidious women. Every bottle of Zonite contains complete directions.

Also, there is the special booklet prepared by the Women's Division on the subject of Feminine Hygiene and covering other affairs of the toilette as well. Its scientific, impersonal treatment of the matter commends it to thinking people. It is frank and thorough. Every woman with a sense of responsibility will want a copy for herself or her friends. It is a booklet every mother will want to give her daughter. A copy will be mailed in dainty "social correspondence" envelope if you will fill in the coupon below.

long bed is edged with strawberry plants, for the owner may be a thrifty soul who likes to grow her own fruit. The rest of the bed is filled with hardy perennials, foxgloves, bellflowers, hollyhocks, sweet-william and hardy chrysanthemums; and just behind the strawberries, pushing their way up through them in the Spring, are tulips. There is also room here for a plant or two of rhubarb, for a little mint and for some roots of parsley.

When the plot is small, it is important to plant the vegetables that one likes most to have, that are not easily or inexpensively procured, that it is important to have fresh. This gardener likes asparagus.

At the end of the yard is a Russian mulberry-tree, set to attract the birds; a double row of tall double cosmos; and in front, asparagus. Every other day for six weeks in the Spring the gardener may cut her own asparagus. In the tiny kitchen-garden the thrifty system of "double-cropping" is practised. Two rows of peas are followed by tomatoes (plants set out), red peppers and eggplant (plants set out). Radishes are sown thinly in the row with carrots. Beets grown for their tops are followed by cauliflower. Leaf lettuce and sweet alyssum are used for edging.

In the center flower-beds are set small evergreens to define and give character to the little garden in the Winter time. Two of these are box plants from which the thrifty and expert gardener may make cuttings and in time have a box-edged flower-bed.

This garden has color in it from January, when the Winter aconite and Christmas rose are abloom, until November. It is yellow, purple and white with jasmine and crocus blossoms in March; rose-color in later April; then lavender with iris companioned by the yellow and orange of daffodils and geum; in June come the roses, followed by Shirley poppies, larkspur, and hollyhocks in August, and zinnias which bloom until frost. Chrysanthemums in shades of tawny orange, bronze and copper supply the Autumn color. This garden, besides being always a gay, colorful spot, yields an abundance of flowers for the house and there will be plenty remaining to give away.

a porch that opened onto a terraced garden. It was a lovely spot. A tall hedge hid the dusty highway, and everything was quiet and peaceful. When Elizabeth's step sounded on the stairs, he called to her, and she came to the doorway.

"Come out," said Don. "There's a breeze now, and the house is stifling," but it seemed to him that she came reluctantly, and, with even more reluctance, took the place beside him. There was a moment's silence; then Don said abruptly: "I went down the harbor."

"This afternoon?" There was a hint of surprise in his wife's voice. "If I'd known you were going, I'd have taken the children—that is, unless you had other company."

This was a touch of the familiar sarcasm that cropped up when she was displeased or hurt. Don faced her squarely.

"I had no other company, of course; and I'll go with you any day you say. But this afternoon I—I didn't want you, or the babies, or any one. I had to think."

She drew a startled breath.

"About—what?"

"Us." Don waited a moment for it to sink in. "I thought, after this morning, that we'd reached the point——"

"Oh, I know!" she broke in passionately. "You needn't say it. You want to get rid of me, of course. I've been thinking, too—all day. I'm dead with thinking; and I've come to the place where I don't much care what happens. But—I sha'n't give up my children. I nearly died to bring them into the world—you know that—and I won't be cheated out of them now when they're all I have. I know you love them, but you're not their mother, and——"

She stopped abruptly. Don knew she couldn't continue without tears, so he gave her time, but as she remained silent he said gently: "No, I'm not their mother, but I've an idea they might have some use for me during the next ten years. I wasn't thinking of divorce, Elizabeth."

She said, breathlessly, putting a hand to one scarlet cheek as if to cool it: "What were you thinking? If you imagine that I'll consent to a sort of 'wife-in-name-only' existence—bickering, quarreling, knowing that you despise my taste in everything from books to music— Oh, I never told you," she went on recklessly, "but my father and mother quarreled terribly! It used to frighten me, just as our silly row this morning frightened Mary. Seeing her cry that way brought everything back, and I'm not willing that she should suffer what I did, poor baby! Divorce is hateful, but it's better than—that."

"Perhaps," said Don. He arose, tossing his cigaret into a bed of flaming salvia; then turned to her, his eyes dark with feeling. "Elizabeth—the wrecked homes of this country are its disgrace. Are we going to add ours to the already overburdened list? Must we, Elizabeth?"

"But—what else can we do?"

"We can try to love each other, can't we?" he asked her gently.

She laughed, a bitter little laugh that cut him. "Do you still believe that 'the light of the whole world dies, when love is dead'?"

DON winced. He had quoted that in the first sweet days of courtship. It was going to be hard if she took that attitude. He said, not meeting her eyes because he couldn't bear their mockery: "I suppose I do. And you do, too, my dear, if you'd admit it. What—what did you see in me to like when you married me, Elizabeth?"

"Your classic profile, possibly."

A dangerous light flashed into Don's eyes as he sat down again. It was with difficulty that he caught back the angry retort that was on his lips.

"Please—don't be flippant now," he pleaded. "What I mean is this: It can't all be gone, the thing that attracted us in those first days. Let's be honest, Elizabeth. You're disappointed in me. To a certain extent, I'm disappointed, too. Perhaps we both would have been happier with some one else; but we married each other. Doesn't that mean anything to you?"

He had her attention now. There was no flippancy in her voice as she replied: "What—what are you trying to say?"

"Just this: You're my wife. It's my duty to make you happy—if I can. And your obligation to me is just as big. If we stop thinking about what we want ourselves, and try to do what we know will please the other, won't that help?"

"But you said we must love each other. Is love a thing that can come and go at will?"

"Perhaps not; but if we shut our eyes to the things that grate on us—if we refuse to dwell on them, and try to remember the decent, the lovable qualities that even the worst of us possess in some degree, it'll come easier. You said, Elizabeth, that I despised your taste. If I've made you feel that way, I've been a cad. It's no crime for you to enjoy a slap-stick movie, and no credit to me that I prefer Beethoven's symphonies. We're different, that's all. But if we're to be happy we must try to grow alike, as far as possible. It will take patience. It may take years; but in the meantime we can be comrades, can't we—if not lovers?"

There followed a silence, broken at last by the flutter of wings in the tree-top, and somewhere beyond the sun-dial the note of a bird. Then Elizabeth spoke, a little breathlessly, as if her tears were only around the corner.

This X-Ray shows tooth socket destruction by pyorrhea

are often threatened by an unseen danger

TEETH that gleam with pearly whiteness are not safe from pyorrhea's attack unless the gums are firm and healthy. The danger is unseen because it starts under the gums. But an X-Ray would reveal how quickly the infection spreads to the root sockets which support the teeth. The only way to check it is to ward off pyorrhea.

Tender, bleeding gums warn you of pyorrhea's attack

DENTAL clinics since 1908 have proved that Pyorrhocide Powder is a most effective dentifrice for checking, as well as preventing pyorrhea. Its tonic and stimulating qualities correct bleeding gums, strengthen tender gums, harden soft gums.

It keeps the teeth white and clean. It is medicated with Dentinol, a gum-tissue healing agent used by dentists in the treatment of pyorrhea.

Use Pyorrhocide Powder daily—see your dentist regularly and you can avoid pyorrhea. The economical dollar package contains six months' supply. At all druggists. Send for free sample and booklet on causes and prevention of pyorrhea.

"You mean then, that—because of the—the children——"

"No!" broke in Don sharply. "No! It's because of you and me, and this good old world, and the friends who believe in us! I'd die for my children if it were necessary; and if I hated you, which I'm very far from doing, I'd stick to you for their sakes. But this is different. It's a question of right and wrong. We chose each other, Elizabeth, and because we didn't get what we expected, are we to forget our marriage vows—break up our home—make worse than orphans of the children we brought into the world? . . . Betty" (his voice softened as he turned to her), "can't you face this with the same courage with which you faced motherhood? You fought and won a brave battle the night when little Bill was born. Won't you put up as brave a fight right now, to save our love?"

"But—can I save it?"

"You can try—as I shall. Life batters every one, Elizabeth. Perhaps most of us don't find our happiness where we expect it. But let's be good sports at least. Let's stick it out. Don't you see, dear, it's the only way in which we can give our children the sort of home that they'll remember gratefully?"

It was almost dark now on the little porch. Don could not see the tears that suddenly blinded his wife's eyes, and she did not answer; but in the garden-stillness their hands met and clung in a wordless promise that neither was to forget.

DON CARTER often remembered thankfully the months that followed, realizing in the light of ripening years that they were wrought of the stuff that strengthens. It was not an easy time. He and Elizabeth had drifted farther apart than either had suspected until they tried to come together. Bickering over trifles had become a habit. It was a fixed idea with them both that what one enjoyed would bore the other. All this had to be changed, and radical changes can't happen in a night. It meant a régime of eternal vigilance to both of them. It was impossible that in unguarded moments they should not slip back; but there were no more words before the children, and because the children were usually in evidence, the quarrels which used to be so frequent grew few and far between.

Don never knew some six months later, when he laughed outright at something comic in a moving picture, that Elizabeth caught her breath in a sob of happiness. Elizabeth was unaware on the night when she vigorously applauded a world-known violinist that Don looked at her wonderingly, and, seeing that her applause was obviously sincere, breathed a sigh of pure relief.

Perhaps neither saw that the other was choosing his recreations carefully. Don bought tickets only for concerts that Elizabeth might possibly enjoy—a singer whose program was not too classical; a pianist whose encores were pretty sure to be familiar. And, when Elizabeth suggested a movie, it was not of the variety that Don loathed, nor did she ask him to dance all night at the country club; while Don, realizing after a time that midnight would see him safe in bed and that the evening passed most merrily in free movement and laughter, began to enjoy those informal parties and to suggest going to them himself.

IT WAS not easy sledding, but it grew easier with the years. In time they came to strike a happy medium, even as to reading, and when they hit upon a book that both enjoyed, they rejoiced openly. But their children were the mutual meeting-place that never failed them. Once when Mary, at the age of seven, went as a treat to spend the night with a small neighbor, she surprised her parents by returning when they were at breakfast.

"What's up?" asked Don, after an ardent greeting.

De Bevoise silhouette of youth

UP and down the Avenue, all along the Rue de la Paix, one sees slender models that gently caress the figure . . . gowns and ensemble costumes fitting more snugly about the hips . . . simple bodices and elaborate skirts, shorter than ever. To wear the new gowns with fetching effect, to bring out all their grace and lissomeness, the silhouette must be slender . . . must be straight.

Paris Presentations

There is movement and ripple and life in the latest importations . . . in the circular swing of a Lanvin skirt . . . in the graceful flare below the knees initiated by Cheruit . . . in the uneven hem or the lovely rise and droop of a Chanel tunic. But these variations are introduced so cleverly that the silhouette still remains straight. Indeed, these gowns lose their effect utterly when the figure departs from flowing, graceful lines.

For years, DeBevoise designers have been working in cooperation with leading fashion authorities here and abroad, studying every type of figure and how it may best be adapted to each new vagary of fashion. They have originated a modish series of foundation garments including brassieres, bandeaux, corsettes,* girdles and reducing garments of Secretex.*

No matter what your requirements, there is a DeBevoise foundation garment to idealize your figure into lines that give poise and drape and enchanting effect . . . gently and without constraint. Each garment is identified by a tiny DeBevoise label that means as much as a Paris mark in a gown or hat. Obtainable at the best shops and specialty stores. Inexpensive, too.

No more trouble than a kitten

WHEN everything is right—food, sleep, skin—baby is no more trouble than a kitten. But neglect the Mennen Talcum showers for even a day and he will show the difference—so cross and chafed and fretful. No wonder baby loves Mennen's. Each downy fleck is like a little fairy sponge. Swiftly ...ever so gently... it absorbs all irritating moisture—all the perspiration, urine and bath-water which lodges in the chubby folds of baby's skin.

Soft, pure Mennen Borated also spreads a smooth, velvet-like film over tender infant flesh, saving it from the friction of damp clothes and woolly blankets, and the rubbing together of baby's own sensitive skin-folds.

In this cooling, soothing talcum are blended five mild, healing elements which help baby skin to throw off infection and keep the dimpled body always fresh and sweet.

Never omit the Mennen shower after every bath and change of diapers, before each nap, and whenever baby cries.

"I got a little homesick," explained Mary, slipping into her accustomed chair. Then, after a thoughtful moment: "I s'posed fathers and mothers loved each other, daddy."

Across the table Don's eyes met Elizabeth's in a puzzled glance.

"What do you mean, dear?"

"It was this morning," replied the little girl. "Polly's father was so cross. Something wasn't mended, and he called her mother a—a lazy—I can't 'member what, and slammed the door. Polly was crying, so—so I came home."

Don seemed to be looking into space. "There," he said, to the complete bewilderment of his daughter, "but for the grace of God, goes Donald Carter." He arose, and lifting Elizabeth's flushed face, kissed her gently. Then he kissed Mary. "Look here, little girl," he said, "don't tell any one but mother and daddy what you saw. You were a guest, Mary, and a guest never repeats things like that. Perhaps Polly's father wasn't feeling well, and didn't know what he was saying."

"He said it twice," Mary replied accusingly. "He must have known."

"Well, don't you worry about it," commanded Don. "If mother can spare you for the day, I'll take you to the city and we'll have a gorgeous lunch together. May I have her, Betty?" And Elizabeth, knowing that Don wanted the child to forget what she had witnessed, joyfully agreed.

LOOKING back, time seems to pass with incredible swiftness. Don and Elizabeth had passed victoriously those first difficult years of readjustment. Mary was in school—out of school—engaged to "the nicest boy on earth," and planning a Fall wedding. Bill, the baby, was a half-inch taller than his father, and ready for college. It was August, a warm evening, and Don was seated on the porch where fifteen years before he and Elizabeth had talked their differences over and decided to stick it out.

From within came laughter and young voices. Friends of Mary's had dropped in to see the contents of a hope chest, over which she and her mother spent, what seemed to Don, long hectic hours. Elizabeth was with them, of course. Don heard her voice: "Yes, Mary embroidered the whole dozen. Aren't they lovely?"

Don smiled. Funny, he thought, what a lot of comfort women get out of their household goods. Elizabeth was undoubtedly having the time of her life buying things for Mary. He sighed, thinking in how short a time Mary would be gone, Bill in college, and he and Elizabeth alone——

He closed his eyes a moment, visualizing the stormy past. Gosh! how he had fought at times to hold his tongue! And Elizabeth? Well, it had been every bit as hard for her—harder sometimes. And now they were to be left alone. Well, come to think of it, there was no one he'd rather be alone with! Don realized the fact with a sense of thankfulness. They had been good sports. Elizabeth and he. And out of the welter of their youthful antagonisms—out of what came so near the shoals—they had built a comradeship and understanding that defied storms. Respect at first, because of honest effort—and affection—then love—surely love at last!

A slamming door, and Bill slumped down upon the steps.

"Hot, isn't it?"

His father assented with a grunt. There followed a friendly silence. Then, from above: "Show them those last guest-towels, dear. The ones that Cousin Lizzie hemstitched." Bill stretched himself in pretended boredom and chuckled.

"Gee! How can they keep it up? That's the third time since noon that Mary's displayed her doodabs, and mother following along as if she were seeing 'em for the first time! Aren't women the limit?"

A twinkle appeared in Don's blue eyes.

"We'd have a hard time without 'em, my boy."

"Maybe. Well" (a thoughtful pause), "I hope old Mary will be as happy as she thinks she'll be."

The merry twinkle in Don's eyes died away bleakly.

"I pray she will; and—I believe it, Bill. Mary and Jack—well—they're congenial, and that's half the battle."

"Battle!" Bill threw back his head and laughed joyously. "Is that your idea of the holy state of matrimony? But, honest, dad, it describes it pretty accurately for some folks. Last night when I was at the Campbells', the old man kept yapping at his wife till I longed to heave a coal-hod at him. Poor Polly was terribly ashamed. I had to pretend I didn't notice, but what I wanted to do was to come home, where such things don't happen."

"M—m," mumbled Don. He suddenly recalled the day when seven-year-old Mary had come home, to get away from this same couple. So they were still at it! An easy habit to form, a hard one to break, but— He said quietly: "Too bad; but somehow, Bill, I don't fear a fate like that for Mary. She'll take what life gives her and make the best of it. She's a good sport, like—like her mother."

"Mother!" The boy looked up. "Why do you call her that?"

"Because, son, she's put up with my shortcomings so courageously."

Bill grinned.

"Well, I'll tell the whole world that she hasn't had much to put up with then, have you, mums?"

ELIZABETH was in the doorway now. She came out quietly and sat down by Don. Fifteen years ago she had been pretty. Now she was beautiful, or seemed so to the discerning eyes that knew her best. She smiled.

"What's all this about?"

"You partly," replied her son, "and the quarreling Campbells across the way, and Mary, and Marriage—with a big M. Dad says you're a sport—a wonder—a female Job, because you've managed to live with him for twenty years without damaging his beauty with the rolling-pin."

"Don't be alarmed, Elizabeth," said Don lazily. "As usual, our youngest is drawing on his imagination."

"I only added the finishing touches," defended Bill. "That was exactly what he meant."

"Was it?" smiled Elizabeth. "Well, perhaps he has had some things to put up with, too."

"If he has," retorted Bill, "he's concealed the fact successfully, and so have you. Honestly, mums, I don't believe there's another home in town like this. I know there's not another where the gang likes to come as it does here. Do you know what Stan Ellwood told me? He's inclined toward Brady's pool-room, you know, and his aunt gives him fits for it. But the night he was here to supper he said to me: 'Gosh! Bill, if I had a home like yours I'd never go out,' and he meant it, too."

"Poor boy!" said Elizabeth softly. "You must have him here more often, Bill. It'll do him good."

"Aren't you afraid," said Don, with another twinkle, "that he'll contaminate your son?"

"Not while you're on the job as father," answered Elizabeth.

"This," grinned Bill, "is certainly one little admiration party." A sound of voices came from within. "Say, are those females going?"

Then they heard gay good nights. Bill groaned. "When does the next personally conducted tour arrive? Those towels'll be worn out before poor Jack has a chance to dry his hand on 'em. Come on out, Sis, and join the family party. You ought to have been here sooner and heard dad and me discourse on Marriage and the Home."

Mary, a dream of a girl, with dusky hair, sat down on a cushion and rested her head against her father's knee.

"I don't need to learn anything about a home, Bill, after the ideal one I've had for nineteen years."

DON drew a quick breath. It came to him that these words from their children were repaying Elizabeth and him a thousandfold for any pangs they'd suffered. His eyes sought hers, but she didn't meet them. She said, breathlessly: "Has—has home seemed that to you, darling?"

Surprise at the question flashed over the girl's face.

"Of course it has! You've been so wonderful always, you and Dad. It's our one ambition, Jack's and mine, to make another home like this." She looked up at her mother, eyes starry with dreams; then added, with a reminiscent smile: "Why, Mother! I never went on a visit anywhere, in all my life, that I didn't thank my lucky stars when I got back home that I was the child of parents who—well—who really loved each other, as you and Dad do."

Don reached out to caress the dusky head against his knee.

"Thanks, daughter," he said gently. "You'll never know just what it means to Mother and me to have you tell us that you feel that way about us."

His hand groped for and found Elizabeth's, as it had on that other Summer evening long ago. Then Bill arose, stretching his long length lazily.

"Come on, Sis. Let's pick up Polly Campbell and hie us to the corner for a sundae. If we sit here any longer throwing bouquets to Dad and Mother we'll completely spoil 'em." But Mary hesitated.

"You don't mind if we leave you here alone?"

Don was still clasping his wife's hand. He answered, with the indulgent smile his children knew and loved: "Run along, kids, and enjoy yourselves, if those sticky drug-store mixtures are what you crave. But don't pity us. Your Mother and I are not alone, Mary, my dear. We are together!"

ELIZABETH'S fingers tightened about his. "Don," she said, as the young people vanished beyond the hedge, "we—we are together, aren't we? You meant that?"

A tolerant smile played around his lips.

"Were you doubting it?"

"But—I'm the same girl you married, dear, the girl who failed you."

The smile vanished as he answered: "I refuse to admit the failure, Elizabeth, or for that matter, that you're the same girl. You're the woman who grew out of those years when we had to sit so tight to keep the boat from rocking. Incidentally, I wouldn't change her for any shipmate in the whole wide world. But the real point is, that we reached port."

She said generously: "It was all you, Don. Even now I could cry to think of you—working it all out in that dear, young, troubled head of yours——"

Her voice trembled, and Don said, "Forget it! It was good for me, Elizabeth. But it takes two to make a successful marriage; and if you hadn't understood, and helped, and fought as I did, there'd be one less happy home in this good land of ours, and our children ——"

He paused, suddenly incoherent; but there was no need of words. Both knew and understood the other's thought. They had played the game—fought the good fight, and their reward was immeasurably great.

Suppose your eyelids failed to close

when a cloud of dust blows toward you

Dust in the eyes? How rarely does this unwelcome experience occur, for the protecting eyelids "quick as a wink" snap shut when trouble looms.

Unhappily there is no such protection for the skin. And often its soft, natural fineness is sacrificed because the tiny, delicate pores are subject to the irritating effects of this same dust-laden air.

Nature does her best. The little pore ducts night and day cast out foreign particles and preserve the pliant fineness of the skin. We help by using our face creams faithfully to cleanse and nourish. But most face creams leave the pores wide open, unprotected as before.

Tired, overtaxed, the pores become weak in functioning. And then we wonder why they become enlarged.

Some of us accept this condition as "just natural to my skin." But those of us who really care find ways to refine the pores.

Ice is one tested way. But it is harsh to tender skins, and always more or less inconvenient.

Now there is a new and better way—with all the pore-contracting benefits of ice, and with none of its trouble—a delightful, refreshing cream, that feels and acts like ice on the skin.

This new cream is called Princess Pat Ice Astringent. It does not take the place of your nourishing creams. It simply finishes the task—closes to normal fineness the open, unprotected pores.

Apply this icy and refreshing cream right over your nourishing cream. The sensation is like a cool lake breeze—the effect, an immediate contraction of the pores.

Princess Pat Ice Astringent does not enter the pores. Its smooth contracting action merely restores the refinement of texture to your skin; and its welcome "freezy" chill brings a tide of fresh natural color.

You will be entranced at the youthful beauty which Princess Pat Ice Astringent brings to your complexion, and amazed at how wonderfully your powder adheres—without possibility of its entering and choking the pores.

Beauty Hints by "The Princess"

My night treatment: Cleanse the skin thoroughly with a soft, solvent cleansing cream. Remove with soft cloth. Feed the pores generously with nourishing cream, gently manipulating with finger tips. Let sleep do the rest. I suggest Princess Pat Cleanser and Princess Pat Cream for this night treatment.

My morning treatment: Awaken the skin with cool, not cold, water. Dry the face. Now just a light coat of nourishing cream, again gently manipulating, always with upward and outward strokes. Now your ice astringent right on top of the nourishing cream. Then wipe off both together.

My final touch: I find dry tint most natural—Princess Pat English Tint. Apply in the shape of a V, the point toward the nose, leaving a clear space in front of the ear. For waterproof effect, apply before powdering. I use an almond base powder—both soothing and beautifying.

THE PEEL TRAIT

that way," she cried. "I'll tell Farley every word you say."

The captain protested earnestly. She must not mention his name to her nephew, he insisted.

"You see—well, you see, Miss Perry," he added, with a twinkle, "Farley's callin' pretty regular up to my house these days. I rather guess he thinks I'm kind of prejudiced against him, maybe. Of course I ain't, but—well, Lettice is young and so is he, and it's best not to be in too much of a hurry in such matters. You can't feed a family on love and posies, Miss Perry. It takes some fish and potatoes to do that. Now, don't you say a word about my havin' been here or what I've said. Promise."

Miss Perry was obviously disappointed, but she promised.

As for Eliphalet, he walked out of the Perry garden feeling tolerably well satisfied with the seed he had sown there. He was certain that Miss Sylvia would do her best to keep Farley Crowell in Wapatomac for the present.

HIS next call was upon the Reverend Oswald Duncan, the minister of the Congregational chapel, where Sylvia Perry and her nephew worshiped. The Reverend Oswald was young—very young—and the Congregational chapel was his first charge. He and Farley Crowell were close friends. Also Mr. Duncan was highly idealistic and of a romantic frame of mind. He and Captain Eliphalet had disagreed sharply upon several matters of town procedure, and to say that the minister was surprised at receiving a call from his arbitrary and outspoken opponent is to state the truth mildly. But he was flattered, nevertheless. Most people in Wapatomac at that time found a visit from Eliphalet Peel pleasing to their pride.

He was still more pleased when the captain disclosed the reason for his call. It developed that Eliphalet had been reflecting concerning the subject of their most recent disagreement, the building of the new addition to the chapel. Now it appeared that he was sorry for having roughly refused to give a cent and had called to say so. Also, and even more to the purpose, he wished to put his name on the list as a subscriber to the amount of fifty dollars. And if the minister would condescend to shake hands and let bygones be bygones he would feel a whole lot better.

The hands were shaken and Duncan was surprised and overjoyed to find, in the course of the talk, upon how many points he and visitor were at one. And when Farley his Crowell's name and his aspirations as a painter were mentioned, it was disclosed that they were in entire agreement there likewise. The minister believed thoroughly in his young parishoner's talent. It should be encouraged and developed, he said. Talent such as Farley's was a direct gift of Providence and no considerations, material and worldly should be permitted to interfere with its cultivation.

Captain Eliphalet concurred in all this. Then it was disclosed that Mr. Duncan knew of the offer from the Boston firm. It was a good offer; that he admitted. But——

The captain nodded. Yes, it was a good offer—for a man who intended keeping on in business—but——

They agreed that for Farley Crowell to accept such an offer seemed almost wicked.

Perhaps it is not necessary to detail the remainder of the dialog. It ended by the clergyman's declaring that, as Farley's friend, he felt it his duty to urge the latter to refuse to enter the employ of the Boston wholesale house.

"And, if you'll permit me to say so, Captain Peel," he added, "I am delighted to have my opinion backed by that of an influential person like you. I—I confess I should not have expected a—a successful and—er—may I say, wealthy man of affairs to view the matter in such an—er—altruistic and unworldly way. But monetary success is not, as you say, everything."

"You're right," agreed Eliphalet solemnly. "Not by any means it ain't."

"No, it isn't. We should accept the career the Almighty has chosen for us. If I have any influence at all with Farley—and I think I have—he will not give up his art for commercial advancement. And, of course, I shall not tell him, or any one else, that I have had this counsel with you."

"Thanks. You understand my reasons for wantin' to seem to be out of it."

"Certainly, certainly. You have my solemn promise, Captain Peel."

THE third and last call which the captain made that day was at the New York Store on the Main Road. It was a little past noon and Farley Crowell had gone home for dinner, but his employer, Jabez Godfrey, was at his desk in the back room. Mr. Godfrey was, like Miss Perry and the Reverend Duncan, surprised when his caller appeared, but his surprise was flavored with apprehension, for he had a note, twice renewed, in the Wapatomac Bank, and Eliphalet Peel was an influential director in that bank.

The captain wasted no time in preliminaries here. He informed Godfrey that he had come to talk about young Crowell and wanted his listener to pay attention.

"He's had an offer to go with Jones & Corcoran up to Boston, I understand," he said. "Made up his mind to go, has he?"

Godfrey sniffed. "Just about, I guess," he replied. "I won't stand in his way. He's no special good to me here. The only thing he's done that's really worth while since he came with me is paint that sign out front. He painted that pretty well, but as a bookkeeper he is a little less than average."

"Humph! Well, good or bad, you've got to keep him here for a spell. Don't you let him take that Boston job."

The storekeeper gasped. "Not let him take it!" he repeated. "You want me to keep him here in Wapatomac? Why, good Lord, Cap'n Peel, I thought you'd be the first one to be glad to have him go! I knew you didn't take any stock in him. But considerin' how, accordin' to everybody's tell, he's been hangin' after Lettice, I thought——"

Eliphalet interrupted. "Don't think too much, Jabez," he observed. "Your head may not be rigged for it. Stop thinkin' now and do some listenin'. For reasons of my own I don't want him to take that Boston job. Somehow or other you've got to keep him where he is for a spell. Suppose you soft-soap him a little. Tell him how good he is at paintin' pictures, and as a sort of special bait tell him if he'll stay you'll give him a chance to paint a sign for your side door, a regular hallelujah of a sign, one he can spread himself on."

"But—but I don't need another sign, Cap'n Peel. It would cost a lot of money and——"

"Sssh! I'll pay for the sign myself—provided it don't cost too much. As for needin' it—well, it may help trade, and, from what they tell me up at the bank, Jabez, a little extra business won't hurt the New York Store a bit. There, there! You do as I tell you to. Only don't you let anybody know that I did tell you or am mixed up in this at all."

FARLEY Crowell did not call at the Peel house that evening. He had promised to do so, and Lettice expected him, but he did not come. She was a trifle displeased and hurt, and when David Booker happened in she was more gracious to him than usual. Booker was, as always, chatty, agreeable and attentive.

The following evening, when Farley did make his appearance, he seemed to be ill at ease and to have something on his mind. The cause of the uneasiness was revealed when they were alone in the sitting-room. Lettice asked him if he had written to Jones & Corcoran accepting their offer.

He fidgeted and hesitated. She regarded him keenly.

"Farley," she insisted, "why don't you answer me? Haven't you written them? You promised me you would do it yesterday."

He looked at her but could not meet her gaze.

"Lettice," he began, "I—I've got something to tell you. Something you won't like, I'm afraid. I—I didn't write them yesterday. I intended to, but—but some things happened—I heard some things that made me put it off. And last night I heard more. And this morning, when I got a telegram from the Jones & Corcoran folks saying unless they heard from me before five o'clock they couldn't

How to Restore the Original Shade to Gray Hair

If your hair is gray, do what thousands of others have done—use the wonderful, clean, colorless liquid known as Kolor-Bak and see the original shade quickly return.

No matter what the cause of grayness—age, shock, illness, scalp disease—this remarkable liquid restores the exact former shade, gives the hair a beautiful silky texture, and keeps it from becoming brittle and from falling out. Also cleanses scalp and hair, banishes dandruff, and stops itching of the scalp. As easy to use as water.

No need to furnish a sample of your hair—no tests to make—as the one clean, colorless liquid is for all gray hair regardless of former shade. Kolor-Bak is the best known substitute for the natural hair pigmentation.

"My Hair Was Quite Gray"

"Only a short time ago my hair was quite gray. It was falling out. My scalp itched and dandruff appeared. Kolor-Bak stopped the itching, dandruff and falling. Most wonderful of all, however, is that my hair is its original shade. I look 10 years younger."

hold the position for me any longer, I—I—well," with a burst of candor, "I sent them a wire saying I had decided not to accept. You see—oh, don't look at me like that, please don't! Listen! I'm going to tell you why I did it. Won't you listen?"

She did not reply immediately. She continued to look at him, and her look was very grave.

"I don't understand," she said, after a moment. "You promised me you would accept that offer. I told you why I thought you ought to, why I thought it was the right thing for you to do, for—both our sakes. Now, without saying another word to me, you changed your mind and broke your promise. I can't understand why. Well, never mind. Go on, I am listening."

He burst into lengthy and eager explanation. When she and he had had their talk and reached their decision, it had seemed to him right. He did not want to keep books in a Boston office. He hated the idea. But he had thought perhaps, as she said, it was the practical thing to do and maybe he could study drawing and painting evenings and—and all like that. He dreaded to enter the Jones & Corcoran office, but he had made up his mind to do it because she wanted him to. He had meant to write or telegraph his acceptance the very next morning, but he had been awfully busy at the store and—and he had put it off and—well, then people began to talk to him. They said things that——

"Wait a minute," she broke in. "What people do you mean?"

Oh, lots of people, different people. People that knew he had had the Boston offer and they had been thinking the thing over, just as he had.

"And as I had. Don't forget me altogether, please."

He never did forget her, he assured her. She must know he never did. He thought of her all the time. But these people were the best friends he had—Lettice excepted, of course—and he couldn't help listening to what they said when they were advising him just for his good. She, herself, must see that they had no axes to grind. It was none of their affair. They were——

She interrupted again. The color was rising in her cheeks and her tone was less patient. "Perhaps I shall see when I know who they are," she said. "You haven't told me their names yet."

He told them then. Mr. Duncan—"You know what a wonderful man he is, Lettice. Every one says so. And he has been a splendid friend to me, I tell you." And his aunt, Miss Perry—"She has been like a mother to me. Of course I must listen to what she says, even if I don't take her advice, you know."

"Yes. Just as you listened to mine—and didn't take it. Were there any others?"

He was becoming a trifle angry. Her crisp sarcasms were irritating. After all, a bad promise was better broken than kept, and if she gave him the chance he could show her what a mistake his accepting that Boston offer would have been.

"Yes, there are others," he announced quickly. "One other, anyhow, and he is one you would hardly expect. It was Mr. Godfrey, the man I am working for now. He and Aunt Sylvia and Mr. Duncan, they all talked to me mighty seriously. And every one of them said I would be making a big mistake if I went into that Boston office."

THERE was much more. Lettice listened to the end. Then she came straight back to the heart of the matter.

"I see," she said. "Well, there is one point that these people haven't considered at all, it seems to me—that is, money. I want you to study art just as much as they do, but I didn't see how you could afford to do it unless you were where you could earn something. But whether they are right or I am doesn't amount to so much now. What does amount to a great deal—to me, anyway—is your breaking your promise to me. Why

of Quality and Fashion

SINCE 1837

You'll make a cool, lovely picture in a frock of

Normandy Voile

Sheer, crisp, fresh-laundered frocks are a gentle-woman's choice for wear throughout the Summer. And Normandy Voile is the smart, cool, sheer-textured fabric that looks perfectly charming, no matter how simply it is made. Any good store can supply you with the lovely new designs and colors in Normandy Voile. The little raised dots that form Normandy patterns are guaranteed absolutely fast. If you see "Normandy Fabric" marked on the selvage, or a "Normandy" label sewn in the dress, you know that you are obtaining the genuine fabric.

It costs so little! a lovely negligee made of

Lingette

The season of visits, reunions, and travel is close at hand—the season for brides' trousseaux, too!—when a woman likes to have pretty negligees and plenty of dainty underwear. College girls' wardrobes must be replenished—pajamas, nightdresses, lingerie; and slips made for wear with dancing frocks. For all these purposes there is no lovelier fabric than Lingette, nor one that wears longer or washes more perfectly. Lingette—in exquisite tints and smart shades—always has the name marked on the selvage. Every Lingette garment has in it a special Lingette label.

The little fat man with his "Sell and Repent" slogan that appears on all Butterfield labels, is the mark always of a quality fabric. This quaint little trade mark pictures one of the old Bradford wool-staplers—a man who attired himself in a plush waistcoat, "knee breeches and thick frieze coat reaching to his heels", and who remarked—as he finished each transaction—"I'll sell if I repent." Prompt sales, good service, were his watchwords; and his satisfied expression, the rotundity of his figure, gave evidence of the soundness of his business policy. The example of this old woolstapler—his calm outlook on the future—are inspirations to Fred Butterfield & Co., today in the creation and sale of quality fabrics to the discriminating women of America.

FRED BUTTERFIELD & CO., Inc., 361 Broadway, N. Y. C.

Notice the little fat man woven in this Butterfield label! Look for it whenever you buy cotton fabrics.

The labels used in garments made of Normandy Voile and Lingette also have the little fat man to guide you.

should their advice count for so much more than mine?"

"It didn't, of course. And you know that it didn't."

"It must have, for you took it and you didn't take mine. And—even supposing you had decided to change your mind—why did you send them that answer without saying a word to me? Why didn't you come and tell me before you did it?"

It was the hardest question of all to answer. His conscience had given him no easy moments since, acting upon impulse backed by inclination, he had sent the telegram. Now, instead of answering, he began to explain still further concerning his reasons for refusing. He began to tell of Godfrey's request that he paint another sign for the New York Store.

"It doesn't make any difference how much time I take on it," he declared. "I can do my very best work on it. Mr. Godfrey says——"

And once more she refused to listen. "Won't you please stop telling me what every one else says," she commanded, "and pay some attention to what I am saying now? Why didn't you come and tell me that you were going to say no to Jones & Corcoran? Why didn't you come and talk the matter over with me last evening? I expected you. You had said you would come. Why didn't you?"

HE HESITATED. Then the indignant resentment which had been in the back of his mind all that day burst forth.

"I did come," he declared. "Anyway, I started to come and I got as far as the gate. But the curtains were up and I could see you sitting in here with that fellow Booker. I couldn't talk before him and—and anyhow I didn't like the idea of his being here. I've told you a dozen times that, things being as they are between you and me, he ought not to come so often to see you. You ought to tell him so. You knew how I felt about it."

Her eyes flashed. "So that was it!" she exclaimed. "You were jealous of Mr. Booker, and because you were you didn't think it worth while to keep your promise to me."

"That didn't have anything to do with it. If you want to see Dave Booker, I can't stop you, I suppose. But I will say this—if you don't care enough about me to give him his walking-papers, I don't see why I should be so fussy as to let prejudices about my life-work spoil my chances. I know you don't think I can ever make good as an artist. I'm going to show you that I can."

She shook her head. "That isn't so," she declared. "I do believe in you, and nobody would be as glad to see you succeed as I would be. But I try to be practical and use common sense."

"Common sense! You get that sort of stuff from your father. What does he know about art?"

"Why, not much. But he knows a lot about other things. I wanted you to take the Boston offer because it would give you a chance to earn your living and make it easier for you and me to—to do what I thought you wanted to do. As for Mr. Booker's calling here, I can't stop him without telling him that you and I are engaged. That we mustn't tell any one yet, for a lot of reasons."

"I'd just as soon tell 'em. I'd tell everybody. It's your father that is troubling you. You're afraid of what he'll say. He hates me and——"

"No, he doesn't. As you say, he doesn't understand pictures or the people that make them, but he would understand quickly enough if you showed him you meant to get on. He thinks——"

"All he thinks about is money. That's why he is strong for Dave Booker. He thinks he is smart and sharp at a trade, and——"

"There, there! Suppose we stop talking of Mr. Booker."

"I'll stop talking about him when you

Sage Tea Turns Gray Hair Dark

Almost everyone knows that Sage Tea and Sulphur, properly compounded, brings back the natural color and lustre to the hair when faded, streaked or gray. Years ago the only way to get this mixture was to make it at home, which is mussy and troublesome.

Nowadays we simply ask at any drug store for "Wyeth's Sage and Sulphur Compound." You will get a large bottle of this old-time recipe improved by the addition of other ingredients, at very little cost. Everybody uses this preparation now, because no one can possibly tell that you darkened your hair, as it does it so naturally and evenly. You dampen a sponge or soft brush with it and draw this through your hair, taking one small strand at a time; by morning the gray hair disappears, and after another application or two, your hair becomes beautifully dark, thick and glossy and you look years younger.

stop letting him come to see you. And as for your father, he thinks he can boss all creation the way he used to boss his crews. I don't care two straws for his opinion."

"I do. He is my father, and he has been very good to me. If it ever should be necessary, I would tell him honestly just how I felt and what I meant to do; but I shan't quarrel with him until it is necessary. I think the way you have paid no attention to my wishes and listened to Mr. Duncan and the others is selfish and mean. And I think your breaking your promise without a single word to me is underhanded and dishonest."

He sprang from the sofa where they had been sitting.

"Oh, you do!" he sneered. "I see. Yes, yes, I see. You are taking this excuse to get rid of me and make good with your father by marrying Dave Booker. Well, then, marry him, if you want to. I suppose you'll call it common sense. If it is, I'm glad I haven't got any."

THIS was not the end, but the end came soon afterward. Captain Eliphalet, in his room at the head of the stairs, heard the front door bang spitefully. He smiled and winked at his reflection in the mirror over the bureau. He had not expected quite such immediate results from his Machiavellian round of calls of two days before, but the results were not the less welcome. If, so soon, he had got rid of the good-for-nothing dreamer, who was in no way fitted to marry a girl like Lettice, he should be happy. And, by and by, she would be.

When, however, a little later he heard a suppressed sob from behind the closed door of his daughter's room, his happiness was less pronounced. He tried to soothe his conscience with the reflection that it was all for her good, but the attempt was not wholly successful. In spite of himself, he felt a good deal like a sneak.

Possibly this feeling was behind his action of the following week. To the amazement of Wapatomac he suddenly announced that he had grown tired of roosting like a sick gull on a lump of dry land and wanted to be afloat again. He was going to take a sea trip somewhere, he declared, and "sweeten his bilge" with good salt water. He engaged passage for two on a liner sailing within a fortnight from Boston for a cruise in the Mediterranean. Lettice was to accompany him. At first she refused to go, but as the days passed and Farley Crowell made no move toward reconciliation, did not come near her to ask her pardon or say that he was sorry, she agreed to keep her father company on his astonishing adventure. Astonishing it surely was—to Amarias Peel and Susanna Crusit especially. They considered it wild extravagance and remonstrated with Captain Eliphalet. He again told them to mind their own business.

"I know what I'm doin'," he declared serenely.

Susanna, the outspoken, voiced her disgust.

"You said you knew what you were doing when you undertook to keep Lettice and Farley Crowell apart," she sniffed. "I can't see that you have done much along that line yet."

Her parent chuckled.

"Better polish up your spy-glass," he advised. "You may see somethin' before long."

Amarias shook his head.

"Do you realize what a trip like the one you're talkin' of is goin' to cost, father?" he suggested. "I declare I don't see how you can afford it? Just because Lettice wants to do a thing, it doesn't follow that——"

"Here, here! Lay to! I'm the one that's doin' the wantin', and because I want it I'm goin' to do it. And it's my money I'm spendin'. When it gets to be yours, you can dig a hole and bury it, if you want to."

This taunt ended the attempt at protest. But Amarias and Susanna agreed that it was all Lettice's fault.

No Rain All Summer
—Practically Promised Here

He wrote this last August from Ventura to his mother in Ohio:

"I really never knew there was such a country, never had such summer fun, never saw so many healthy, happy-looking men, women, and children; and never before, during any summer, enjoyed such weather as this is. Last night was my thirty-fifth night under blankets, from July 1st to August 17th. And, stranger than that, perhaps—not a drop of rain in all that time—not a moment of my sport so spoiled.

"And Southern California is the strangest land in other ways that I have ever heard described.

"Here are the mountains, the sea, a desert like Sahara, groves of oranges, walnuts, figs and olives, the old missions of the old monk Serra, moving picture troupes in costumes representing the entire world traveling about, automobiles loaded with camping outfits, people on horseback, hikers with their knapsacks climbing up to mountain lakes a mile above the level of the ocean, bathers, hunters, golfers, fishermen—everybody going somewhere to do something that is fun.

"It's all astonishingly different, new, and captivating. Cares and troubles don't seem to be part of it at all. It's real recreation—mentally and physically, the greatest stimulus I've ever known.

"And now, about next summer. The entire family has got to plan to come for the finest summer they have ever had. Come here to be cool, to be enchanted, refreshed and rejuvenated. Plan now and you'll come, so make your plans."

This is the enthusiasm that this summerland inspires, that thousands of persons who spend their summers here know well. You will feel it when you come. Plan it for the coming summer. Come then or come now.

The cruise lasted nearly four months. When Eliphalet and his daughter came back to Wapatomac, they learned several items of local news. One of these concerned Farley Crowell. He had resigned his clerkship in the New York Store and gone to Boston to study art. His Aunt Sylvia had furnished the money for his lodging and board in the city. The Reverend Mr. Duncan had arranged, through Boston friends, for the young man's entering the free class at the Art School. Mr. Booker was the first caller upon the returned voyagers. He was doing well and was building an addition to the Ocean House.

A year later the Cape Cod Item's Wapatomac correspondent devoted a full column to the wedding of Lettice Peel to David Booker. It was, he enthusiastically declared, a joyous occasion. This was, at least, partially true. The groom was radiant. Captain Eliphalet was triumphantly happy, and the Amarias Peels and the Crusits seemed contented. As for the bride, she looked (many people thought) rather solemn and not as interested in the proceedings as the center of attraction should be.

THE Bookers, David and Lettice, went on a honeymoon-trip to Niagara Falls and then came back to their native village to live at the Ocean House. Captain Eliphalet hired another housekeeper and continued to live in the B house. His son and his two daughters each urged him to come and live with them, but he refused. He visited them occasionally, but his visits were usually limited to "spending the day," and he almost never remained away from his own bed at night. During the first year he visited the Bookers more frequently than he did the Peels or the Crusits, and Amarias and Susanna were not less jealous of their half-sister on that account. Lettice during that year was almost a daily caller at her father's home. Then those calls, both his and hers, ceased. Amarias and Susanna noticed this and wondered. They were glad to notice it, but they did not understand. Something had happened to change the feeling between Lettice Booker and Eliphalet Peel, but what that something might be they could not guess.

And yet, had their father been in the habit of taking them into his confidence at any time since they were fifteen, if they had been given the slightest hint of the method pursued by him in the breaking off of the intimacy between Farley Crowell and Lettice, they might have guessed easily. Lettice had had no hint either, but when a hint came her way she began to suspect.

Since Lettice's marriage to David Booker Captain Eliphalet had been more thoughtful and kind to her than ever. He was always bringing her little presents. He was very solicitous concerning her happiness. Dave was a good husband, wasn't he? Um-hum. Well, he knew he would be. He could most generally tell a man when he saw one. A fellow who was smart and up to snuff, one who had a practical, common-sense business and attended to it, who was the fellow for a girl to tie to. She hadn't made any mistake.

"It was for your good, Lettice," he observed, in one of these conversations. "I knew it was and that's why I did it. I knew I was right and that some day you'd thank me for it."

He was off his guard for the moment and was speaking quite as much to himself as to her. But she lifted her eyes from her sewing and looked at him.

"What do you mean by that, father?" she asked curiously. "What did you do that I should thank you for?"

The captain started and came out of his reverie. He was confused, however, and still not his cautious self.

"Eh?" he queried. "What's that?—oh. nothin', nothin'. I was just thinkin' that your marryin' Dave had turned out to be the right thing, same as I knew it would be. That's all. If I'd kept my hands off and let you heave yourself away on that Crowell, 'twould have been a big mistake for both of us. That's all I meant. Well, there, it's most supper-time. I must be cruisin' back home."

He was moving toward the door, but she stopped him.

"Wait, father," she said. "What do you mean by keeping your hands off? Keeping them off what?"

"Oh, nothin'. I was talkin' in my sleep, I guess. Gettin' old and feeble in my top-riggin', I must be."

"But you meant something."

"No, I didn't. No, I didn't. Good night. See you to-morrow, I presume likely."

But she was certain he had meant something and the conviction set her thinking. What had he done, or considered that he had done, for which she could thank him? He must mean that in some way he had been influential in terminating the intimacy between Farley Crowell and herself. Yet he could not have been. She had broken the engagement—or it had been mutually broken.

Sitting there in the rocking-chair, her sewing forgotten, she continued to think. Why should her father seem to feel such a measure of responsibility for her marital happiness? Unless—by some means of which she had no knowledge—he had brought that marriage about. She had not thought of it before, but now it seemed to her as if her father's conscience was troubling him, as if he had done something of which he was secretly very much ashamed. As if he felt that he might have wronged her and was trying in every way to make up for that wrong.

It was from the Congregational minister that she first obtained the hint which put her on the track. David Booker was a Congregationalist—that is, whenever he did attend church it was at the chapel presided over by the Reverend Oswald Duncan. For the first six months after Lettice became his wife he was present at the Sunday services with her almost regularly. Of late his attendance had been limited to rainy Sabbaths. On those when the sun shone he preferred to exercise one of his fast horses over the road. He was fond of horses, and his male associates were of the horsey variety. Lettice liked horses, too, but she did not like some of her husband's friends. And the evening card-parties at the Ocean House in which David and those friends participated were noisy and protracted affairs. Lettice, alone in her room, could hear from the floor below the loud laughter and shouts which accompanied the game, and often it was two or three in the morning before her husband came up to join her. Occasionally it seemed to her that he had been drinking more than was good for him.

ONE Monday afternoon Mr. Duncan dropped in at the Ocean House. The Bookers had been absent from church the day before and he had called, he said, to make sure that neither of them was ill. Dave was out. He had gone fishing with a Boston hat and cap drummer who was spending a few days in Wapatomac and stopping at the hotel.

Duncan and Lettice chatted concerning church matters and then the conversation drifted to town affairs and the doings of mutual acquaintances. Farley Crowell's name was mentioned. It was the minister who mentioned it. He had had a letter from Farley. The latter was studying hard at the Art School, and, according to his own estimate, progressing.

"I must say I am highly gratified to hear it," declared Mr. Duncan. "In a way I was responsible for that young man's decision to abandon business and take up the development of the talent which the Almighty gave him. A waste of time business would have been, Mrs. Booker. I am sure of it. Aren't you?"

Lettice was sewing, as usual. She was always busy at something, usually housework, for the Ocean House and its hired help—a cook and a chambermaid—needed supervision. But it was four o'clock—the interval between dinner and preparation for supper—and she had a few minutes to herself.

"I don't know," she answered quietly. "If he had gone with those people in Boston, he might have done well there. They were interested in him, and it was a splendid chance."

"Oh, yes—yes, I suppose it was, for the average young man. But Farley Crowell is beyond the average. He loved nature and the beautiful, and he had a gift which few of us possess. The most he could have done in business was to make money—and what is

A Sure Way to End Dandruff

There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly, and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store and a four ounce bottle is all you will need. This simple remedy has never been known to fail.

money, after all? You can't buy the artist's genius with money, Mrs. Booker."

"No. But you can buy clothes and bread and butter and a place to sleep and live in with money, and if a person doesn't have to worry about those things, his mind ought to be a little freer to study and learn to be an artist, I should think. After he has learned—if he does really learn—then the money will come anyway, won't it?"

Mr. Duncan shook his head. "You have a practical mind, Mrs. Booker," he observed.

"Yes, perhaps I have. Being practical runs in our family. Father would call it common sense."

Her caller smiled triumphantly. "And yet it was your father who suggested my using my influence to prevent Farley's accepting the position offered to him by Jones & Corcoran," he declared.

Lettice sewed steadily, but she did not speak for a moment. Then she said; "Why, yes, I suppose it was."

"He has told you about his call at the parsonage, of course. At the time, he wished me not to mention it, but that was more than a year ago and, since you know of it, I presume he doesn't consider it a secret any longer. I confess I was surprised when he spoke so frankly against our friend's going with Jones & Corcoran and devoting all his time to art. Captain Peel's common sense is not altogether worldly, Mrs. Booker, far from it. If it had not been for his advice, I doubt if I should have counseled Farley as strongly as I did. And I have also learned that the captain spoke quite as earnestly to Miss Perry, the boy's aunt. All Farley's friends owe a great deal to your father, Mrs. Booker."

Lettice dropped a stitch, but she picked out the thread and went on with her work.

"Let me see," she observed. "When was it father came to see you about Farley?"

"I don't remember the exact date."

"No, of course you wouldn't. It doesn't matter. I had forgotten myself. But it was the same day he went to see Sylvia Perry about it."

"Yes, that same forenoon. And it was that afternoon that Farley had the telegram—no, it was the next morning that he got the telegram from Jones & Corcoran demanding an immediate answer. And the answer he sent was no. He thinks my advice and that of his aunt—and Mr. Godfrey's, too—he thinks and says that we three were responsible for his action. I haven't told him yet that it was Captain Peel who was really responsible. Farley Crowell should be very grateful to your father, Mrs. Booker. You will agree with me there."

She drew a long breath. "We should all be grateful to him," she said.

CAPTAIN Eliphalet visited the Ocean House the next day, but his daughter, so she said, was suffering from a headache and his visit was a brief one. But the following afternoon he came again, and found her quite ready to talk and with something to talk about. She had interviewed Sylvia Perry and Jabez Godfrey, and they, although unaware that they were telling her anything she did not already know, had supplied the missing pieces of the puzzle. In the direct way which was habitual with her, she taxed her father with having brought about the quarrel between Farley and herself.

At first he was inclined to deny it, but when she calmly ignored his protests, he admitted that he had used his influence to a certain extent.

"I did it for your good, Lettice," he declared. "I'm nigher sixty than I am fifty. I've seen consider'ble of this world and the folks in it, and I know what I'm about. I could see that you and that Crowell boy was gettin' sweet on each other, and that, if somethin' didn't happen to show you how fool-headed and no-account he was, you'd be for wreckin' your whole life by marryin' him and havin' him on your hands to support the rest of your days. I tried to tell you, but you wouldn't listen to me. You said——"

She interrupted. "I told you that neither you nor anybody else must interfere with my affairs," she said. "Affairs of that kind, I meant. You said that if I didn't tell Farley to stop coming to see me you would tell him. I said if you did I should meet him at other places. That is what I said."

"I know you did. And I made up my mind right then and there that the thing had gone far enough. Why, good Lord, Lettice! did you suppose I was goin' to lay to and hang up in the wind while the girl I think more of than I do of all the world put together—you needn't tell Amarias and Susanna I said that, but it's so—did you cal'late I was goin' to let you go to wrack and ruin by marryin' a fellow that couldn't do anything—and never will do nothin'—but sling a paint-brush? I guess not! Did you cal'late I was goin' to set down and fold my hands and have that happen? Not me—not Eliphalet Peel! Says I, 'I'll stop it—and I'll do it by showin' her just how no-'count he is.' That chance he had with Jones & Corcoran was a good one. You knew 'twas good and you told him so. You wanted him to take it."

"How did you know that I did?" asked Lettice calmly.

The captain choked and hesitated.

"Why—why," he stammered. "I—I knew because—because——"

"I told him I thought he ought to take it—yes, I did. But I only told him at home, my home, when he and I were alone. Did he say that I wanted him to take the place? Did he tell you so?"

"He? No, course he didn't. He never told me anything. He kept out of my way, took good care to keep out of it, too."

"Did anybody else tell you—his aunt or Mr. Duncan or Jabez Godfrey?"

"No. How would they know about it? Never mind that, Lettice. Let me tell you about——"

"But I do mind. How did you know I wanted him to take the position offered by Jones & Corcoran.

"Well—well, if you must know, I—I heard you tell him. You two was down in the dinin'-room and I was up-stairs and——"

"And you listened."

ELIPHALET'S face flamed. "Here, here! That's enough of that," he ordered. "Don't you talk to me that way. I didn't listen. I ain't the listenin' kind. My door was open, and I couldn't help hearin'. And when I did hear I realized 'twas high time somethin' was done. And I did it."

"Yes, you did it. You listened—oh, well, never mind—you heard without listening. And then, instead of coming to me, you went to Sylvia Perry and the minister and Jabez Godfrey and got them to influence Farley to do exactly what you knew I didn't want him to do. You did that, didn't you?"

"Yes, I did. But why did I do it? For the reasons I've been tellin' you. Because I'm a man that knows men, and I wanted you to see that Crowell wasn't a man. If he had been a real man, do you suppose likely he'd have let his aunt or the parson or the President of the United States change his mind for him after you and he had agreed to do the other thing? You bet your life he wouldn't! Do you cal'late I'd have changed my mind? Humph! I ain't the changin' kind."

Lettice smiled. "No, father," she agreed, "you're not. You made up your mind that I shouldn't marry Farley Crowell, and, after that, nothing was going to stand between you and having your own way. To have that you would do anything—no matter what."

"I did the right thing. I showed that fellow up for what he was. I tell you, Lettice, I saved you from supportin' him all your days. And, as for you, you've got a good smart husband, who——"

"Wait a minute. Father, when you made up your mind that I shouldn't marry Farley, you made it up at the same time that I should marry Dave, didn't you?"

Captain Eliphalet choked again. "Well—well," he admitted, "I knew that some day you was bound to marry somebody. That stood to reason. And Dave Booker was, same as I say, a smart, A-Number-One, pushin' fellow. He'd make you a good husband, I knew. He has made you a good husband, hasn't he?"

Lettice did not answer. Her father seemed to find her silence irritating.

"Why don't you say somethin'?" he demanded. "Hasn't he made you a good husband? Haven't you got a good home? Don't he give you anything you want? Answer me."

She answered then, but the answer was scarcely a reply to his question.

"I had a good home before," she said. "And you gave me everything I wanted—of that kind."

He threw his big body backward with a force which caused his chair to creak.

"What a way to talk that is!" he cried indignantly. "What fault have you got to find with Dave Booker? Come now! What's the trouble with him?"

"I haven't said that there was any trouble. You are the only one who has hinted at such a thing."

"Hinted? What do you mean by that? When have I hinted there was anything wrong with Dave?"

"Perhaps you haven't. But you are always asking me if he isn't a good husband and if I'm not happy. You ask me that about every time you come here."

"Eh? . . . Well—well, suppose I do? It's natural I'd want you to be happy, isn't it?"

"It is natural that you should want to prove you were right. You wanted me to marry Dave. You took care that I did marry him. You got what you started to get, just as I have heard you say a hundred times you always do. Now I suppose you'd like to have me tell you your way was the best way."

"Well, 'twas, wasn't it? Eh, wasn't it? You'll live to thank me, you mark my words. Yes, by godfreys, and you ought to thank me now!"

She turned on him then, her eyes ablaze.

"Thank you!" she repeated. "I—I—father, some time, perhaps, I may be able to forgive you for what you did. But now—now I can't. And I may as well tell you, for I know it is the truth, I shall never feel the same toward you as I have felt, or ever really trust you again."

He sprang from his chair. There were few people who during the past wenty years had spoken in that way to Captain Eliphalet Peel, and the few who did had regretted it.

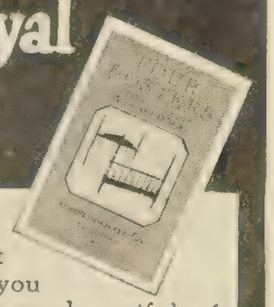
"Why, you—you—" he sputtered. "What do you mean by that? Ain't you ashamed of yourself to talk so to me—your father? Ain't you ashamed?"

"No, I'm not the one who ought to be ashamed."

"That's enough! I won't hear another word. The next time I come to this house it'll be when you ask me to, not afore."

She did not answer, and he strode to the door. Then he turned and made one more attempt at reconciliation.

"Oh, Lettice," he pleaded, "this is just cussed foolishness, all these actions of yours. Whatever I did I did for your good and nothin' else. Use your common sense."



She, too, rose. "Hush! hush!" she cried fiercely. "Don't ever say common sense to me, as long as you live. I don't want to quarrel with you, and I do want you to come and see me sometimes. But, as far as things between us being as they always have been—well, they never will be—they can't be."

He strode out, slamming the door behind him, and from that day on people in Wapatomac began to whisper that Lettice Booker and Captain Eliphalet were not as chummy as they had been. A thousand reasons were invented to account for the break in that chumminess, but none was the correct one. Lettice and Eliphalet kept that to themselves.

A COMMUNITY, even as staid and settled a community as ours used to consider itself, changes much in ten years. The next ten brought many changes to Wapatomac. The whole Cape was changing. From a section of towns and villages, self-supporting and sufficient unto themselves, it gradually became what it is now, a popular Summer resort. The well-to-do retired sea-captains, the majority of them, departed on their last and longest voyage. The horses and buggies and carryalls were superseded by motor-cars. The old houses were bought by people from the cities, sprouted porches and dormer windows, and were transformed into "cottages." The discarded and worthless rubbish in our garrets suddenly acquired value as "antiques." The sandy roads widened and straightened and hardened into macadam highways. They ceased to be roads and became streets. The Back Road of Wapatomac was rechristened Water Street. Duck Lane was Cross Street. The Main Road kept a portion of its old name and—as it was bound to do in America—was called Main Street.

The A B C houses—property of Captain Eliphalet Peel—standing as they did at the end of Cross Street and separating it from Water Street, became subjects of discussion at town-meeting and at meetings of the board of selectmen. A rumor had spread through the community that the selectmen were seriously considering the proposition of the town's buying the B house—the middle one of the three, that which Captain Eliphalet occupied—with the idea of tearing it down and extending Cross Street through the Peel property to a juncture with Water Street. Water Street, it was prophesied, was destined to be a business thoroughfare. Cross Street, running at right angles down to the town wharf, should have shops along it, would have if the two streets could be brought together. Buying the B house and the land upon which it stood would do just this. It was undoubtedly a brilliant idea, but would Captain Peel sell? That was the question.

NOAH Didlow was charged with the task of sounding the captain. He did his best to carry that mission to a successful fruition. Captain Peel listened patiently to his comments on the weather, the cranberry crop and similar introductory topics, but after a while he grew weary.

"There, there, Noah," he broke in, interrupting his vistor's lengthy dissertation on the market price of quahaugs, "you've been tackin' back and forth abreast the buoy for twenty minutes. Get under way, and into the channel, why don't you? What did you come to see me about?"

Noah drew a long breath and then dived headlong. He had come to ask the captain to sell the B house and its land to the town. He explained fluently why that purchase was necessary to Wapatomac's future.

Eliphalet heard him through. He pulled at his beard—nowadays that beard was gray—and smoked deliberately.

"How much will they give me?" he asked, when Mr. Didlow had finished his first attack.

"We-ll, I tell you. The selectman figger that real estate here ain't worth much, as things are, and that this little house and land, if they were put up for sale, wouldn't fetch more than fourteen hundred, if that. But they will give fifteen."

Captain Eliphalet rose and knocked the ashes from his pipe.

"Good night, Noah," he said.

Mr. Didlow's ample mouth opened wide.

"Why, Cap'n Peel!" he exclaimed. "Ain't that a fair offer?"

"It don't interest me any. Good night."

"But you couldn't possibly get more. Er—er—maybe they'd be willing to pay sixteen hundred."

"That don't interest me either. Good night. It's time I turned in."

"But—but—would seventeen—? You see, cap'n, the town needs——"

"To the devil with the town! As long as I live—and I don't know how long that'll be—I'm goin' to need a place to live in. This place suits me better than anywhere else, and so here's where I'll stay. You can tell the selectmen that, and they might as well understand I mean it. Well, are you goin', or shall I leave you down here in the settin'-room?"

Noah had risen, but he made one more plea.

"Why, Cap'n Eliphalet," he cried, "don't

I Bless The Men

Who really studied beauty

By Edna Wallace Hopper

WHAT I became, and what I am, I owe to men. Men experts took me as a plain girl and made me a famous beauty. Men scientists have taught me how to keep that beauty. Now I appear before thousands daily—on the stage—looking like a girl of 19.

For 40 years I have searched the world for the utmost in beauty helps. And men have supplied them—great scientists who devote their lives to beauty study. Now I am offering you what they gave me. And I know you will agree that they have evolved the greatest helps we know.

I ask you to try one at my cost—to show you what I have found.

Lovely Skin

Let me show you the way to my lovely skin—like a child's.

My Facial Youth—a supreme cleanser—is the first essential. A famous French beauty gave me the formula. It contains no animal, no vegetable fat. It cannot assimilate in any way with the skin. It simply cleans to the depths, then departs. All the grime, all the clogging matter departs with it.

You will say with me—that you never knew what a clean skin meant until you used Facial Youth.

My Youth Cream embodies a dozen factors which great experts have taught me. It contains all the best that modern science knows to foster, feed and protect the skin. Within 24 hours its results will amaze and delight you.

My Youth Cream comes in two types—cold cream and vanishing. One for night and one for day. I never leave my skin without it. How can women who see what it does for me use ordinary creams?

A Super-Clay

Clay must be considered the supreme help to women young or older. No woman can look her best without it, no woman can keep her youth.

But many know only the old-time clays, crude and muddy. There is now a new-type clay, white, refined and dainty. It is the final results of 20 years of scientific study.

My White Youth Clay is that modern production. No lover of youth and beauty can afford to go without it. It purges the skin of all that clogs and mars it. It draws out the causes of blackheads and blemishes. It combats all lines and wrinkles.

It brings the blood to the skin, so every user sees a rosy afterglow. Many women seem to drop ten years with one application. One use of my Youth Clay will show you that new beauty and new youth are at your call.

Hair Glory

My hair is the envy of millions. It is thick and luxurious—finer far than 40 years ago. I have never had falling hair or dandruff, never a touch of gray.

My Hair Youth is the reason. French experts gave me the basic ingredients. But other experts, devoting their lives to the hair, have given me ways to improve it.

Now I believe it embodies the best modern science knows. I apply it with an eyedropper, directly to the scalp. There it combats all that clogs and stifles the hair roots. It tones and stimulates. It does for the scalp what cultivation does for the garden. Then hair will flourish, just as flowers thrive under like attention.

Every girl or woman who learns what Hair Youth means to her will use it, as I do.

All druggists and toilet counters now supply Edna Wallace Hopper's Beauty Helps, exactly as I use them. Any girl or woman is welcome to try them at my cost. Let a little test show what they mean to you. Clip this coupon now.

you care anything about this town—the town you live in—anything about it's gettin' ahead? You used to."

Eliphalet's heavy brows drew together. His mouth twisted oddly.

"I used to care about a lot of things that I don't care about now," he snapped. "There, there, clear out and leave me alone. And keep on leavin' me that way."

So the B house remained where and as it was, and the captain remained in it. And, for the time at least, the plan to extend Cross Street through to Water Street was abandoned. Gossip wearied of the subject and busied itself with other matters.

THE affairs of David Booker and his wife began to be talked about. The first year of her married life was, for Lettice, a comparatively easy period. If she was not happy—as happy as she might have been under different circumstances and with another husband—at least she was not acutely unhappy. David was indulgent and good natured, in a careless, happy-go-lucky way, and when he began to neglect her for the society of masculine friends and acquaintances, she tried not to notice the neglect and to find excuses for it. But as the months passed those excuses were harder to find.

Before another year ended she had given up seeking them. Dave Booker had always been a country sport, but during the period of his courtship, when he entered himself in competition with Farley Crowell in the contest for Lettice Peel's favor, he had kept his sporting proclivities within bounds, attended to business and had apparently settled down. The settling lasted only a little while. Cards, horses and old-time associates regained their influence over him. Affairs at the Ocean House became entirely secondary to races at the county fairs and excursions to Boston, to Brockton and even as far as New York. Stories reached his wife's ears, stories which Wapatomac had whispered for months. Lettice refused to listen to them, and friends who came to warn her of her husband's "goings on" learned that such warnings meant the end of the friendship.

Among the warners was Captain Eliphalet. One evening—after the majority of Wapatomac citizens were in bed—he made one of his infrequent calls at the Ocean House. Lettice was alone, of course. Her husband was away, had been absent for two days. The captain sat down upon the worn sofa in the hotel parlor. That parlor was always clean—Lettice saw to that—but it needed renovating very much indeed.

At first they talked of unimportant things, matters of town gossip. Then Eliphalet plunged into the subject which had been in his mind for so long.

"Lettice," he said, "I didn't come here to talk about last week's thunder and lightnin' tempest. I came here to talk about you—you and Dave. Where is he?"

Lettice shook her head.

"I don't know," she replied simply.

"I'll bet you don't! Maybe you can guess: though. Maybe I could, without strainin' my upper riggin' any to speak of. He's up to Brockton, ain't he?"

"Perhaps he is. He didn't tell me where he was goin'."

"Huh! I guess not. But you know where he is and who—but never mind that. I've been learnin' a lot about Dave lately. Everybody knows what's up. Lettice, there's a limit to everything, and you've got to the limit. Give that damned swab of a husband of yours the go-by. Leave him. Walk out of this house now—and leave him. I'm your father and I tell you to."

She looked at him. "So you want me to leave Dave," she said.

"I've been sayin' I do, haven't I?"

"But you were the one who wanted me to marry him. Perhaps—I don't know—but perhaps I should never have married him if it hadn't been for you."

Her father frowned. It was hard indeed for Eliphalet Peel to admit that he had made an error in judgment.

"Well—maybe that's so," he said reluctantly. "Maybe 'tis, but nobody's right every time. I cal'late I'm as nigh right on the average as the reg'lar run, but it looks as if I wasn't when I—er—let you marry Dave Booker. Anyhow I tell you to quit him now and come back and live along with me. Nobody'll blame you. Everybody'll say you've done just the right thing. Will you, Lettice?"

She shook her head. "No, father," she said calmly.

"You won't! Why not?"

"Because—well, because I won't."

"Just because you've got a grudge against me, and you're too stubborn to forget it. I'm willin' to forget it. That's what I came here to tell you. Suppose I was wrong? I did what I did just for your good and nothin' else, didn't I?"

She smiled faintly. "I think you did it because you intended to have your own way," she announced. "But that doesn't make any difference now. I was to blame, too. I shouldn't have married Dave. I never really wanted to. But I did, and so I must pay for it, that's all."

"You've paid enough already. Come on now! Do as I tell you to."

"I did as you told me to before."

"Be still! Stop heavin' that at me all the time. I'm sick of hearin' it. Suppose I'd let you marry that Farley Crowell? Do you cal'late you'd have been any better off? Where would you have been if you'd hitched up with him? Takin' in washin' to pay the bills, that's where you'd have been. Eh? I'm right, there, ain't I?"

She did not reply. He choked back his wrath and made one more plea.

"Come, come, Lettice," he begged, "leave Dave and his gamblin' and—and all the rest of it, and come back to the old place and me."

"No, father."

"Good godfreys, girl, what ails you? Haven't you got any self-respect? Here he's traipsin' around with another woman, and——"

She interrupted then. "Stop," she ordered. "I don't want to hear another word of that kind. You don't know that that is true—that about—another woman. Do you know it?"

He hesitated. "Well—no," he admitted. "I don't know it, exactly. But all hands are sayin' it."

"I don't care what they say. When I know it—if I ever do—I shall leave him. But even then I shan't come back to live with you, father. I shall have enough self-respect not to do that."

"Don't talk so! Course you will. I want you to. Everybody'll expect you to."

"Will Amarias and Susanna expect me to—and want me to?"

"Amarias and Susanna! What the blazes have they got to do with it? I want you to, and that's enough."

"Not quite, this time. The next move I make will be what I want, and what I know is best, not what any one else wants. I have had enough of that."

"Oh, Lettice, use common sense."

She sighed. "I mean to use it," she said. "Only from now on it will be mine."

He gave up then and turned to go.

"Oh, dear!" he groaned. "I used to be proud to think you was so much of a Peel. Now I—I don't know but I'm sorry. All us Peels are too stubborn for our own good. Ah-hum! I guess I'm a fool."

It was an amazing confession, coming from him, and, in spite of her resentment and misery, she pitied him. There was a gentler note in her voice when she next spoke.

"Perhaps we've both been fools, father," she said. "And now we must go through with our foolishness to the finish. It looks that way to me."

DAVID BOOKER was killed in an automobile accident. He and Lettice had been married nearly four years when it happened. Dave and a quartette of roisterers were driving down the Cape at night from the Brockton fair, and the car went off the road near Buzzard's Bay and was smashed to splinters. All five of its occupants were badly injured, but Booker's hurts were fatal and he died soon after being taken from the wreck. When his affairs were adjusted by Lawyer Norris Barnes, son of the Lawyer Barnes who had settled Adoniram Peel's estate when Captain Eliphalet inherited it, it was disclosed that there was practically nothing left for the widow. The horses had been sold long before, the automobile was utterly ruined and without insurance, the Ocean House was mortgaged beyond its value. A life-insurance policy of a thousand dollars was all Lettice had when the last bill was paid. With it she leased a small apartment on the lower floor of the New Ryder Block on Main Street, installing a little furniture in the two rear rooms, and, in the front, opening a shop, in which was sold, according to its sign, "Notions, Fancy Goods and Confectionery." She attended to the customers herself and did her own housekeeping.

People said it was an awful come-down for a Peel. Amarias Peel and Susanna Crusit said it in the bosom of their own families, adding always that she had got just what she deserved by marrying a scamp like David Booker. In public they did not mention her name. They considered her a disgrace and ignored her.

CAPTAIN ELIPHALET, whatever his feelings, stoutly defended his youngest daughter's independence.

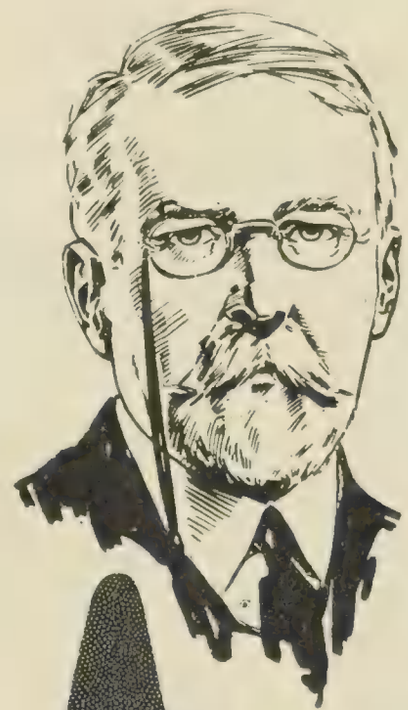
"She's a Peel," he declared, "and no Peel ever set signals askin' help from anybody. I cal'late she's got the right to steer her own course, if she wants to."

This to the town in general, but to Lettice his attitude had been vastly different. They had argued stormily, but to no avail, and voiced a furious protest.

He could see that she meant to go through with her store plan, no matter how much he begged her to live once again with him.

"Go through with it then!" he roared. "I don't suppose God A'mighty could stop you, let alone your father. But I tell you this, girl. Don't you ever expect to get any help from me. You won't get it, while I'm alive or after I'm dead. Not one red cent."

"All right, father. I won't expect it."



The little shop did a correspondingly little business at first. Later, especially during the Summer when the city visitors came, it did more, but always it was a puzzle to Wapatomac how Lettice Booker managed to make a go of it. She did, somehow; that was obvious, for the shop remained open, and she continued to live in the two rooms at its rear. No one save herself was aware how careful the managing had to be, nor how frugal the living. She never discussed her private affairs with any one, not even her father. He never called at the shop, but once a week she visited him at the B house. Of Amarias and Susanna she saw practically nothing. They spoke to her when they did meet, and she spoke to them, but that was the extent of the familiarity.

Meanwhile Captain Eliphalet continued to live his own lonely life, keeping more and more to himself and apparently taking less and less interest in matters which had formerly been so important to him. Mrs. Becky Cahoon, abandoning her fruitless efforts to convince her landlord that repairs to the C house were absolutely necessary, abandoned the house itself and moved into more attractive quarters. Nellie Atkins, the doctor's daughter, remained beneath the leaky roof of the A house two years longer, and then she, too, moved out. The captain did not seem to care. Even when the houses at either side of the one in which he lived were vacant, he refused to put them into tenantable condition. The local real-estate agents remonstrated with him, so also did the Amarias Peels and Crusits, but he would not listen.

In April, 1917, the United States entered the great war. Then followed the excitement of enlistments, bond drives, Red Cross drives and the draft. For a time it seemed that the thrill which had awakened his country had aroused Eliphalet Peel from his indifference and lethargy. His interest was not the acute energetic leadership which it would have been ten years before, but no appeal for funds was made to which he did not respond, and the flag on the pole at the B house was kept flying night and day. Then came the Armistice, the celebrations, and the gradual return to prewar peace and quiet.

And then, in the Spring of 1920, Farley Crowell came back to Wapatomac.

TAKING BOARDERS

and religion, and talk local politics, books, plays and cross-word puzzles—things like that."

It was system and homelikeness which were declared supremely important by the next proprietor from whom information was obtained, a woman who, with her daughter, has for many years run a successful up-to-date boarding-house of quite another type from any yet described. It is on a smaller scale than the average modern boarding-house, as only ten regular boarders are accommodated. But in efficiency, ingenuity, up-to-the-minute devices and all-round expert management, it is typical of the new order of things.

"I think our success," declared this woman, "has been chiefly due to the fact that our enterprise has been conducted on a strictly business plan. We charge enough for board and rooms to give us, we think, a fair profit, and by keeping close track of all expenses, we make sure that we are maintaining that margin of profit. Our charges are never made by guesswork, or because the landlady in the next block asks such and such a price. Then, too, realizing that homelikeness is the chief advantage a boarding-house has over a hotel, we do all in our power to make our guests feel absolutely at home."

"We take pains to keep the house and rooms warm," declares this proprietor; "and still I think we do not use an excess of coal. For during the day, when many of the rooms are not occupied, we turn off the radiators, turning them on again before we expect the occupant back. In the Summer we have the windows carefully screened, and we have a few inexpensive electric fans which we use on very hot nights in the dining-room and bedrooms."

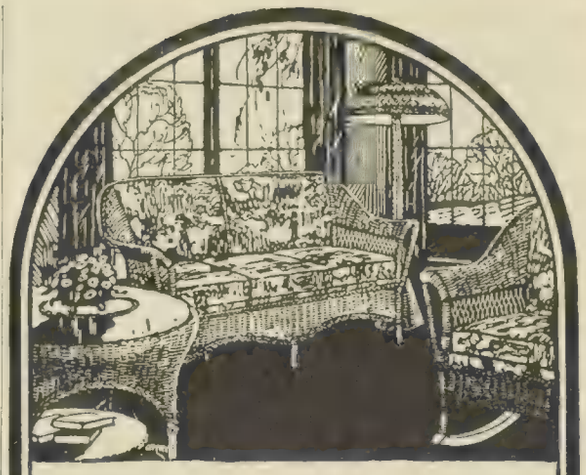
For the use of the women guests a sewing-machine stands in the upper hall near the window, and in the cellar are set tubs for light laundry. The house rents out an electric iron for ten cents an hour, thereby making a tiny margin of profit. In the kitchen are most of the conveniences used in large restaurants—a food-chopper, a fireless cooker for preparing cereals overnight, and a mechanical apple-parer and fruit-huller.

In one corner of the hostess's own bedroom is a writing-desk, and this is the actual headquarters of her business. Here, exacting though her kitchen duties may be, she manages to keep a little set of books. She renders a formal bill to each guest, which he receives with his mail. And she pays all her own bills by check, thus having a positive receipt for every transaction.

To quote her own words: "There is one other custom in our dining-room that is extremely radical for a boarding-house. In the bottom of our buffet is a small cupboard; and here we make it a point always to keep a little cheese, perhaps a bit of cold ham or some peanut butter, a supply of crackers and a jar of hard cookies.

"We have never had a guest who has not seemed delighted with this custom. Trifling enough in itself, it is one of the little touches that make our guests feel as if they were, indeed, in a home of their own.

"That is how we want them to feel. It is on that basis we have built up our business so successfully."



"What do you think is the quickest way of making money in this industry?" the visitor asked, as she said good-by at the door.

"Oh—running a tea-room and boarding-house combined, of course. I know a woman in this city who has cleared $25,000 in a little over sixteen years that way."

This was the same proprietor the interviewer had heard about before. And she lost no time in finding this successful woman's place, a big comfortable stone house on the corner of two residential streets, and in entering the tea-room.

It was the noon hour, and the bright, attractive tea-room was packed with men and women clerks from the State Capitol around the corner. The visitor was led down the hall to an office behind the tea-room, and here Mrs. Y——, a cheery little woman with keen, twinkling brown eyes, protested laughingly that there was nothing extraordinary in her success. It seemed to amuse her that any one should think her achievement remarkable.

Yes, she had made about $25,000 in sixteen years. That is, she now owned her house, and had recently refused $25,000 in cash for it. Besides, she had a few thousands in the bank.

"What was your capital when you started?"

"My children were my capital. They gave me something to work for."

This proprietor usually caters to men roomers only; and she can accommodate fourteen. Besides, she runs the big tea-room on a meal-ticket basis. Each meal-ticket is seven dollars for a grown-up, five dollars for a child. And this purchases any twenty-one meals the patron desires. The transient rate is fifty cents for any meal on week days and seventy-five cents for Sunday dinner. A great many transients are accommodated. And the transient trade alone covers the cost of desserts for all.

"Do you find men easier or harder to cater to than women?"

She thought for a moment.

"I might find men easier if I had idle women to suit. But the ones who eat here are all business women. And they are exactly like business men—easily pleased."

"You think the tea-room business helps to make the boarding experiment a safe one?" the interviewer asked.

She declared very positively that it did.

"In the Summer, when some of my rooms are empty, my tea-room is always full. I have fewer business people then, but more motorists."

The tea-room, which consisted of two large parlors, was bright and up to date. Cheerful cretonne hung at the windows, and the tables were enameled jade green. Table-cloths and cloth napkins were used. The floors were bare. Each table could seat from four to eight people. Up-stairs the bedrooms were sunny and bright, plain and very comfortable. The proprietor had studied carefully the needs of her small-salaried public, and had met those needs successfully.

"Tell me," urged the visitor finally, as she rose to leave, "what you consider the most important points to be remembered if one is to make money in the boarding-house or tea-room business? What things would you advise a beginner to stress?"

After a long moment, she replied:

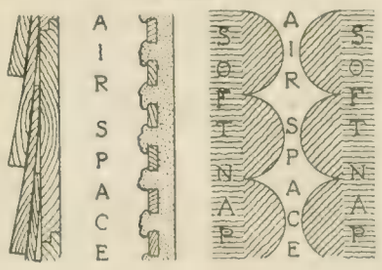
"Careful buying. And taking a real interest in the work. You must be willing to get up at dawn and go to bed late, instead of depending on your help to get the early breakfasts and attend to the last things at night. "Then, there are other things—clean rooms, fresh air, sunlight, plenty of bedcovers, sheets long enough to turn over and tuck under, good cooking, bathroom faucets that stay turned on instead of the kind you have to keep pinching, fresh curtains, enough bath-towels, plenty of hot water, and good steam-heat. Those are some of the things guests mention particularly."

Then she added hastily, as we parted at the street door:

"System, of course, is essential. And homelikeness."

"The greatest of which is homelikeness," the visitor thought as she sauntered down the quiet street. She was gratified to have found out what happens when a modern woman goes into the business of home-making on a generous scale. Contentment and happiness for that great class of people who board; financial success and independence for herself; splendid returns, surely. Such a woman can hardly be termed a landlady. She is worthy the more shining name of hostess. And her business becomes a center for good deeds, kindliness and community betterment. A privilege and an opportunity!

ESMOND



BLANKETS

Have you examined Esmond Blankets? There are patterns and color schemes to fit your ideas of decoration and of good taste. All Esmond Blankets are moth proof and fade proof. The name Esmond means quality and wear in bed blankets, blanket comfortables, baby blankets and Indian and sport blankets. Look at them at your favorite store and remember the name, it is important —ESMOND. Made in America.

SELLING AGENTS, NEW YORK CITY

Through the centuries it has been proven that the double walled house is the only warm house—that an air space is necessary between the outer wall and the inner wall to retain the warmth in the house and keep the cold out. All good houses are insulated with an air space between the outer and inner walls. This is also the Esmond process of Blanket manufacture.

Esmond Blankets are woven two-in-one—two walls with an air space between Esmond Blankets are single blankets with the warmth of a pair. In the Esmond process, only one side of the yarn is fuzzed which makes the Esmond stronger, besides warmer, than a blanket made in the ordinary way with only one strand fuzzed on both sides. All Esmond Blankets have the air space between—it is the Esmond process.

36 bust and 38 hip require 3⅜ yards 54-inch twill for suit. Lower edge of skirt, plaits drawn out, 1¾ yard.

Coat is for ladies 33 to 44 bust; blouse for ladies 32 to 44 bust; skirt for ladies 35 to 49½ hip.

5983—Paris sends us the jabot frock with a straight lower edge. Use printed crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, satin, radium, failles, crosswise designs, novelty crêpe satin, novelty faille and satin with plain chiffon or Georgette to match, etc. The jabot is fastened to this one-piece slip-over frock.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 35-inch material with crosswise designs, 1½ yard 35-inch contrast. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is becoming to ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5961—The detachable cape, notched collar and trimming details are smart on this new Spring coat. Kasha, camel's-hair twills, cheviot, homespun, tweeds, tweed flannel, mixtures, plaid coatings or suède-finished coatings are suitable to use. Lower edge 49½ inches.

36 bust requires 3⅝ yards 54-inch kasha.

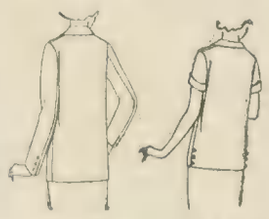
The coat is smart for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5981—5228—5964—5952—Use flannel, kasha, camel's-hair twills, plaids or tweeds for this ensemble costume composed of a coat, the new two-piece skirt with shoulder-straps and a slip-over blouse with clusters of tucks in front. The hat has a six-gored crown.

36 bust and 38 hip require 4⅛ yards 54-inch flannel for costume, 2¼ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine. Lower edge 51½ inches.

Coat is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses; blouse for ladies 32 to 44 bust; skirt for ladies 38 to 40 bust, also misses 15 to 20 years. Hat for ladies, misses, girls.

5980—Tiny pinch-like plaits at the hip in back give an easier fitting to this one-piece slip-over dress at the hipline. It has a straight lower edge. Use novelty faille and satin, crosswise designs, printed heavy silk crêpe with plain to match, bordered heavy silk crêpe or crêpe satin, bordered or half-and-half wools, etc.



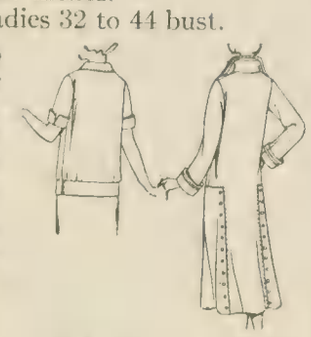
36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch novelty faille-and-satin. Lower edge 44½ inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

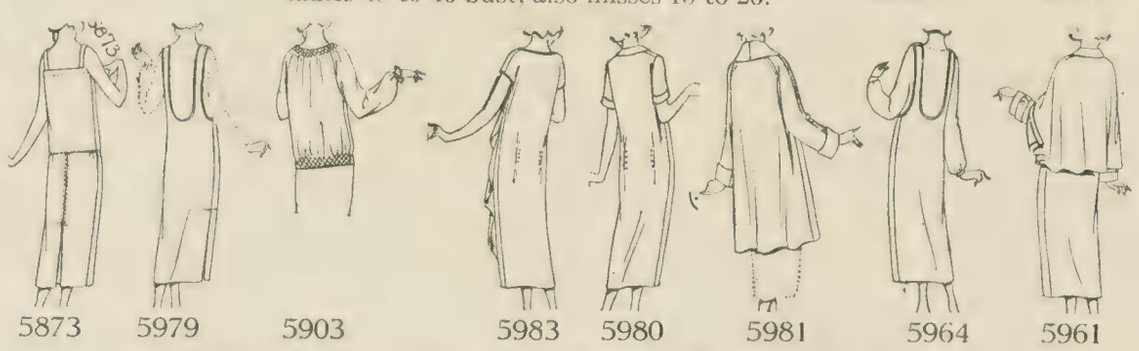
5957—The smart flare of the coat is achieved by the circular sides which are in one piece with the front. The pocket is in the lining. Make the coat of cashmere coatings, suède-finished coatings, soft pile fabrics with floss stitchings; or with braid use soft twills, kasha, broadcloth, ribbed silks or satin.

36 bust requires 4⅜ yards 39-inch corded silk. Lower edge 63 inches.

The coat is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.



5982 5956



5903—5979—With the new shoulder-strap skirt wear a peasant blouse of cotton voile or crêpe de Chine and make the three-piece skirt of flannel, kasha, camel's-hair twills or twills with silk braid bindings or pipings of same material in contrast. The skirt has an inverted plait at the lower part of each seam.

36 bust and 38 hip require 3⅛ yards 35-inch cotton voile, 1⅝ yard 54-inch twill. Lower edge plait out, 1⅞ yard.

Blouse is for figures 32 to 40 bust; skirt for ladies 38 to 40 bust, also misses 15 to 20.

5927—10303—The inserted plaits on each side of the front of this one-piece slip-over dress mark it as very new. It has the close-fitting hipline. Use crêpe satin, flat crêpe or Canton crêpe with center of scarf of Georgette to match dress or the color of embroidery. This embroidery is easily done.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch crêpe satin. Lower edge, plaits out, 54½ inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5975—10268—The loose panels of this one-piece frock have an unusual line and are joined at the hipline. The dress slips on over the head. Use crêpe satin, plain crêpe de Chine or Georgette with embroidery or lace banding, printed crêpe de Chine or Georgette with plain to match, crêpe satin with Georgette. The embroidery should be worked in harmonious colors.

36 bust requires 3⅝ yards 39-inch Georgette. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5971—Paris puts the flare in the front of a one-piece frock and cuts the back in one piece. The circular front of this slip-over dress is joined to the upper part below the hipline. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, heavy crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin with same material in contrast; or printed crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe or radium with plain to match.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 39-inch satin crêpe. Lower edge 44 inches.

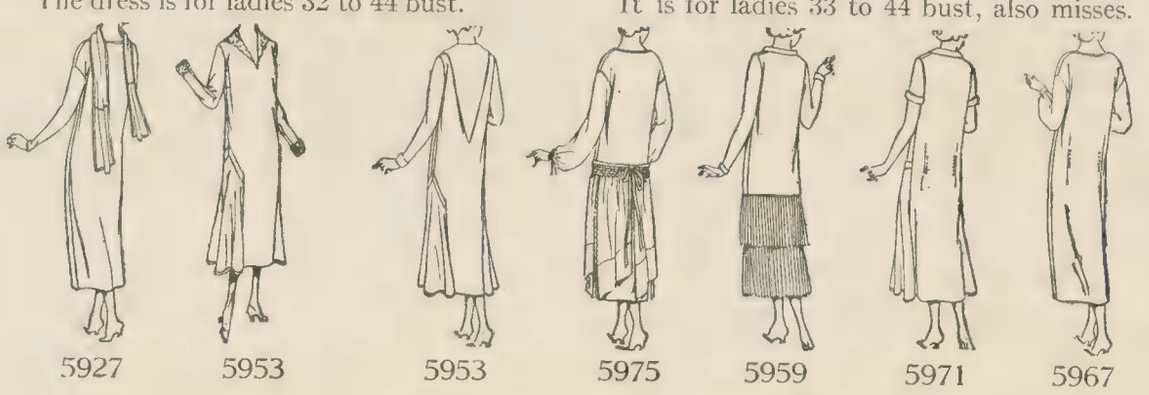
The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5953—The interesting points of this slip-over dress come at each side in the pointed circular sections and in the long collar, which, with the cuffs, may be detachable. The dress has a close-fitting hipline. Use printed heavy crêpe de Chine, radium or silk crêpe or plaids with plain to match, etc.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 39-inch printed silk. Lower edge 44½ inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5959—Straight flounces, which may be accordion or side plaited, give a graceful line to this one-piece slip-over dress with a close-fitting hipline. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin with same material in contrast; printed crêpe de Chine, radium or Canton crêpe with plain to match or with Georgette flounces.



36 bust requires 4¼ yards 39-inch flat crêpe. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is becoming to ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5967—A delightful one-piece frock is extraordinarily simple by virtue of its cut and because it is self-trimmed with its own bordered silks or cottons, printed crosswise designs or novelty printed robes, for the border, etc., furnishes the trimming. This slip-over dress has a straight lower edge and the tiny plaits in back give a little ease while preserving the straight lines.

36 bust requires 1⅝ yard 56-inch bordered material. Lower edge 44 inches.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

Coat is for juniors and girls 8 to 15; dress for girls 4 to 10; hat for girls 2 to 12.

5922—5966—For this ensemble suit use soft twills, serge or broadcloth for the box coat and slip-over dress with crêpe de Chine in side body, etc. The flannel hat is smart.

14 years requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch twill and 1⅜ yard 39-inch silk crêpe for upper part of dress with long sleeves.

Suit is for juniors and girls 6 to 15 years; hat for girls, misses, ladies.

Now a new way to Remove Cold Cream

FOR years stage stars have known this secret of clear, radiant complexions. It is part of their stock-in-trade. Who ever saw an actress whose skin had infections, blackheads, pimples? Yet actresses make-up several times a day. Their skin is constantly exposed to hard use—yet remains charming.

Now you, too, may know this secret of famous stage beauties. It is simply the use of Kleenex in removing cold cream and cosmetics each night. This soft velvety absorbent is made of Cellucotton.

Towels often cause infections; they are expensive. Kleenex, at all drug and department stores, costs but 25c. A box contains about 200 sheets (size 6 by 7 in.) and lasts about a month. Use it once, throw it away. It's cheaper, better, safer. Beauty experts advise its use.

Today get a box of Kleenex and find out why it's so popular.

An Elizabeth Arden Treatment

Says ELIZABETH ARDEN

A relaxed contour is as much to be dreaded as wrinkles or skin blemishes. To appear youthful, you must keep your contour firm and smooth. Pat, lift and mould the facial muscles with Ardena Skin Tonic, and again with my Special Astringent, to brace and strengthen the tissues, restore their tone and elasticity, keep them firm in the keen upward curves of a youthful contour. Use a Patter for brisk resilient strokes.

Ardena Skin Tonic. Tones, firms, whitens and refines the skin. 85c, $2, $3.75

Flawless Cheeks and other Beauty Secrets

By Mme Maree

To have the skin of fine texture so as to erase the crows feet, lines and wrinkles and tighten up the pores, get two ounces of eptol from the drug store. The usual price is 65 cents. Mix it with a tablespoon of glycerine and a pint of water. It thickens at once to a rich, heavy cream. Spread a thin coating around the eyes, temples and on the forehead, then over the cheeks; rub it in until absorbed. Instantly it begins work on the pores, tightens them, the outer dead skin disappears, new skin comes at once, the lines, crows feet, wrinkles fade out, the cheeks become smooth, look plump with the appearance of real, girlish health. Eptol is certainly the daintiest of skin beautifiers and mixed as above lasts for months.

For Beautiful Hair

If you will get from the drug store an ounce of beta-quinol costing but 65 cents and mix it with a half pint of rubbing alcohol and a half pint of water, you will have a hair treatment to reward you beyond price.

Each time it is used you just simply revel in the beauty it imparts to the hair. It is colorless and yet you can take blonde, brunette or titian hair that is coarse, straight and dead-like, apply a little beta-quinol to the scalp, when lo! each hair freshens. It takes on a glint or shimmer, it stands out alone, and whether cut short or hangs in great masses, it becomes as hair should, light, feathery and fluffy, or will keep curl, wave or straight as you prefer to wear it. Beta-quinol is a wonder and is very inexpensive.

Banish the Blackheads

I have found that sprinkling powdered neroxin on a cloth dipped in hot water is the quickest and best way to remove blackheads. Gently pat over the skin where the blackheads are, then rub briskly and every last blackhead, big and little, will be dissolved without leaving a trace. You can get neroxin at any drug store. An ounce, costing 65 cents.

When Skin is Muddy

If it is freckles, muddiness, red spots, sallowness and the shining, oily skin that makes you think you look like a fright, just mix an ounce of zintone and two tablespoons of your ordinary glycerine and a half pint of water. Rub this on your face, arms, neck and shoulders and I will wager you will hardly know yourself. The effect is magical. You can get the zintone at any drug store for 65 cents and thus have your skin as clear and dainty as the lily.

To Cleanse Scalp

Twenty-five cents worth of eggol, at any drug store, will give you enough for a dozen creamiest, frothiest shampoos you ever had. It dries right away, fluffs out beautifully and makes your head feel fine.

For the Week-end

I am so anxious for you to try my beauty secrets that I have had prepared one of each ready for use all put up in a neat package, enough of each article to last several days. Send me 25 cents and I will send you a package by mail.

5965—10191—An excessively smart ensemble costume is composed of a straight-line coat worn in either straight-line or wrap-around style and a one-piece slip-over dress with a straight lower edge. Use ribbed wools with a flat crêpe dress, or ribbed silks, crêpe satin, cashmere suitings, soft twills or kasha with a silk crêpe dress in the same color, a lighter shade, etc. The embroidery should repeat the color of the lining when the dress and coat are the same color. Lower edge of coat 49 inches; of dress 44½ inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch silk crêpe for dress, 2⅜ yards 54-inch twill for coat.

The ensemble costume is attractive for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5923—The new inverted "kick" plait at the center front gives you more freedom in walking, but does not widen the silhouette of this one-piece slip-over frock. The dress is close-fitting at the hipline, and the collar, jabot and cuffs may be detachable. Use soft twills, cashmere dress goods or kasha with silk crêpe or faille silk in contrast or same material in contrast; or use silk crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin, with contrasting crêpe de Chine, etc. Lower edge, plaits out, 53 inches.

The dress is becoming to ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5916—5951—Use soft twills for this ensemble costume, using the plain for the three-quarter length coat and striped or plaid twills with plain for the slip-over dress. The dress has straight lower edges in tunic effect and a one-piece slip. You may use cashmere suiting or coatings, ribbed wools, etc., for coat and novelty crosswise designs, etc., for dress.

36 bust requires 3 yards 54-inch twill (including dress) with 2 yards 40-inch striped material. Lower edge of slip 44½ inches.

Coat is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses; dress for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

36 bust requires 1¾ yard 39-inch silk crêpe for body, 1 yard 54-inch soft twill for lower part, etc. Lower edge, plaits out, 51½ inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5949—A three-quarter coat is very good style with a long-body frock. The wrap-around lower part is straight and the dress is close fitting at the hipline and slips on over the head. Use ribbed wools with flat crêpe, broadcloth or heavy silk crêpe with satin, satin with silk crêpe in a harmonizing color, the same color or a lighter shade of same color; or use cashmere suitings, soft twills, with silk crêpe, etc. Lower edge 43 inches.

36 bust requires 1½ yard 39-inch silk crêpe for upper part, 1 yard 54-inch ribbed wool for lower part, etc.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5934—A separate cape matching a one-piece slip-over frock is very French and makes a smart ensemble costume. The collar and cuffs on the dress may be detachable. Use soft twills or cashmere dress goods with long sleeves, or kasha, flannel, ribbed silks or heavy satin with long or short sleeves, contrasting crêpe de Chine or plaid or printed silk for the collar and cuffs, and matching silk braid on the cape.

36 bust requires 3⅜ yards 54-inch kasha. Lower edge of dress 44 inches.

The ensemble costume is smart for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

OTHER VIEWS ARE ON PAGE 31

5978—10233—This one-piece slip-over dress has the new inverted "kick" plaits and is close fitting at the hipline. The collar and cuffs are detachable and there is a French body lining. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine or satin crêpe with same material in contrast or with lace; or soft twills, etc., with contrasting silk crêpe. Work the motifs in a harmonizing color.

36 bust requires 4⅛ yards 39-inch silk crêpe. Lower edge, plaits out, 2⅛ yards.

The dress is for ladies 34 to 52 bust.

5976—A one-piece dress draped slightly at the left side of front and made of crêpe satin, crêpe faille, silk crêpe or brocaded velvet on a chiffon or Georgette ground is a very distinctive style for evening. This slip-over dress has a separate one-piece slip which may have sleeves for day wear. With the silk fabrics use the same material or lace for sleeves, Georgette with brocaded fabrics.

36 bust requires 2⅞ yards 39-inch satin crêpe. Lower edge 42½ inches.

The dress is for ladies 36 to 48 bust.

5941—10263—Flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, heavy crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin or broché silk crêpe makes a graceful one-piece draped dress. It is wrapped around at the lower part and slips on over the head. The sleeves which are sewed onto the body lining may be omitted. An embroidered motif decorates the hip drapery.

36 bust requires 4 yards 39-inch satin crêpe. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is smart for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5933—Soft cascade draperies flutter from a one-piece frock with a straight lower edge and a separate one-piece slip with sleeves for day. It slips over the head and may be made of printed crêpe de Chine with plain to match for slip, printed Georgette, chiffon, etc., with crêpe de Chine slip to match. Without sleeves use flesh-colored Brussels net for upper part of slip; with sleeves match color of sleeves. Lower edge of slip 43 inches.

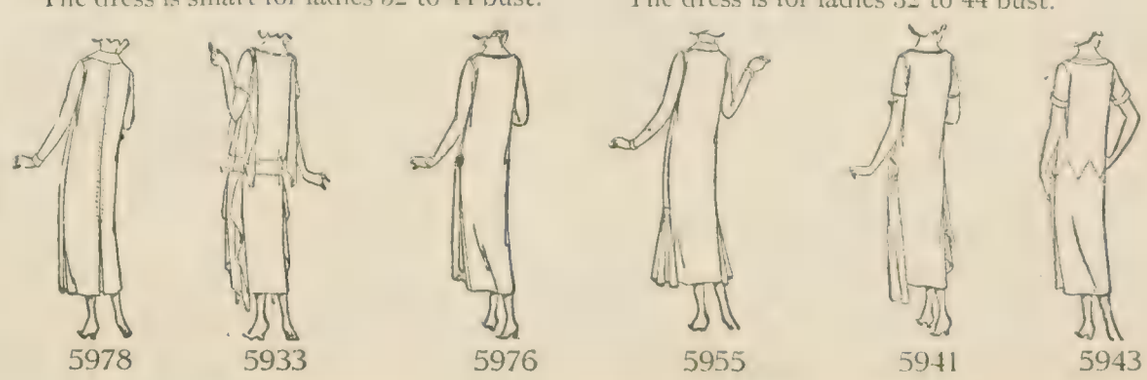
The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5955—10223—The new "hem flare" is accomplished by means of a circular flare across the front of this one-piece dress. It is close fitting at the hipline and slips on over the head. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin with same material in contrast. The embroidery is effective. Without embroidery use printed silk crêpe, etc.



36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch silk crêpe (circular flare cut crosswise to avoid piecing). Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5943—Cashmere suitings, soft twills or kasha are smart for the straight wrap-around lower part of this slip-over dress with its unusual outline and faille silk or silk crêpe for the long body. You may use ribbed wools with flat crêpe, ribbed silks with silk crêpe, heavy silk crêpe with satin etc.

36 bust requires 1⅝ yard 39-inch flat crêpe (for body), 1¾ yard 39-inch corded silk (for lower part, etc.). Lower edge 43 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

From a Maryland Farm House

Readers of Sophie Kerr's story, "No Man's Gift," in this issue may recall that when they read her novels "One Thing is Certain" or "Painted Meadows" they wished they knew something more about the personality of an author who could present her Maryland farmer folk with such humor and skill. Fortunately there is an old letter of Miss Kerr's which—perhaps because she once served an editorial apprenticeship on a woman's magazine—tells in a few words the kind of thing that makes you feel better acquainted. "I had expected," she wrote, "when I gave up office work, to find my leisure time an embarrassment. I planned so many things to do, how I would see all my friends often, how I would travel, read, do all sorts of delightful things that double work had before made impossible. But I've done none of them. I haven't nearly as much time as I had when I hadn't any time at all, and that's the honest truth.

"If only I could arrange a multiple existence—one life for work; one for the machinery of life, housekeeping, getting clothes made, shopping; one for seeing my friends, travel, visiting; one life for the other diversions such as music, the theater, clubs, politics; one life for just plain loafing. Now that would be wonderful. But to crowd it all into twenty-four hours a day—no, too much of it gets squeezed out.

"What do I like the most? Comfort, I think. And old painted satinwood, and cats, and prize-fights, and dancing, and Spanish shawls, and looking at the ocean, and having my own way. And I dislike argument, and perfume, and fat women, and people who tell the sort of lies that simply insult your intelligence, and men who begin letters 'Dear Lady,' and long earrings, and intolerance."

Tommy Tiptoe in Opera

"I hear that married life is very hard," writes an eight-year-old young lady to Miss Harriet Ide Eager, Editor of THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, apropos of her story of the poor Queen Bee, who had to lay so many eggs. Miss Eager, incidentally, is proud of being the only editor who receives letters beginning with "Dearest One" and signed "Respectfully yours." Married life for parents has been made measurably more bearable since the advent of Tommy Tiptoe, that valiant hero of THE LITTLE DELINEATOR pages, whose wonderful adventures in the insect world have been of such absorbing interest as to keep much of Young America out of mischief. A few weeks before the 1924 holiday season Tommy became the hero of a very popular book for children, and more recently began to grace the amateur operatic stage. "Ladybug, Ladybug" is the first of a series of little operas for children, with librettos by Miss Eager and music by Samuel Richard Green. A unique service to users of the operettas is an arrangement whereby advice about making costumes, including suggestions for designs, materials and colors, will be supplied free of charge by the Butterick Company.

The Care of Young Hearts

Pediatrics is defined by the dictionary makers as the department of medical science that relates to hygienic care of children and the treatment of the diseases peculiar to childhood. It is the specialty of Dr. Borden S. Veeder, who is Professor of Pediatrics in Washington University, St. Louis, Missouri, and Physician of the St. Louis Children's Hospital. In next month's DELINEATOR he makes a very important contribution to "The Happy Child" health series in an article on heart trouble in children. One of the grave national health problems now being seriously studied is the alarming increase from year to year in the number of deaths from heart disease and the future of over four hundred thousand children in America now known to have defective hearts of one kind or another. Doctor Veeder doesn't dwell so much on this condition, however, as he does on information that is of more immediate personal interest to parents. How the heart works, what causes heart trouble, the relative seriousness of heart diseases, how children contract them and what can be done in the nature of preventive and curative measures, are divisions of his subject that indicate the thoroughness with which he discusses it. It is known definitely that a certain amount of heart disease among children can be prevented, and that by wise care it is possible to keep most children who have contracted it from becoming chronic invalids. In the homes of the afflicted that will be the most cheerful part of Doctor Veeder's message.

Fit or Unfit

A startling illustration of what public health activities mean to us was presented by the lecturer who pointed out that populations of the size we now find in cities of the first class would have been impossible two or three generations back because an epidemic would have wiped them out. It is a difficult task to impress on any one individual the importance to him of community health improvement, even though it is possible to show him that it measurably lengthens his life, decreases his taxes, improves his disposition and adds to his comfort. Herbert Hoover is one man who has both the knowledge of what has been done in the direction and the ability to present it so it interests you. Mr. Hoover's experience in directing war relief for starving millions brought him into contact with plans of unprecedented extent and importance for safeguarding the health and well being of vast numbers of helpless humanity. Few other men, equipped with however much vision or intelligence or sympathy, have had his opportunity to observe the achievements possible when group health measures are enforced under able direction. It will be news to some who read his article "Fit or Unfit," in the May DELINEATOR, to learn that we are behind several other countries in protecting the health of babies and mothers, that city children now have a better chance of life than country children, that we spend more as a nation for chewing-gum than for health activities. His graphic picture of the composite American child of approximately eleven years of age reveals the kind of work to which we must devote more of our best thought and resources.

He has taken three years to write it!

MIX and SERVE

Edited with Willing Hands and a Mean Pencil by a Mere Man

SOME day when we get time to take our long-anticipated vacation on a desert island placarded with "For Men Only" signs, our choice of guest conductor of the column in our absence will be the Rev. Joseph Wallett of Southport, England ◈◈◈ In selecting a clergyman to watch over our flock of fair pewholders we were impressed with the British pastor's recently published comment on the prevalent fictional notions about blushing and trembling brides. "You know what some authors write about the trembling bride," says this authority, "it is all bunkum. The girls write in a bold, firm, free hand. It is the man who has the wind up. The bride gets hold of the pen in one hand, gathers up her draperies in the other and after signing the register throws down the pen as much as to say 'That's that.' The poor man always makes a mess of it" ◈◈◈ A report showing progress in the equal-rights-for-women campaign that we so consistently advocate comes from Owensboro, Kentucky, where a farmer's wife was recently fined $10 following her conviction on a charge of having violated the state anti-gossiping act, a law specially devised to curb the oratory of ladies with tongues that hang in the middle. It seems that the offender was brought to book for having spread the report that local police officials split 50-50 with bootleggers ◈◈◈ Miss Gertie Collie, a Jewell City, Kansas, woman, has recently completed a child's quilt containing 4,161 pieces. It is two yards long and a little more than a yard and a half wide ◈◈◈ Up in arms, as we always are, against the familiar accusation that the never-sufficiently-praised sex has no interest in science and invention, we take particular pleasure in copying down the newspaper story of a Binghamton, New York, woman's ingenuity and enterprise. "The wife of a local detective, taking the trail herself when she became suspicious of her husband's attention to a 'tall blonde,' combined her husband's sleuthing tactics with a periscope and obtained evidence upon which she bases her divorce suit, the woman testified recently at a hearing of the case in the Supreme Court here. Her husband entertained the other woman in his office, the wife said, and so she suspended one periscope from the floor above to look in through an outside window and raised another over the transom of the door so as to be certain of a good view. Then she alternated between the devices, and while at the door heard her husband, according to the story, making love to the other woman. The wife said she made the periscopes herself, getting the idea from those used during the World War, and learning of their construction from technical books" ◈◈◈ Eileen, a year-old baby in a Cleveland maternity hospital, has been able to stand on her head since she was eight months of age. Doctors discovered she had a perfect sense of equilibrium and enjoyed watching her show off for the benefit of guests, but now they are at their wits' end because other babies in the ward invariably come to grief when they imitate her stunt. Eileen proves herself a sure-enough girl baby by encouraging the imitators and then crowing with glee at their narrow escapes from breaking their little necks ◈◈◈ Miss Inez Harden of Drew, Mississippi, judged the most nearly perfect girl of 350,000 in the health contest in connection with the International Livestock Exposition with a rating of 99.04 per cent., gave as her recipe for perfect health: "Sleep ten hours a night, drink a quart of milk a day, eat lots of vegetables, don't use face powder or rouge, don't wear high heels." Miss Harden is 16, weighs 117¾ pounds and is 5 feet 2 inches tall. She goes to bed every night at 8 and is up at 6.30. In addition to deep breathing and setting-up exercises, she keeps fit by doing part of the housework and playing right guard on her high-school basketball team ◈◈◈ A Russian poet conceived a novel idea in the way of a touching memento of affection when he offered his lady fair a collection of sonnets bound in the skin from his amputated leg. We surmise that even a lady who had memorized the Book of Etiquette would be hard put to it for an appropriate expression of gratitude. ◈◈◈ A constant thorn in our side is the fact that we look in vain each month for the advertising of the new "kissproof" lipstick in our favorite woman's magazine ◈◈◈ If enough of the faithful continue to mention THE DELINEATOR when writing to advertisers, the manufacturers of that charming novelty can not long ignore us. ◈◈◈

CRANE BEAUTY IN THE OPEN; CRANE QUALITY IN ALL HIDDEN FITTINGS

In no detail of the modern home are thought and taste so amply repaid as in the design and equipment of bathrooms. To avoid the commonplace and choose distinctive settings and fixtures is important, since changes are not easily made.

In this Crane bathroom, character and charm are secured with simple materials. The walls are of painted plaster, with Pompeian decorations in rose and black. Painted cornice and wainscot. Dull black floor tiles, laid in golden cement. Marmor lavatory and dressing table have tops of Italian marble. Tarnia bath and Crystal shower.

Crane plumbing and heating fixtures are sold by contractors only, in a wide variety of styles at prices within reach of all. Write for book of color schemes, "The New Art of Fine Bathrooms."

A TURN or two of this satiny oval cake between your fingers, and you will know what lather can be like! Heavy, luxuriant, smooth as cream, searching every pore to cleanse it, rinsing away instantly, leaving your skin glowing and refreshed, soft and unroughened.

This firm, white cake, with its matchless fragrance, will remain firm, and white and fragrant until worn to the thinness of a wafer.

On the kitchen floor is Congoleum By-the-Yard No. 878. It is made in the 2-yard width only.

On the bathroom floor is shown Congoleum By-the-Yard No. 876—2 yds. wide. The 3-yd. width is No. 4076.

"Kitchen and bathroom together cost less than we figured for the kitchen alone"

For covering the entire floor, there's nothing so economical or so satisfactory as guaranteed Congoleum By-the-Yard.

Not only is it unusually low in price, but very easy to lay. Like Congoleum Rugs it lies perfectly flat on the floor—requires no fastening whatever to hold it firmly in place. It never buckles, never curls up at the edges.

A Variety of Patterns

You can have Congoleum By-the-Yard in any room, for it comes in a wide range of very attractive designs. Floral motifs, matting effects, neat woodblocks or tiles to choose from. It inexpensively solves the problem of what to do with old, scarred floors.

Gold-Seal Congoleum By-the-Yard has all the labor-saving advantages of the popular Congoleum Rugs. Nothing can stain the smooth, waterproof surface. Dust, grease, spilled things, are quickly removed with a light mopping.

When you buy Gold-Seal Congoleum By-the-Yard, make sure that you get it. You can always identify genuine Congoleum By-the-Yard by the Gold Seal guarantee that is pasted on the face of the goods. This Gold Seal protects you against inferior substitutes. Insist upon seeing it when you buy.

THE DAY OF MEMORY

THERE are thirty-seven thousand crosses on a hillside in France marking the graves of American soldiers and nurses. Once it was part of the Argonne Forest, and now it is a forest of crosses. Nine miles away stands a little village named Landres et Saint-Georges. One of the bitterest battles of the war was fought there. Only five houses remained at Landres et Saint-Georges. Yet after the Armistice what was left of its former population came back to rebuild their broken world.

Then came Memorial Day, the first after the war. The Americans had helped save that French village. And its people stopped in their struggle for bare existence, and worked through the night and early morning making wreaths and gathering wild flowers for the graves of the Americans.

More than this they did. Standing under the Stars and Stripes on that American ground in the heart of France, these unfortunate people—men, women and little children—took a solemn oath that while they or their children or children's children survived, they would go each year on Memorial Day to place flowers on the graves of the American dead and to sing our national anthems and our home songs.

Many Americans, hearing of this, sent help to that little town.

But time passed, and it is human to forget. And yet out in Port Huron, Michigan, a month ago, a group of men and women who had succeeded in the Better Homes of America campaign and won the first prize for their effort, collected sufficient money in one day to build a Port Huron Cottage at Landres et Saint-Georges in gratitude to the peasants who tend those American graves overseas. The Port Huron people who contributed, none of them wealthy, have thus made their gift to better homes in France, and the Port Huron Cottage will go to them in gratitude for a tender and personal service rendered to that silent army of ours on whose lips the finger of God has been placed.

We have been told that debts of gratitude to France have been paid. We have been told that debts of gratitude to America have been paid.

But debts of gratitude are outside the control of human will. They are not debts, but bonds that hold men to men. They can not be measured in material things, nor yet be requited by service. They are the reminders of friendship, above price.

And so Heaven bless the Port Huron Cottage in the heart of devastated France, and may we in this land of ours be as true to the graves of our defenders as are the grateful villagers of Landres et Saint-Georges.

YOUR CLUB MIGHT TRY THIS

THE New Rochelle (New York) Woman's Club has what is described as one of the most beautiful women's club buildings in the world. It is also famous for its civic work, its Better Homes campaign, its charities, its fine social life. A member of the club was recently asked to what she ascribed the remarkable success of the club.

"We have an unbreakable rule," she answered. "And I think we may credit much of our success to it.

"There must never be any evening meetings or evening telephone calls about club business; and all daytime telephone calls must be limited to five minutes each. Anything that takes longer than that demands a meeting. There must be nothing at night except social affairs in which our families may take part. Our evenings belong to our families."

Those conditions were accepted. The men of New Rochelle are strong supporters of the Woman's Club, especially of the policy which insures free evenings and limited telephone calls. Even the busiest women of that community have the time to belong. And they believe that this efficiency of the club is one of the best influences in their little city.

"Over the Top" Again!

A. S. M. HUTCHINSON

Author of "If Winter Comes" whose remarkable new novel, "The Increasing Purpose," which he has taken three years to write, will begin next month in THE DELINEATOR

HUTCHINSON

IN A recent nation-wide poll conducted by the International Book Review to find out which authors of this century Americans consider greatest, A. S. M. Hutchinson was given a mighty lead over all fiction writers in the English language. This enormous popularity heaped upon the quiet author of "If Winter Comes" and "This Freedom" is destined to climb even higher and reach even further with the appearance of his latest book, "The Increasing Purpose," upon which he has been working for the past three years. This epoch-making novel, we are happy and proud to say, will start next month in THE DELINEATOR.

Can the meaning of love, as we know it, be increased? "Yes," comes Mr. Hutchinson's ringing answer. And in his reply, he believes, lies the way out of all the disillusionment and after-war turmoil in which our world is now plunged. The tidal wave of materialism has nearly reached its highest point, he foretells. The waters will be driven back—and by men and women "finding time for God."

Yes, Mr. Hutchinson has dared to speak out on the most controversial of all subjects—religion. In "The Increasing Purpose" he tells a gripping love story, but beneath it there runs a deep spiritual undercurrent. It is the tale of a great personal quest, the heart-and-soul struggles of one lovable Simon Paris, called Sim, just as in "If Winter Comes" Mr. Hutchinson centered his narrative in the winning character of Mark Sabre.

"I am writing the thing that is in me," he said of "The Increasing Purpose" in a letter to the editor of THE DELINEATOR during the years when, in a little cottage in Cornwall, he grappled with his idea. "And in one particular aspect it is what I can only think of as inspiration. Certainly the circumstances in which it came to me were very strange."

It is said by those who know him that they doubt whether any other young Englishman suffered as keenly from the war as Mr. Hutchinson. Here, in his forthcoming novel, that suffering has finally crystallized into a constructive program. "The Increasing Purpose" is a super-love story. By all means read its opening instalment in the June issue of THE DELINEATOR.

LENGTHEN WOMEN'S LIVES

THE weakest link in the chain of American health is the woman in the home. Many industries require physical examinations of their employees. There is a growing insurance among the wage-earning women. The club woman and the woman in her home are the last to be checked.

Recently an important philanthropist died suddenly. Her associates had not even realized she was ill. Elizabeth Toombs, an officer of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, was another example of a useful life cut short. Regular medical examination would have warned her in time to save her life.

Such needless tragedies are occurring daily in every community, and are happening frequently enough in all family groups to make the subject one of great importance to every thinking person.

There is no greater gift that we could bring to our readers than health. But unfortunately health may not be gained by reading. This has not daunted us, however. For we are, with this issue, appointing a corps of lifeguards whose job it will be to instruct whoever asks them in the actual practical way to abundant life.

Because this is so vital an issue, THE DELINEATOR, through Fielding H. Yost, Director of Intercollegiate Activities in the University of Michigan, and Dr. Lillian E. Shaw, and with the cooperation of famous experts all over the country, is organizing a health program for American women, the first step of which will be the preparation of a primer containing charts, tables and the latest information available regarding health exercises.

We believe that every woman's club in America should have a health program. It is estimated that ten thousand women's club houses have been built in this country since 1910. Yet few of them have gymnasiums, and still fewer a directed health program.

Fielding Yost, with the aid of physicians, has prepared a health chart for women, which will be made available to readers of THE DELINEATOR. We have prepared a booklet on exercises for women, a description of which will be found on page 15. This is an important personal service, and we urge every reader of THE DELINEATOR to take advantage of it to obtain a health score-card, which should be filled out by a physician. The practise of a thorough physical examination twice a year should be determined upon and conscientiously observed.

For years college men have been thriving under the inspiring leadership of Mr. Yost. Now the women and girls of the country, through the pages of THE DELINEATOR, are to be given the same opportunity. They will not be required to enroll in a college; they will be able to remain in their own homes or club gymnasiums and receive the instructions of this famous coach. Mr. Yost is devoting part of his attention to organizing athletic clubs for women and furnishing programs to clubs already organized.

If there is a club for women in your community, then let it avail itself of this expert guidance. If your town lacks such an organization, Mr. Yost's life-extension instructions in THE DELINEATOR can be used to help you bring it into being.

Teaching your Child to be Truthful

"Coax him, punish him—no matter what I do, I can't make Johnny tell the truth." That is the plaint of many a parent. To whom we say—"Try Angelo Patri's method"

By ANGELO PATRI

Principal of New York's model public school

NOTHING so shocks a parent as the discovery that his child has told an untruth. "I don't see why he should lie. I have always said to him, 'No matter what you do, tell the truth about it.' And now he goes and does this. I don't understand."

Let us try to understand. There are several sorts of untruths that children tell: the instinctive defense story, the imaginative tale and the deliberate lie told with the intent to deceive. This last is the serious sort, a habit gained by practise and stimulated by example. Rarely is it acquired in any other way.

Parents forget that children are listening with all their ears to what is going on about them, and making their own deductions. A hint is all a wise child needs, and when parents tell a story as they wish it might have been or as they hope it will be, instead of exactly as it is, their children have an immediate vision of the grateful utility of the untrue.

"I can't be forever watching every word I say," protests the parent. "I'm obliged to deal with people who make allowances for conventions and courtesies which children know nothing about. You can't go through the world telling the truth. Imagine what would happen if you did."

But children make no allowances. They take the grown-ups at their word's face value. Indeed, they do more. They take the word with all its implications, for they live in a restricted world where "Mother said so" and "Father told me" carry all the weight of a Supreme Court decision.

IT IS not the training that the child gets from books, nor the preachments, nor the commands that sink into the substrata of his consciousness and lay the foundation of his character. It is the subtle essence of the conduct of those about him that permeates his being and inspires him toward good or bends him toward wrong.

"I would love to buy your tickets, Mrs. Robinson, but we have an engagement of long standing for that night. So sorry. It would seem that we were most unfortunate about such things, wouldn't it? Perhaps another time we shall be able to make it."

Ticket-sellers are troublesome folks. They are one of those afflictions we all pray to be delivered from and seldom have the courage to deal with front-face. But why teach a child that the way to treat them is with deceit and guile? He knows that there is no engagement.

"No, we aren't going anywhere, but if we bought all the tickets people try to sell us there wouldn't be money enough left to feed the family."

By telling the ticket-seller the truth the whole situation would be cleared up in the child's mind. The ticket-seller would leave with respect for such a family—and the children would have received a wholesome lesson.

While the best sort of truth instruction is indirect and of an almost unconscious character, untruthfulness, on the other hand, is often taught directly to the children by unthoughtful parents who believe that a lie will result advantageously for the instant, at least.

For some children an agile and discriminating memory is a real necessity, for their ages change according to the situation which confronts them. On the street-car they must remember to tell the conductor they are three or three and a half, as the rates may be, while on the railroad they may be a little older. "It is a wise child who knows his age when he is traveling," says the conductor. And all these untruths are told for the sake of a few cents!

In a little general store in the mountains there is an old man who has had much experience with people. He keeps the post-office, receives telegrams, arranges for cars for the tourists, puts up luncheons for the hikers, prophesies about the weather and even advises what to do when your dog comes home with his tongue full of porcupine quills.

One afternoon a bright-faced lad asked him for a loaf of bread, and spread a nickel and four cents on the top of the show-case. "I have only nine cents," he said, "mother didn't have any more change."

"So?" said the old fellow, peering over his spectacles. "I'll fix that." And taking the loaf from the hands of the surprised child he cut off a generous slice of it, wrapped the remainder of the loaf and handed it back.

"There you are, son. Now you have just your money's worth. Never take anything you don't pay for."

When the child had disappeared down the road, the old man said: "I just had to give that lad a lesson. His mother taught him to do that. I heard her the other night. He wanted a penny for a bit of gum, and she said, 'I haven't another cent of change. Tell the man that you have only nine cents. He'll let you have the loaf, and then you can stop off at Miss Matty's and get the gum.' I made up my mind that he'd have to unlearn that little bit of finance."

There's another sort of teaching, not quite so direct, but equally harmful in its effect, because it teaches the child to distrust the people about him and trains him to deceive in his turn. It takes the form of threats and stupid untruths which parents tell to get a child to do something that he doesn't want to do.

"If you don't go to sleep, the man with the black bag will come and get you." "If you don't take your medicine, the doctor will come and cut off your ears." "Just you wait. The teacher will fix you when you get to school. She has a big stick. You'll get it if you don't mind." "No, I'm not going to have the dentist do anything to you. He's only going to look at your mouth."

BENJAMIN was not growing as he ought. The school doctor examined him and told his mother that an operation on his nose was imperative. The boy would make no progress until it was done, and unless it were done soon he would undoubtedly become very ill.

"Take him at once to the hospital. He has been neglected too long. Once his nose is fixed he will grow like a weed. But don't delay."

So his mother said: "I'm going to take you to the hospital to-morrow, Ben."

"Why? Is the doctor going to operate on me?"

"No, of course not. Where did you get such an idea? He only wants to look at your nose and tell me what is the matter."

Benjamin was twelve years old and had had some experience with nurses, so when he entered the hospital he stayed close to the door.

"So this is Benjamin," said the smiling nurse; "come right along with me, Benjamin. Your bed is all made up, and the doctor is expecting you."

"Not me," said Benjamin, and he fled through the doorway. He reached home long before his mother, who had to stay behind to make explanations.

When the story reached the school, the teacher said: "But Benjamin, you ought to have this done. You know you are losing weight and falling behind in your classes. Lots of children have this operation and make no fuss about it. Surely you aren't a coward."

"They didn't tell me anything about it. I didn't know what they wanted to do with me. They didn't treat me right," said Benjamin staunchly. "You come with me and tell me right, and I'll do what you say. But I won't go with any one else. They won't tell me right."

Such practises are doubly harmful to children. They lose faith in those who should befriend them, and they become frightened and lonely when they need friends most. Some time they are going to learn the truth about the situation and discover that all their fears bred of lies were useless, needless suffering.

To those parents who are anxiously asking, "What shall I do to teach my child to tell the truth?" I would say: Practise it daily yourself; be honest with the neighbors and the children; and above all else, be honest with yourself.

Teach your child that the only way to meet a situation is face front and armed with the truth.

Tell him the truth every time. If you feel that he is not able to understand it, tell him you can not explain, and ask him to take you on faith until you can. Silence is better than lying. Practise truth and teach truth until the very soul of you is truth. For it is the soul of you that teaches the soul of your child.

Wake up those dormant gums

—when and while you brush your teeth

YOUR GUMS are dormant. They are asleep because the food you eat gives them no stimulation, no exercise, no life. These they need and you can give to them if you will—you can keep your gums firm and healthy with Ipana Tooth Paste in a minute or two a day.

To care for the gums, the dentists will tell you, is just as necessary as to care for the surface of the teeth—even more so.

You should massage the gums gently when and while you brush your teeth. With daily care of this kind they will be firm and healthy, with a circulation of rich red blood within their walls.

Otherwise, under a modern diet of soft food and creamy sauces, the gums are cheated of the natural stimulation that rough, coarse food once gave.

The cause of weak gums is soft food

"No item in our modern diet," says one widely known authority, "is capable of giving our jaws more than an insignificant amount of exercise. Certainly there is nothing about the mastication of the average meal to produce stimulation and growth of the cellular elements of the gum tissue. Were we to depend upon the natural agencies for the health of the oral tissues, we might well despair of ever controlling dental degeneration and infection."

That's a pretty strong statement. But the writer by no means exaggerates the case, for soft food and hasty eating cheat the gums of exercise and bring about these gum troubles so difficult to master.

How Ipana helps the dentists in healing bleeding gums

Dental authorities everywhere are making great progress in combating troubles of the gingiva (gum structure).

Thousands of dentists to whom Ipana has been demonstrated recommend it strongly. Many of them order a daily massage with Ipana after the ordinary cleaning with Ipana and the brush. For Ipana not only cleanses teeth safely but tones and strengthens understimulated gum tissues. This it can do because of the presence of ziratol, an antiseptic hemostatic used by the profession to allay bleeding and to restore gum tissue to its normal tonicity.

Make a trial of Ipana for one month

Ipana is an aid to the dentist, not a substitute for him. Ask him about its properties, its fine cleansing power, its delicious taste. Then switch to it for one month. See for yourself how good, how effective, it really is.

Despite the coupon on this page, the best thing to do is to get a large tube at your nearest drug store. The ten-day tube can only start the good work. A full-size tube, which will last for a hundred brushings, will show you the start of firmer, harder, healthier gums, and a clean, sweet and wholesome mouth.

Perhaps your own toothbrush seldom "shows pink"—perhaps it never does. Still, you can build no better foundation for the health—present and future—of your gums and teeth than to brush them twice daily with this delicious dentifrice.

To prevent "laundry and dishpan hands"

Women who do their own work find this method keeps the skin soft and white

How often have you asked yourself this question:

"Oh, isn't there some way I can do my washing and dishes and yet keep my hands looking nice?"

Millions of other women have answered "yes." Let them tell you how they do it.

One of them says:

"I never use anything but Ivory either in the laundry or kitchen work and for a very good reason. People have often said to me, 'Why do you always use Ivory Soap? Do you not think it extravagant?' And my answer is, 'I find it most beneficial to my skin'."

—MRS. A. J. L., Toronto

Another says:

"All these years I've been using Ivory, not having it used, and my hands are the constant source of envy from my friends. They've said to me, 'How on earth do you keep your hands so white and so soft?' My answer is 'Ivory'."

—MRS. G. M. B., Dallas

A man writes:

"This winter has been the first in many years that my mother's hands have not become painfully chapped from housework, and she attributes her good fortune entirely to the fact that she used Ivory Soap exclusively for all purposes—even for scrubbing."

—W. J. G., Philadelphia

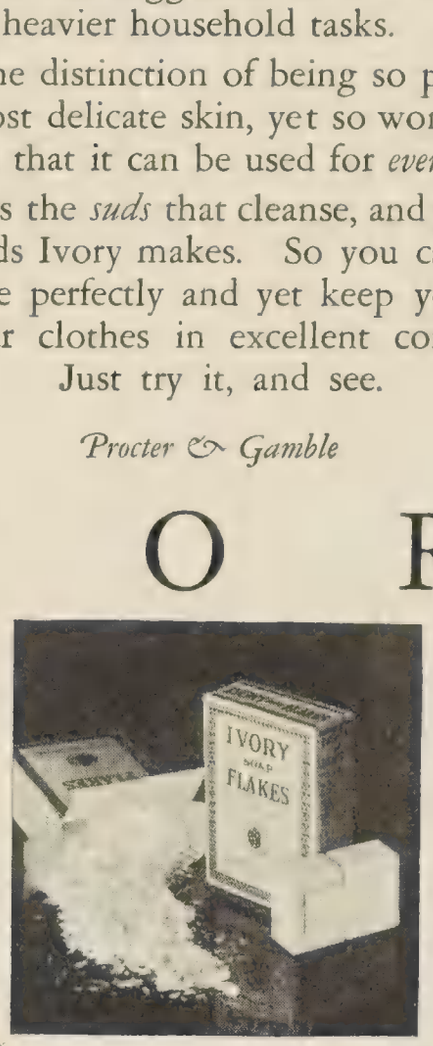
© 1925, by The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati

IF you have thought of Ivory Soap and Ivory Flakes as made only for toilet, bath and fine laundry, perhaps you will be a little surprised at the suggestion to use them for the general laundry and other heavier household tasks.



But Ivory has the distinction of being so pure that it cannot injure even the most delicate skin, yet so wonderfully cleansing and so economical that it can be used for everything.

In any soap, it is the suds that cleanse, and you know what marvelous suds Ivory makes. So you can be sure it will cleanse perfectly and yet keep your hands and your clothes in excellent condition. Just try it, and see.

The house that jazz built

By ELEANOR HALLOWELL ABBOTT

ALTOGETHER undaunted by heat or Saturday half-holiday, the amorous tenor voice of the victrola drifted even once again—from Heaven knows where—into the austere and all but deserted gloom of the great office building.

"Out of Nothing—and Roses," persisted the unsquelchable voice:

"Out of Nothing—and Roses
The Dream grew!
Not even I was there at the first,
Not even you!
But just Far Places! And Empty Spaces!
The shine of a star, the call of a bird,
Scarcely seen, scarcely heard!
Till out of Emptiness and all Inertness
That jump of my pulse! And that strange alertness.
Like the incredible shock to sense and soul
Of a blinded runner sighting his goal!
A gasp! A sigh! A scented whirring!
The petaled zest of soft things stirring!
As there for my dazzled eyes' beholding—
Like all the roses of the world unfolding,
Out of Chaos and Abysmal Space
There dawned the miracle of your face,
And in its sweetness
I found—found——"

Out in the paved street somewhere below the office a clattering load of steel rails suddenly shattered the song's climax by the very crash of its own crescendo:

"And in its sweetness
I found——"

"What in thunder did he find?" exploded Valney with his half-added column of figures hurtled once more into confusion.

With an almost exaggerated leisureliness, Hastings, his chief, cool, white-haired, immaculate, rose from his great desk.

"It's time to quit work. You look tired," he said. "And oh, by the way, Valney," he added somewhat casually, "as a stranger in town, you ought to go round a bit and meet some people. Now to-night we're having some sort of a racket at our house, I believe. If you haven't anything special on, maybe you'd better drop around. About eight o'clock's the hour, I believe. Just possibly, you know, it might amuse you. And if it doesn't—" Frowning for an instant, he stooped to brush a fleck of dust from his sleeve. "And if it doesn't," he quickened, "there's always the rose-garden, of course. Roses, as perhaps you may have heard, are rather a hobby of mine."

"R-roses?" stammered Valney. Oddly coincidental, the word struck across his consciousness. "Roses?—'Out of Nothing—and Roses?' "

"Sorry—of course—that I can't offer a bunch of débutantes as a special inducement," droned his chief's icy monotone. "But they'll be pretty scarce, I'm afraid. It's rather a married crowd, you know—the Hartlo Country Club crowd."

"Yes, I know," said Valney. An abstracted frown deepened quite perceptibly on his own brow.

"All the ladies, that is," murmured Hastings with a faint grimace, "are at least technically attached."

"Yes, I know," frowned Valney.

Accidentally the older man's eyes lifted to a mirror. The grimace deepened a little.

"But at least," he hastened to attest, "I think I can guarantee that there will be no other tottering patriarchs present. As perhaps you may know, Valney," he confided, "I have recently married a young wife."

"Yes, I know," said Valney.

"It's her crowd—this Hartlo Country Club crowd," persisted Hastings. "A wild, crazy bunch. Last year they raided the circus tents on a Sunday morning and staged a parade that was distinctly more zoological than Biblical! It was my wife, in fact, who——"

"Yes, I know," said Valney.

"And this Spring at the Governor's regatta, when the Governor's speedboat was—well, call it 'borrowed'—during the after-dinner speeches and run aground on the oyster bar, it was my wife that——"

"Yes, I know," said Valney.

"By Jove!" jerked his chief with some asperity. "I'd give my hat to know just how much you do know!"

"I know this, sir," rallied Valney with an almost instant urbanity. "It would give me no end of pleasure to accept your bid for to-night."

"Is that—all you know?" said his chief.

Curt as a whip the question lashed Valney to his feet. Rather tall he looked, rather broad-shouldered, faintly pugnacious, but trying very hard to grin, one hand toying almost boyishly with a newspaper on his desk.

"I know at least one other thing, sir," he affirmed. "And that is, parties or no parties, hospitality or no hospitality, I'm not going to stop day or night trying for that South American position of yours that's open—until you actually hire men to throw me out. Just words won't throw me out, I mean. Snubs won't throw me out. Work won't throw me out."

"That South American position?" cried Hastings. His voice was frankly aghast. "Why, Valney, you're crazy!" he said. "The South American office is the biggest job we've got to offer. And you—you're nothing but a boy."

"I'm twenty-seven," said Valney.

"Why—you—" hooted his chief. "You hardly know your own way around yet, to say nothing of the way of the other man."

"I could learn it," said Valney.

"Learn it?" snapped his chief. "Why, man alive! Just the social life alone of some of those South American stations is enough to sweep a stripling off his feet. And when it comes to the business subtleties—million-dollar deals put across a soiled table-cloth—gold-paved streets of promise ending suddenly in fever-ladened swamps—bullying masked as blandishments—extravagant kindnesses wreathed with extravagant shrewdnesses! Merciful Heavens, man! The chap we've got to have for the South American office has got to be a mature man, a proved man, cool of brain, tamed of pulse, impervious alike to the jungle and the boudoir!"

"I admit," murmured Valney, "that I have had very little experience with either jungles or boudoirs."

"What? What's that?" jerked his chief. Something tightening in the young man's face softened his own face suddenly. "But keep on as you've started, Valney, my boy," he added with a certain precipitous impulse of kindliness. "And come back to me when you're thirty-seven to ask about this same South American office—and I'll tell you then whether or not you can have it when you're forty-seven!"

"Thanks!" said Valney.

WITH his face like a mask again the older man started for the door, but with his hand on the knob swung sharply around and twisted one side of his mouth into the faintest possible suggestion of a smile.

"Oh, by the way," he murmured. "About to-night. It will hardly be bobbing for apples, of course, because that's Hallowe'en and this happens to be June. Neither do I think they will be apt to repeat the indoor football game that was staged last week—with one broken collar-bone and three sprained ankles. Nevertheless—" Before Valney's questioning glance his own glance narrowed a little. "Nevertheless, I strongly advise flannels rather than broadcloth," he added hastily.

"Thanks," said Valney, "for the tip. Thanks awfully."

A bit distantly he turned away.

"Valney," said his chief, "you look queer!"

"I feel queer," admitted Valney. "It wasn't just my lunch, you see, that I missed, but my breakfast, too! A little mishap about oversleeping, a——"

He reached up to rub a faint blur of dizziness from his eyes.

"Valney," said his chief, "don't be a fool! The next time that I ask you to stay over with me, get your lunch first. Do you hear?"

"H-hear?" stammered Valney.

Already, as though drawn by invisible wires, he felt himself cocking one ear toward the open window, with all the alertness he could muster.

"As there for my dazzled eyes' beholding," resumed the indomitable tenor:

> "Like all the roses of the world unfolding,
> Out of Chaos and Abysmal Space
> There dawned the miracle of your face,
> And in its sweetness
> I found—found——"

Bang! slammed the office door upon Hastings's departing figure. It was indeed as though Hastings the imperturbable, driven at last beyond imperturbability, had bitten a curse upon all victrolas into the very jamb of the door.

Still dizzied a little with faintness and fatigue, Valney finished clearing his desk and followed him.

BUT it was a very different Valney, fed and rested and tubbed and frankly expectant, who swung down leafy suburban lanes at eight o'clock that evening to avail himself of the chief's surprising and indeed almost disconcerting hospitality.

Yet, whatever his inherent shyness or apprehension may have been, at the moment it was at least hidden very effectually behind the ordinary blue-coated, white-trousered, mildly nonchalant demeanor characteristic of any reasonably good-looking and thoroughly well-groomed young man faring forth on a pleasant June evening to meet a party of friends.

Frankly, the most poignant emotion that he experienced at the moment was a very real and human curiosity concerning the whole Hartlo Country Club crowd in general and Mrs. Gustav Hastings in particular, whose madcap escapades and reasonably innocent indiscretions had kept the whole town agog for at least the brief months of his own sojourn there. ("Contraria" her friends had nicknamed her because of her avowed and insistent purpose to contradict rather than reflect the mood of whatever her particular surroundings might happen to be—to laugh, in short, when others cried, and cry, in turn, when others laughed; to flirt in church—and preach at a poker game; dance in rags—slum in satins. Restless, reckless, disturbingly beautiful, absolutely insatiate in her pursuit of novelty and unexpectedness——)

ONCE again, with all the vague speculation of the unmarried concerning the married, he began to wonder just how a man like Hastings in all the exaggerated austerity of his years and habits had ever caught the fancy of a girl like that or rather indeed been caught himself by a fancy for a girl like that—was it just money on one side and youth on the other?—irresistible money and irresistible youth?

With a shrug of incredulity he shook the speculation from his mind, quickened his footsteps, skirted a vaguely looming high hedge, mounted the shadowy steps, crossed the deserted piazza and plunged at once with frank astonishment into a pleasant morocco-scented library crowded with men only.

Judging then and there that he had misunderstood Hastings's inference that it was to be a mixed party he readjusted his mind and manner as quickly as possible to meet the unmistakably rough-and-tumble rollic that was already under way.

Across a pushing, shoving mêlée of shoulders Hastings waved a quick hand of greeting to him. Another man stepped back the smallest sporting trifle to give him at least a foothold in the riotous onslaught.

Hastings had said to come about eight o'clock, Valney remembered a bit wryly. The next minute saw him sparring for space in the middle of the crowd rather than at the edge of it.

The goal, whatever it might prove to be, was at least on the far side of the room. Through the crook of an elbow, across the ridge of a shoulder he caught a vague glimpse of a long oaken table fluffy with ribbons and glinting with some sort of tiny bright disks. At first he thought the disks were coins or bright embossed medals fashioned to dangle from the lapel of a coat. Then all of a sudden, from the vantage of the first scrambling breathless row of all, he discovered with frank astonishment that they were nothing but little silver pasteboard plates to which were glued in lusciously glazed bas-relief doll-sized models of every conceivable kind of food that a toy-maker's facile mind could compass—miniature lamb-chops with a miniature baked potato—nutty brown sausages sprigged with make-believe parsley—a roseate slice of ham no bigger than your thumb-nail cavorting decoratively with a white-and-gold fried egg—fluty patty shells brimming with sweetbreads—prosy gray oatmeal dotted with wholesome prunes—an exotic pompano swimming through a creamy sea of butter sauce—a rosy-cheeked apple doming like a ruby from a diminutive group of purple plums and bead-sized grapes.

"This game is called the House o' Dreams," announced Hastings in deep, stentorious voice. "Every man is requested without further delay to choose his favorite breakfast dish, attach it by the ribbon to the lapel of his coat and pass into the drawing-room where the ladies——"

"Oh, ho!" thought Valney. "So there are to be ladies, after all."

"—where the ladies, having already chosen their own favorite breakfasts," explained Hastings, "and bedecked themselves with

FRAGRANCE OF LILACS

Three Glimpses into the Beyond

By ELLIS PARKER BUTLER

AS SHE sat on the top step of the veranda with the golden light from the hall candles behind her, and nothing before her but the intense black of the warm Spring night and the myriads of stars in the sky, Selina Sue was ineffably happy, for she had glimpsed infinity and was alone and learning about it. This time she meant to dare.

She was nine, going on ten, and no one in the whole world knew what she was meaning to do. In the house the older folks, and that included the four guests who had come to dinner, had crossed the wide hall from the dining-room to the huge parlor. Her father was probably standing with one elbow on the mantel, twirling the end of his mustache, while his eyes beamed pleasantly on his lady guests. Her mother, she knew, had sunk gracefully upon the hair-cloth divan, folding her hands in her lap without having to touch her voluminous hooped skirt as most of the women did. While Selina Sue sat there preparing to go forth into infinity, she felt a soothing warmth of gladness that everything was so all right in the parlor behind her—such a handsome father and such a beautiful mother and everything so kind and comfortable and gracious. It was satisfying to know she might count on a full hour, and perhaps longer, with no one calling her or disturbing her. It gave Selina Sue a calm feeling. She was sure she could reach infinity this time.

As she sat there she was quite a small child, with her hair done in most perfect finger-ringlets, and tiny pink rosebuds on her full-skirted dress. Her legs were in fine white cotton stockings, and her feet were in soft black slippers that had straps across her ankles, and below the three narrow ruffles of her skirt were exquisitely sheer pantalets of fine muslin, beautifully embroidered. Before starting for infinity Selina Sue leaned forward and pulled the pantalets down the least bit in a ladylike manner, making sure they were quite even at the bottom, for even when one is going to infinity one should begin the journey properly.

Drawing by Joseph Simont

SHE DREW A DEEP BREATH AND WITH IT CAME THE ODOR OF HEAVY-SCENTED LILACS, JUST SUCH LILACS AS GREW SO COMFORTABLY BESIDE THE VERANDA AT HOME, AND SHE LEAPED

SELINA SUE could not quite believe that any one she knew had ever been to infinity. One reason for this was that she had discovered the route for herself and was rather sure no one had ever discovered it before. The other reason was that she had thought of all the people she knew, and she could not think of a single one who would care to go to infinity or dare go there. Her father was too busy—his days were taken up with something about cotton in bales, and his evenings with reading and guests. Her mother, she felt, was too gentle to go. And as for the others, she was sure most of them were either too stupid to care for infinity at all or had never even thought of it. Poor things! How sad it was to think they had all missed this most splendidly thrilling of all sensations! Selina Sue put her elbows on her knees and rested her chin in her cupped hands and looked up at the stars.

She chose a large star that seemed quite near and friendly—a firm honest-looking star that had a safe golden yellow color—and leaped to it, alighting easily on both feet, balancing herself by extending her arms until she had a secure purchase on its edge with her toes, just where they joined the balls of her feet. Then she looked far out into space where another star—a bluish and rather slippery-looking star—twinkled a million miles beyond. Without fear or hesitation she bent her knees and leaped.

It was a glorious sensation, leaping through a million miles of space with her hands held straight out before her, her eyes fixed on the blue star, her nerves keened to control her muscles so that she might not overleap or fall short, so that she would alight safely on the star, to balance there with outspread arms until her foothold was sure and she could choose the next star a million miles beyond to which to make the next leap.

When she had reached the tenth star she paused a little longer there and looked back. She could no longer see that house with patches of yellow light on the veranda and huge fluted columns rising to the roof. She could no longer see the Earth. This was because the last few leaps had been considerably more than a million miles—one quiet delightful leap had been a full ten million miles. She was alone in the immensity of space. It was a fine sensation.

Looking beyond she saw that the stars were fewer and far more distant from each other, because she was reaching the limit of our own solar system. "It's backwoods," she thought—but that did not stop Selina Sue. She was but beginning her journey, and to-night she meant to go all the way. She drew a deeper breath and chose a tiny star a hundred million miles farther out in space, and leaped, and alighted, and chose another star a thousand million miles beyond, and leaped.

BEYOND her now was nothing but one tiny spark of light, and this she knew to be another solar system than our own, a million million miles away, but she swung her arms and leaped and closed her eyes as breezes of space swept her cheek.

And now she bothered no more with such petty things as stars and planets. She leaped from solar system to solar system, trillions and quadrillions of millions of miles at each leap, far, far out into the blue-black of space, alighting on a universe only to swing her arms again and leap again to another universe ten million times as distant as the last.

Now and then as she balanced on a universe with arms outspread she looked back to the few faint distant specks of light that marked the path she had followed, and seeing even these pin pricks of light gave her a sense of safety and comfort, for they were the road back from infinity. But safety and comfort were not for her this evening. Always her eyes returned to seek a universe beyond the farthest universe, and when she descried it—the faintest of specks of light—she leaped.

She was now so far from home that she knew she had almost reached infinity. She was so far from home that if Adam himself, the day he was given life in the Garden of Eden, had written down a 1 and had begun writing ciphers after it as rapidly as he could write, and if every person in the world up to the present moment had done nothing else but write down more ciphers, so that the number would be like 1,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000,000 but with pages and reams and billions more ciphers added, she was farther than that, in miles, from home. She was more miles from home than there are grains of sand on the shores of all the seas. From the most distant star that ever was she had leaped to a still more distant star, and from the universe that was so distant that no man could even think of it, she had leaped to universes unthinkably more distant.

And now, as her eyes searched the vaster blue-black of space she could see no more specks of light. She had come to the utter edge of things. It was the end. Beyond was infinity, the thing no one could know or reach

Fit—or Unfit?

How the war has taught us to save our children

By

HERBERT HOOVER

Secretary of Commerce of the United States and President of the American Child Health Association

DURING the four years of the war and for three years subsequent to it, I had the honor to direct the major activities of the American people in the famine relief of Europe, first in the organization of the Belgian Relief Commission, then as U. S. Food Administrator and subsequently with the American Relief Administration.

The primary function of these agencies was the provisioning of great populations in prevention of starvation. In this way twenty-three different countries in Europe were at one time or another saved from economic and social collapse and infinite misery and death, through the resources furnished by the American people. Probably two hundred million people were directly supplied with foodstuffs at critical times, and in one form or another upward of ten billions of dollars in value of foodstuffs were shipped from the United States and administered to their needs.

Early in the administration of these agencies it was evident that the problem of maintaining the health of children in the face of national food shortages was a problem distinct from that of adults, and that while parents could be entrusted in the great majority of cases to protect their children properly if given the special supplies required for them, yet there were great masses of children who could not be so protected, either because of the ignorance of their parents or because of the wreckage of the war, which left them orphans, waifs and deserted little ones. Therefore in practically all of these cases we established a special method of the care of children whereby all of the fringe which might otherwise have fallen by the wayside could be gathered in and given such safeguards for food and health as would carry them through these critical periods. At times as high as ten millions of children were thus separately provided for.

While the great operations of providing other nations with food, which I have referred to, were in the main carried on as financial and business operations (although many millions of destitute adults were supported out of charity), yet the whole of this organization devoted to children was supported by American charity. Out of these operations grew an experience in problems of child health that I have felt should not be lost to the American people, for there was found in them a basic idea which badly needed application in our own country.

That idea is that while our people are the most sympathetic and tender toward children of any nation in the world, and have made fine provision for the care of orphans, cripples and sick children, yet they have not faced the problem of assuring the strongest development of the so-called normal child. We had vivid proof of this in the draft when twenty-one per cent. of the supposedly able-bodied men of the country were rejected at once as being deficient in physique, whereas another eight per cent. of those who were actually drafted were classified as below what should be the national health standard. We were told on good authority that a large part of these physical defects could have been cured in childhood. Under the circumstances it seems to me clearly our duty to study the causes of these deficiencies in the protection of child health, and to undertake practical measures in remedy.

With this in mind I undertook, in 1922, the amalgamation of a number of voluntary agencies in the country which were devoted to problems in connection with child health, and created therefrom the American Child Health Association. The combined budgets of these separate associations received from public benevolence probably about one hundred thousand dollars a year. The new association has had a budget of from five hundred thousand to six hundred thousand dollars a year supported partly by the large foundations, partly by a residue of funds left in hand after completion of the American relief work in Europe, and partly from public contributions.

MAY DAY—CHILD HEALTH DAY—1925

The purpose of the May Day Celebration is to focus attention upon our most precious national asset—our children. The tie between the child and all adult life is at once the strongest and the gentlest element in human nature. Greater sacrifices are made for children than for ourselves; greater happiness is derived from these sacrifices than from all the triumphs that personal success can bring. Our daily labors, whether in the home, or in the outside world of competition for material things, or even in the search for culture and for spiritual advancement, derive largely from the conscious or unconscious impulse to cherish the child and to hold the child's affection and respect.

Lest, in the hurry and strain of life, we should ever forget these obligations, it is well for us to recall the child's bill of rights, which may be expressed as follows:

"The ideal to which we should drive is that there should be no child in America that has not been born under proper conditions, that does not live in hygienic surroundings, that ever suffers from undernutrition, that does not have prompt and efficient medical attention and inspection, that does not receive primary instruction in the elements of hygiene and good health. It is the purpose of these associations to supplant ten policemen with a single community nurse."

It is for the reiteration of this truth, for the celebration of it until it shall have become a living fact, that we urge all people of good will to join in the celebration of May Day as Child Health Day.

THIS CHUBBY-FACED BABY IS NOT NEARLY SO INTERESTED IN HIMSELF AS WE GROWN-UPS ARE IN HIM

THE American Child Health Association has now been functioning for over two years. The agencies from which it sprang were formerly organized to furnish assistance to local health bodies of physicians and nurses and our educational authorities. In the American Child Health Association we have not only enlarged on these lines with increased resources and vigor, but we have undertaken a very much wider effort in directions that we feel promise to be of great public importance.

Our new field is the systematic determination of the shortcomings in child health protection, community by community, and the demonstration of remedy. We do not propose to be either scolds or preachers. Our aim is rather the scientific determination of the defects in community life, the suggestion of remedies, and the enlistment of all the voluntary and official forces in the communities to their solution. We have been confident that the American communities will not rest under shortcomings in their public relations to the care of children.

The achievements of not only this but the other agencies in our country have been inspiring, but they are only a beginning. Each year more than two million babies are born in this country. Upon their feet the nation must march forward. The lives of two hundred thousand babies are lost every year, largely through ignorance and lack of protective measures. Five other countries take better care of their babies than we do. Where New Zealand loses only forty-two out of every thousand babies born, and Norway sixty-two, we lose seventy-six. One out of every thirteen babies born in this country fails to reach its first birthday.

And in the waste of our motherhood we have an even more serious accusation to face. Sixteen other countries have reduced their maternal mortality lower than we have. In this country between sixteen and twenty thousand women die in childbirth each year. One out of every one hundred and eighty-five confinements ends in death. With adequate care, most of these deaths could be avoided. The neglect of prenatal and natal attention for mothers is closely related to the loss of the hundred thousand babies who die in the first month of life.

AS A nation we spend over a thousand million dollars a year to educate the twenty-four million children who are in our schools. Of that amount but a fraction over one per cent. is expended to ensure that they will grow to strong manhood and womanhood. According to the U. S. Bureau of Education, but one-tenth of the nation's school children are receiving "anything which even pretends to be adequate physical education and health training."

It is estimated that we pay one billion four hundred million dollars a year for the services of physicians and other healers, for nurses, hospital services, drugs and patent medicines, while for health work, part of which at least is preventive, we spend through Federal, State and municipal agencies only sixty millions. We actually spend a larger sum in this country for chewing-gum than we appropriate through legislative bodies for health activites.

In 1915, reports showed that the country child had a better chance at life than the city child, but now the city child seems to have a slightly better chance. This means that the ten million school children in our rural population are beyond the reach of the better health facilities of the large cities. The inequality of opportunity is apparent. We need to organize a broadgage program of health which shall reach into the rural districts as effectively as it has in our large municipal centers.

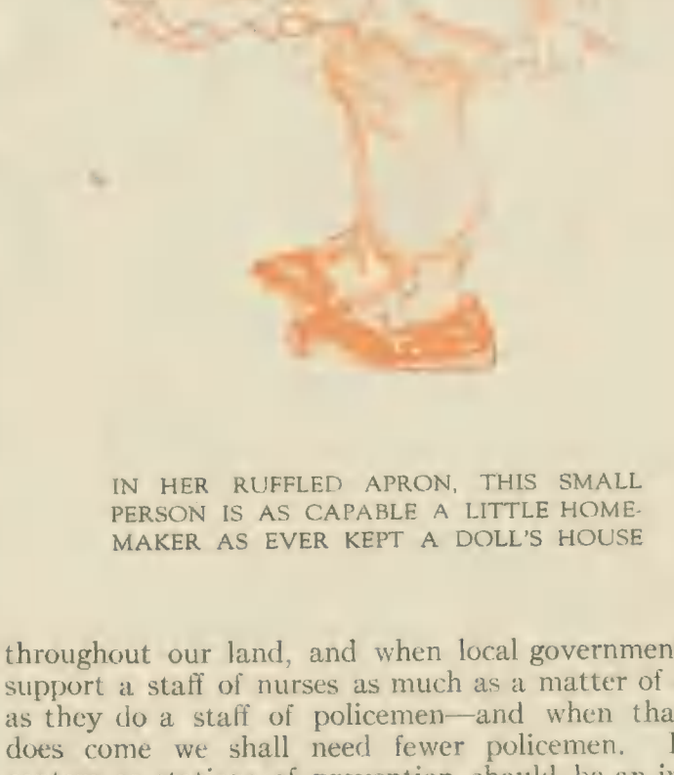
It is obvious that we possess many of the tools that are needed to save the health of our children. All we need is sufficient understanding to work with them. Last year as part of its program to get down to rock-bottom facts the Child Health Association sent out a corps of experts to get a "health picture" of the American child. People know something of the conditions of children in congested city districts, a little about those in rural communities, but of the great mass of children all over the country, beyond the facts reflected in statistics the general impression has been a very hazy one.

The result of this survey is a composite picture of an American child of approximately eleven years of age. It is a portrait that should not be hidden away in our family album, but which should be hung up on our national wall for frank observation.

TAKING HIS FIRST STEP, THIS STURDY LITTLE FELLOW FACES A BEWILDERING WORLD PUZZLED BUT UNDAUNTED BY ITS IMMENSITY



Let us look at that picture and draw some conclusions about the composite "American child." On the whole it is a hopeful picture. He is a comparatively sturdy youngster who had a fair amount of sleep last night, ten hours and nine minutes to be exact. He ate a substantial breakfast, drank a fraction more than one glass of milk during the day, and brushed his teeth all but two days of the week. But he drinks too little milk and needs more attention paid to his lunch-basket, and he should have his teeth looked after more carefully. Though he is weak in several health points, on the whole he might be considered fairly fit. This is, however, the average. All below this average will be weaker in maturity than should be. And even the average is below the ideal of a great nation.

DURING the year just passed we carried on child health surveys in eighty-six cities and several counties. These surveys have yielded most comprehensive information as to health habits of American children, and as to existing equipment for child health work. Among other things we aim to determine the standing of different communities in respect to their own efforts in child-health promotion. In cooperation with the American Public Health Association and with State health officers we have undertaken to set up certain definite standards that mark community progress in our special field. Volume and purity of milk supply, hospitalization and other facilities for childbirth and for children, clinical service for school children, educational work upon child health in the schools, housing and play opportunities, community organization of nursing—all of these are factors in child health.

There are many other current activities in the field of child health to give us hope and encouragement that some day our American children will be nearer the health ideal we have set for them. At the present time in different places in our country—Mansfield, Ohio; Athens, Georgia; Rutherford County, Tennessee; Fargo, North Dakota, and Salem, Oregon—experiments are being conducted in cooperation with the American Child Health Association, the American Red Cross and the Commonwealth Fund, which may bring far-reaching results. These experiments are the so-called "child health demonstrations." In reality they are laboratories to develop ways and means of giving children a better chance in life. Building up the health of children through health centers from the starting-point of prenatal care through the school age, medical inspection and health education in the schools, a broad program for the study of nutrition—a program which reaches back from the children to the mothers—an extended nursing service which is both remedial and preventive, and the development of a sound public-health organization in both city and the country, through a close cooperation of effort with the local medical profession—these are some of the activities carried on in these practical laboratories.

BUT if we would reach the goal we have set in this child health effort, our children must receive protection from three angles: from the community in which they live, from the home in which they live, and from the health habits they are to build for themselves. To accomplish this we need to awaken public responsibility. We must cooperate with the public authorities individually and in groups. We must realize the importance of healthy children to our country. Yet necessary as public effort is, the care and protection of the child and the forming of wise habits rest first of all with the parents in the home, and secondly, with the teachers in the schools.

Many believe that the day is coming when the activities in those communities where the health demonstrations are under way will be widespread throughout our land, and when local governments will support a staff of nurses as much as a matter of course as they do a staff of policemen—and when that day does come we shall need fewer policemen. Health centers as stations of prevention should be an integral part of every community. Those active in child health work look forward to seeing an adequate distribution of efficient hospitals throughout the country with some means of quick contact with outlying districts; to extended instruction in the fundamentals of nutrition; to the formation of mental hygiene and habit clinics for the observation of early mental traits; to the incorporation of health education as an essential part of our educational program; to the guaranteed-milk supply; to the extension of measures to protect children from labor which is beyond their strength both in the home and in the factory—in short, to a new ideal of child health realized on a national scale.

We in America, more richly endowed than any other nation, must mobilize all of our forces to give our children a heritage of glorious health. Throughout the world struggling countries, openly voicing it or not, are looking to us to interpret the new vision of democracy. It is with our children that we must carry on. We must see that they are fit.

IN CALLING on the communities throughout the country to observe May Day as Child Health Day we have sought to bring to public attention on a national scale this child health problem and the roads to its solution. In all this the goal to which we should drive is "that there should be no child in America that has not been born under proper conditions, that does not live in hygienic surroundings, that ever suffers from undernutrition, that does not have prompt and efficient medical attention and inspection, and that does not receive primary instruction in the elements of hygiene and good health."

HE HOPED that her name was Rose. But it was Minnie.

And yet she looked so completely Rose. She was both pale and glowing, she was both near and far—if you know what Elmer meant. Not that Elmer knew. He merely yearned.

He had come to Beetleville to be a pharmacist. So far he presided at large in what old Beetleville called the apothecary's, and young Beetleville called the Blue Lion Soda Grill. Elmer had thought of that name. And his employer, Mr. Meddy, had thrilled him by grinning and saying:

"I spotted you for a batch o' brains."

When the electric sign went up, Elmer nightly all but lost his job by retiring to the street to stare upward. His brains!

When she first came into the Soda Grill, Elmer was alone. So was she. Elmer had never seen any one so lovely, so near, so far. Seventeen, and her curls about her like—like——

"Did—did you want something?" Elmer asked.

"Certainly! I want some rouge."

Good heavens! They used it, but did they buy it?

He set out the boxes, his fingers flat and clumsy—but hers were so cool, so calm, so inquiring. Calm fingers, calm appraising glances. She wanted, she said, rosée, and he sold it to her. Then she wanted a powder-puff of lamb's-wool, and he sold her that. And then she opened the metal box and—used it.

He watched her. He did not breathe. Others he had seen, so. In the intimacy of street corners he had seen them. But not like this.

"Fair," she observed.

"You've said it," he uttered, and blushed, and scraped his feet.

THIS she did not acknowledge. She snapped the metal case, she moved toward the door. She was going!

"Anything else?" he asked, but in gasping imitation of his brisk business manner.

No, there was nothing. Eyelashes on cheek—not a glance for him—she was gone.

What a woman! It was so that he put it. Elmer was nineteen and she was seventeen. What a woman!

Behind the soda grill he polished glasses. Oh, that she had ordered something. He would have run old Meddy to the poor farm pouring in his nectars.

Who was she? Rose—she must be Rose. She must belong to a leading family. She would never look at him. If only she had come there as a beggar-maid. Rose—Rose—Rose——

The door opened. She was back.

"I never paid you," said she.

So she hadn't. He hadn't thought of pay, of course. And now, at the implication in her forgetfulness, his heart beat harder.

"It didn't matter," said he, with all his chivalry.

She eyed him practically. "What kind of a clerk are you?"

For no reason on earth he heard himself saying, "Oh, nothing!"

"How much for the box of paints?" she asked with hauteur.

"Oh, nothing!" He could say no more.

"Are you trying—" She looked full into his eyes, blue, wide, adoring.

"No, no," he said earnestly, and added as one giving a confidence. "It was sixty cents."

She paid, her rosy incredible palm so close to his. She had dime and half-dollar in her hand, almost in his hand. And then she drew back and held out to him a bank-note. "Would you mind changing this?" he heard her say. He took the bill and it trembled in his fingers. Did she—could she—was it that she wanted to linger?

He couldn't count. Some inner sense arose and counted for him. Into her little flat bag she swept her change. If he had cheated her!

And now she was moving from him with finality.

"N—nothing at the soda grill?" he inquired desperately.

She paused, regarded the sparkling glasses, the marble, the sirups.

"I might try a Gum Arabic," she she.

Heavens! A Gum Arabic. When they did this to him, presenting alien names with which he wasn't familiar (though they did appear on a vast list posted somewhere in obscurity), he had at first consulted Mr. Meddy, who made up something. So Elmer had ceased consulting Mr. Meddy and created drinks on his own account to fit the Pullman titles. The Snowdrop became vanilla ice-cream and mints and white buttercups. Egyptian dark emerged as a double chocolate, with a chocolate cigaret on end in the midst of all. So he improvised.

But a Gum Arabic! He searched her face. Sweetly, pensively she was regarding the counter. If she had been anybody else, he would have had a handful of gum-drops in the bottom of a glass, laid in two kinds of ice-cream, garnished the whole according to his fancy, and served it with nonchalance. But this to her he could not do. He could do no more than temporize.

"Wouldn't you try a chocolate malted float? They're my high mark." He grew eloquent. "Thicken it with ice-cream. Richen it with marshmallow——"

She shook her head languidly. "Give me a Gum Arabic," she insisted.

He blurted out, "What is one?"

Her own air of assurance left her. "I—I don't know," she said. "I heard—I think—I thought you——"

She laughed. With the sensation of settling deep into a warm bath he joined her laughter.

Waked from his noon nap in the flat above, Mr. Meddy heard them laughing. The woman in reddish calico, with blond hair dark at the roots, looked up from her chair and her magazine and asked: "Who's laughing?"

"Not you," said Mr. Meddy sourly. "Been you it'd been somebody else doing the laughing."

"Nor, 'less you're laughing at me, it wouldn't be you laughing neither, you scallop!" she retorted.

ON THIS exchange of cordiality, Mr. Meddy went below-stairs. The sun was shining through the red and green waters in the window and through the girl's hair.

"Hello, Minnie!" said Mr. Meddy.

Not Rose then, but yet Rose, too, in Elmer's heart.

"I guess," said Elmer, "I guess it's up to me to take the minute by the tail."

"Hey?" questioned Mr. Meddy. But Minnie—Minnie laughed deliciously.

"We want to know," pleaded Elmer, "what's a Gum Arabic when you drink it."

Mr. Meddy's professional pride soared.

"It ain't liquid," said he.

"We mean the kind you drink at a soda grill," said Elmer, hugging that we.

"Oh, Lord!" said Mr. Meddy, "that might be anything."

Elmer now passed rapidly into all the heavens. He heard her say:

"Mr. Meddy, may we make up one?"

Could we make up one!

"Sure," said Mr. Meddy, "sure. So you know this young batch o' brains, Minnie?" he inquired.

Around the edges of the new rouge she blushed.

"Well—" she said.

"Meet Elmer Dick," said Mr. Meddy capably. "Miss Minnie Little. Meet her, too."

Mr. Meddy passed from Elmer's consciousness and went out and sat under the awning in the lazy warmth. There they were, they two, in the Blue Lion Soda Grill, afternoon sun surging on the glitter of glass and sirup, nuts and eggs, chocolate and cherries. Across the aisle the shelves came alive—colt's foot and licorice and soda mint dissolved into one essence, and that shining. And in the sober show-case below, combs and mirrors and all Mr. Meddy's merchandise lay enormously enhanced in a radiance unearthly.

"What'll we put in first?" asked Miss Minnie Little.

Nectar of the gods, all of them they commingled—but what these were Elmer could never tell. Only of her voice he could have told, and of her little hand, indicating now this and now that for delectation. But he mixed as never he had mixed before, in a dream and a daze and a trembling. An hour ago he had been but a soda-fountain king. Now he was king of a new and magic world!

When she sat to taste what they had made, and he hovered above her, he kept his strange sustained smile, kept rubbing at his sharp red hair, as if these were the only realities remaining. He could recall nothing, nothing of what they talked about. He knew how she looked up at him when she had spoken. He knew the delicious surge of understanding on her face when he made some feeble comment. But what he said to her was writ in Gum Arabic. It vanished and it was not there. Perhaps never had been there.

Then she was going, had risen, was nodding good-by. It was intolerable. Earthquake and cataclysm he knew to exist; but not this, surely.

"Can I see you again some time—ever—just a little while?" he produced.

"I come here sometimes."

"Is that all?"

"Ask Mr. Meddy," she said, and vanished.

ELMER was left to his empty world of chocolate and nectar.

He washed her glass, her spoon. Tenderly. He dreamed of kissing her. He looked up to find before him the huge ungirt figure and late-blossoming eyes of Mrs. Meddy. Then he was aware that she had been for some minutes monotonously addressing him. What she was now saying was:

"Now then, Nut. How'd you get that way?"

"What?" said Elmer.

"A root-beer float," she directed. "And make it fairly fizzy."

"How'd you like to try—" was on Elmer's lips. No. He could make no Gum Arabics for anybody else. Ever.

"Yes'm," he corrected dreamily.

This woman before him was not his idea of a wife. His idea of a wife— He measured the ordered compound and mixed it.

Mrs. Meddy drank her fizzy root-beer float, and eyed Elmer.

"Live home?" she inquired.

From the fastnesses of his utter abstraction Elmer said no, that his home was so-and-so.

"Live in a room?"

Yes, he lived in a room.

"Eat out around?"

Yes, he ate out around.

"Come up to-night and have some chicken."

Now Elmer wanted, more than anything in the world, to be alone in order to think, to remember, to expect. But having no knowledge of escapes, he said weakly that he would be pleased to come and have some chicken. And then, of course, chicken was chicken.

"Got a lady friend?" came next.

"Yes!" Elmer heard himself distinctly replying.

"Bring her along," Mrs. Meddy invited.

Elmer's face blazed. "I don't know her well enough," he confessed.

"Who is she and I'll ask her!" Mrs. Meddy cried, as if she had found a final resort.

But Elmer refused outright, and his thanks came like a postscript.

LOOKING enormously chastened, with his hair brushed, at six o'clock he climbed the stairs with Mr. Meddy. The prescription-clerk looked enviously after them. Already the clerk could savor on the air the odor of roast chicken, challenging his chemicals. But enviously back at him looked Elmer, from the very jaws of the fowl. For what if she should come in the store again, say, to telephone?

Mr. Meddy, coatless, quizzical, moved among the golden oak, the crayons on the wall, the Axminster carpets. Mrs. Meddy, in henna crêpe, evening rouge laid on over afternoon rouge, said: "Hello, Elmer. Bring your appetite along?" They went into the dining-room, a little and sad room, which seemed to have absented itself in favor of its vast round table, its enormous buffet, and its eight leather-upholstered chairs, ranged cheek to cheek. The only remaining space was occupied by a canary, who had just clearing enough to sing a squeezed-in song.

But to Elmer, no limitation was visible. A home it was! Cozy little sitting-room. Cozy little dining-room. (Minnie. Minnie Little.) Furniture and walls flowed together, as had flowed the properties of shop and grill.

"Park yourself," said Mrs. Meddy. These words, as used in hospitality, she had only lately heard, and she cast a glance for the tribute of Elmer's smile. Elmer remained grave.

"Murderation, where's the gravy?" the hostess inquired. She rang a call-bell, which jangled hysterically, and in came a fat maid to whom Mrs. Meddy repeated this inquiry, in these terms.

"'Tain't quite cooked down," said the maid, with a look of injury.

"Deliver it, all the same," directed Mrs. Meddy. "It's time it was."

"I never see such a house," said the maid, and went. She ran, as an emotional outlet.

"White meat or dark?" inquired Mr. Meddy methodically.

"Dark," Elmer replied dutifully. "Or anything," he added weakly, as a concession to a sharp preference for white.

"Dark it shall be, then," ruled Mr. Meddy obtusely, and divided the breast with his helpmate.

"Funny boy to prefer dark," said Mrs. Meddy.

"Yes'm," said Elmer.

The talk led exclusively to food topics. Some of this? More of that? Didn't he like it? Well, then, why didn't he eat it. Incredible intimacies of the palate. Mr. Meddy wished to know why they didn't ever have squash any more. Even when he had been answered that they did have it, but that they couldn't have it every day, could they? yet he pursued the inexhaustible subject. Squash now—there was a vegetable! But to Elmer, the hour and the talk meant only a flat in heaven where, some day, he and she might give a dinner, too.

"Dance?" Mrs. Meddy inquired of Elmer, cutting Mr. Meddy short.

He said that he did.

"How'd you like to go over to the Winter Palace?"

"Sounds good," said Elmer.

"It is good," said Mrs. Meddy. "Swell band. Swell lookers. Nice class of strangers. We'll go over for a while."

Mr. Meddy's reply came with the abruptness of a cuckoo clock.

"Will you?" said he. "And who's goin' to feed the soda patients?"

"You are," said Mrs. Meddy.

"Like lambs I am."

"You won't dance with me. Well, you can tend the fizz department and leave me dance with Elmer."

STRICKEN, ELMER TURNED. MRS. MEDDY ADDRESSED HIM WITH DELIBERATION. "WHEN YOU'RE READY TO GO HOME, YOU RUN ALONG. DON'T PAY ANY MORE ATTENTION TO US AT ALL!" "MY GOSH," SAID ELMER, "I FORGOT ALL ABOUT HER."

"You'll go alone or you'll stay home."

"I'll go. And Elmer'll go. And you'll go so's to watch me. I know you."

"Now look here, Violet——"

Violet! Elmer was the one who looked. And as he looked a wave of pity took him—pity for Mr. Meddy. He had married a Violet, and look at what he drew!

Violet, Rose, Rose, Violet—Minnie!

He thought of Minnie in all her delicate beauty, and her youth. Minnie or Rose, she was all of life for him. And this woman here, was she all of life for Mr. Meddy? Certainly not! For that matter, Mr. Meddy himself was pounding the table and thundering:

"You'll stay in the flat, I tell you. I am not going to have——"

"You'll have some more ice-cream, won't you, Elmer?" Mrs. Meddy inquired quite smoothly.

Elmer's only known way of being polite was to lie, so he said no. In any case, his appetite was going. As he rose and followed them back to the living-room he felt sick. All the intoxication of the afternoon in the store with Minnie was being replaced by this man-and-wife, this woman-and-husband scene. Was this how they behaved after a while?

Mrs. Meddy was getting into her coat.

"You heard what I said!" Mr. Meddy shouted.

"You've got to have you a new suit o' clothes," observed Mrs. Meddy. "No use talking. Still, if you danced, it'd be different."

"This has gone far enough, I tell you!"

"Nicholas, don't be ridic-a-lous," said Mrs. Meddy. By long practise, this fell from her lips in rime.

She was at the door. "Do you run this flat or what?" Mr. Meddy seemed at a loss what to say next, and he selected this, as if it were as good as anything he had left.

She turned. "If my money was to be taken out of flat and shop," she said, "we'd see what run what."

Mr. Meddy lit a cigar. It was his only surviving gesture of authority. And, too, as he took down his hat he winked at Elmer. "She thinks she hen-pecks me," he said, "and I leave her think so."

She brushed something from his coat. "He's the cross-word puzzle for 'angel,' Elmer," she observed, "but you'd never guess him."

"No! Only the 'cross!'" cried Mr. Meddy. With this triumphant joke he led the way from his castle.

THAT which the Winter Palace lacked in art it made up in electricity. Though it was wanting in music, it equalized in noise. Missing exclusiveness, it specialized in number and variety. All this at ten cents a dance.

Mrs. Meddy bought the tickets. "Ladies first," she said, when Elmer would have paid. Mr. Meddy had retired to the seats, and he crouched there, looking ambiguous. Mrs. Meddy held out her arms, and Elmer saw that he was indeed expected to dance with her—three times his size. He received her advances, found his feet, avoided, by a miracle, hers. And walked into the dance.

A solemn dance it was. All the participants on the floor seemed in the unbroken solemnity of some last day.

"Let's liven up," proposed Mrs. Meddy, and doubled the measure. Elmer trotted after her. Of all those solemn cooperators at the Winter Palace that evening, Elmer was indeed the most genuinely solemn. Even before she stepped on his feet he hated it—the loud band, the sleepy-looking players, the dancers without energy or grace, the onlookers commenting audibly and without flattery. It was, Elmer told himself in his heart, a mess. A raw mess. He encored dutifully, endured some more, and led Mrs. Meddy back to her spouse.

"I got six tickets," he heard her say, and pretended not to hear her say. He excused himself, muttered "cigaret," which he never smoked, hid in the hallway, and there——

Floating in blue, her hair floating likewise, her sweet face smiling as she waved away a lingering partner, Elmer saw her. Without thought, without word, drawn by some cord which he could not measure, Elmer was at her side. She looked up, her eyes widened, her face burned, the orchestra banged, Elmer held out his arms, she went to him, they flowed down the room like two clouds on the breast of a river. He and Minnie-Rose.

What a dance! All the people with the joyousness of some first day of the world. The maddened orchestra, the jolly players, the dancers like graceful figures in a happy dream, the watching crowd merely streaming by in a soft gold haze.

He encored like a man in paradise, if that is where they encore most. And she encored, too. Again! Waves of music, of motion, of happiness and of life.

MOTHERS

Comes once more that second Sunday in May when the thoughts of Americans turn home—home to their childhood, home to the beloved one who made that childhood possible. Through Mary Carolyn Davies, THE DELINEATOR most gratefully salutes them—all mothers who are with us to-day and those who have gone before.

Mothers!

The gray-haired mother, whose successful sons and happy daughters bring flowers and love—

The young girl-wife, with her first baby in her arms—

The mother of seven, struggling against poverty and fear and want, but keeping the six patched and mended and in school, and the baby clean—

The mother in the shack on the prairie, in the homestead on the range, in the mountains far from church or neighbors, who becomes church and neighbors and civilization to her children—

The average mother of the average family, with the average amount of bills and worries over Johnny's measles and Mary's beaus—

Mothers!

May Providence strengthen them to go on with high hearts for another year—when we will again bear loving gifts of white carnations or, if far from them, send our grateful telegram.

Mothers! God bless them.

MARY CAROLYN DAVIES

They came to the pause by a doorway, and he drew her across the threshold. It was an office, where sat a man alone at a desk. What he could be doing before a desk in that clamor did not concern them. They did not see him very much, but they lowered their voices.

"I never knew you'd be here," Elmer said.

"Are you glad I came?"

"Glad? Say!"

"You dance fine."

"Well, you— Say!"

"Made any more Gum Arabics?"

"Can't without you."

"Now you say something."

He was bold, because of her eyes.

"Well, then, I will say something. Have you thought of me since I saw you?"

In this, unconscious of its vintage, he breathed dew of morning. In her reply he found the morning sun, even though she said:

"Have you?"

"I haven't thought of anybody else."

"There's the next dance."

"Let's go!"

"I've got it taken."

"Let's go!"

He must have been a compelling cavalier, because she went. Or was it that she wanted those moments? Three dances in succession were theirs. And as he was violently encoring the third, Elmer heard familiar voices.

"I don't see what you want to sit here for."

"I don't. I want to dance."

"Don't want to sit here with me, it seems."

"I might—if you had a decent suit of clothes."

Stricken, Elmer turned. Mrs. Meddy addressed him with deliberation.

"When you're ready to go home, you run along. Don't pay any more attention to us at all!"

"Yes'm," said Elmer gallantly and faintly.

Mr. Meddy burst out in a salutation to Minnie as the music of the encore began.

"My gosh," said Elmer, "I forgot all about her."

As she asked who this woman was and as he told, Elmer was enchanted to see Minnie frown. He was muttering: "My boss's bride—just had chicken with 'em—I don't care! Will you dance with me again?" He was lost to shame.

"Not me," said Minnie Little. "Dance with your chicken!" She laughed adorably—queer, Elmer thought miserably, that a laugh could be so sweet and so cruel.

She left him, went with a man whom Elmer hadn't known existed. He turned and followed Mrs. Meddy. They had paused and she was saying to her husband, in a conversational hiss:

"You're just as outrageous as he is."

Elmer abased himself.

"Mrs. Meddy," he said, "she's the girl I'm—I'm—I'm— And I forgot all about you. Honest, I did." He stressed the last clause, as if there might be some doubt about it.

"I'll survive," said Mrs. Meddy dryly. "I'm not so sure about you."

Mr. Meddy spoke up. "Don't be so hard on the kid. You was in love yourself—once. So was I——"

He had meant to make things better. He had made things worse. His wife turned on Elmer.

"In your next job," she observed, "maybe you'll remember to be decent to your employer's wife."

"Cut it!" said Mr. Meddy. "His next job is this job—see?"

Mrs. Meddy did not turn her eyes toward her husband. "If my money was taken out of the store—" she began.

Mr. Meddy uttered one high note, fortunately indistinguishable from those of the orchestra.

"Take out your money," said he. "Take it out! Elmer and I'll start a soda grill—that's his own idee, and no odds asked of you. Elmer, it's time we was getting back to the store for the late drinks. Violet, are you coming or staying?"

She lifted her eyebrows and seemed to cover herself with their arch.

"Well," said Mrs. Meddy, "I was just going. You can follow along, if you like."

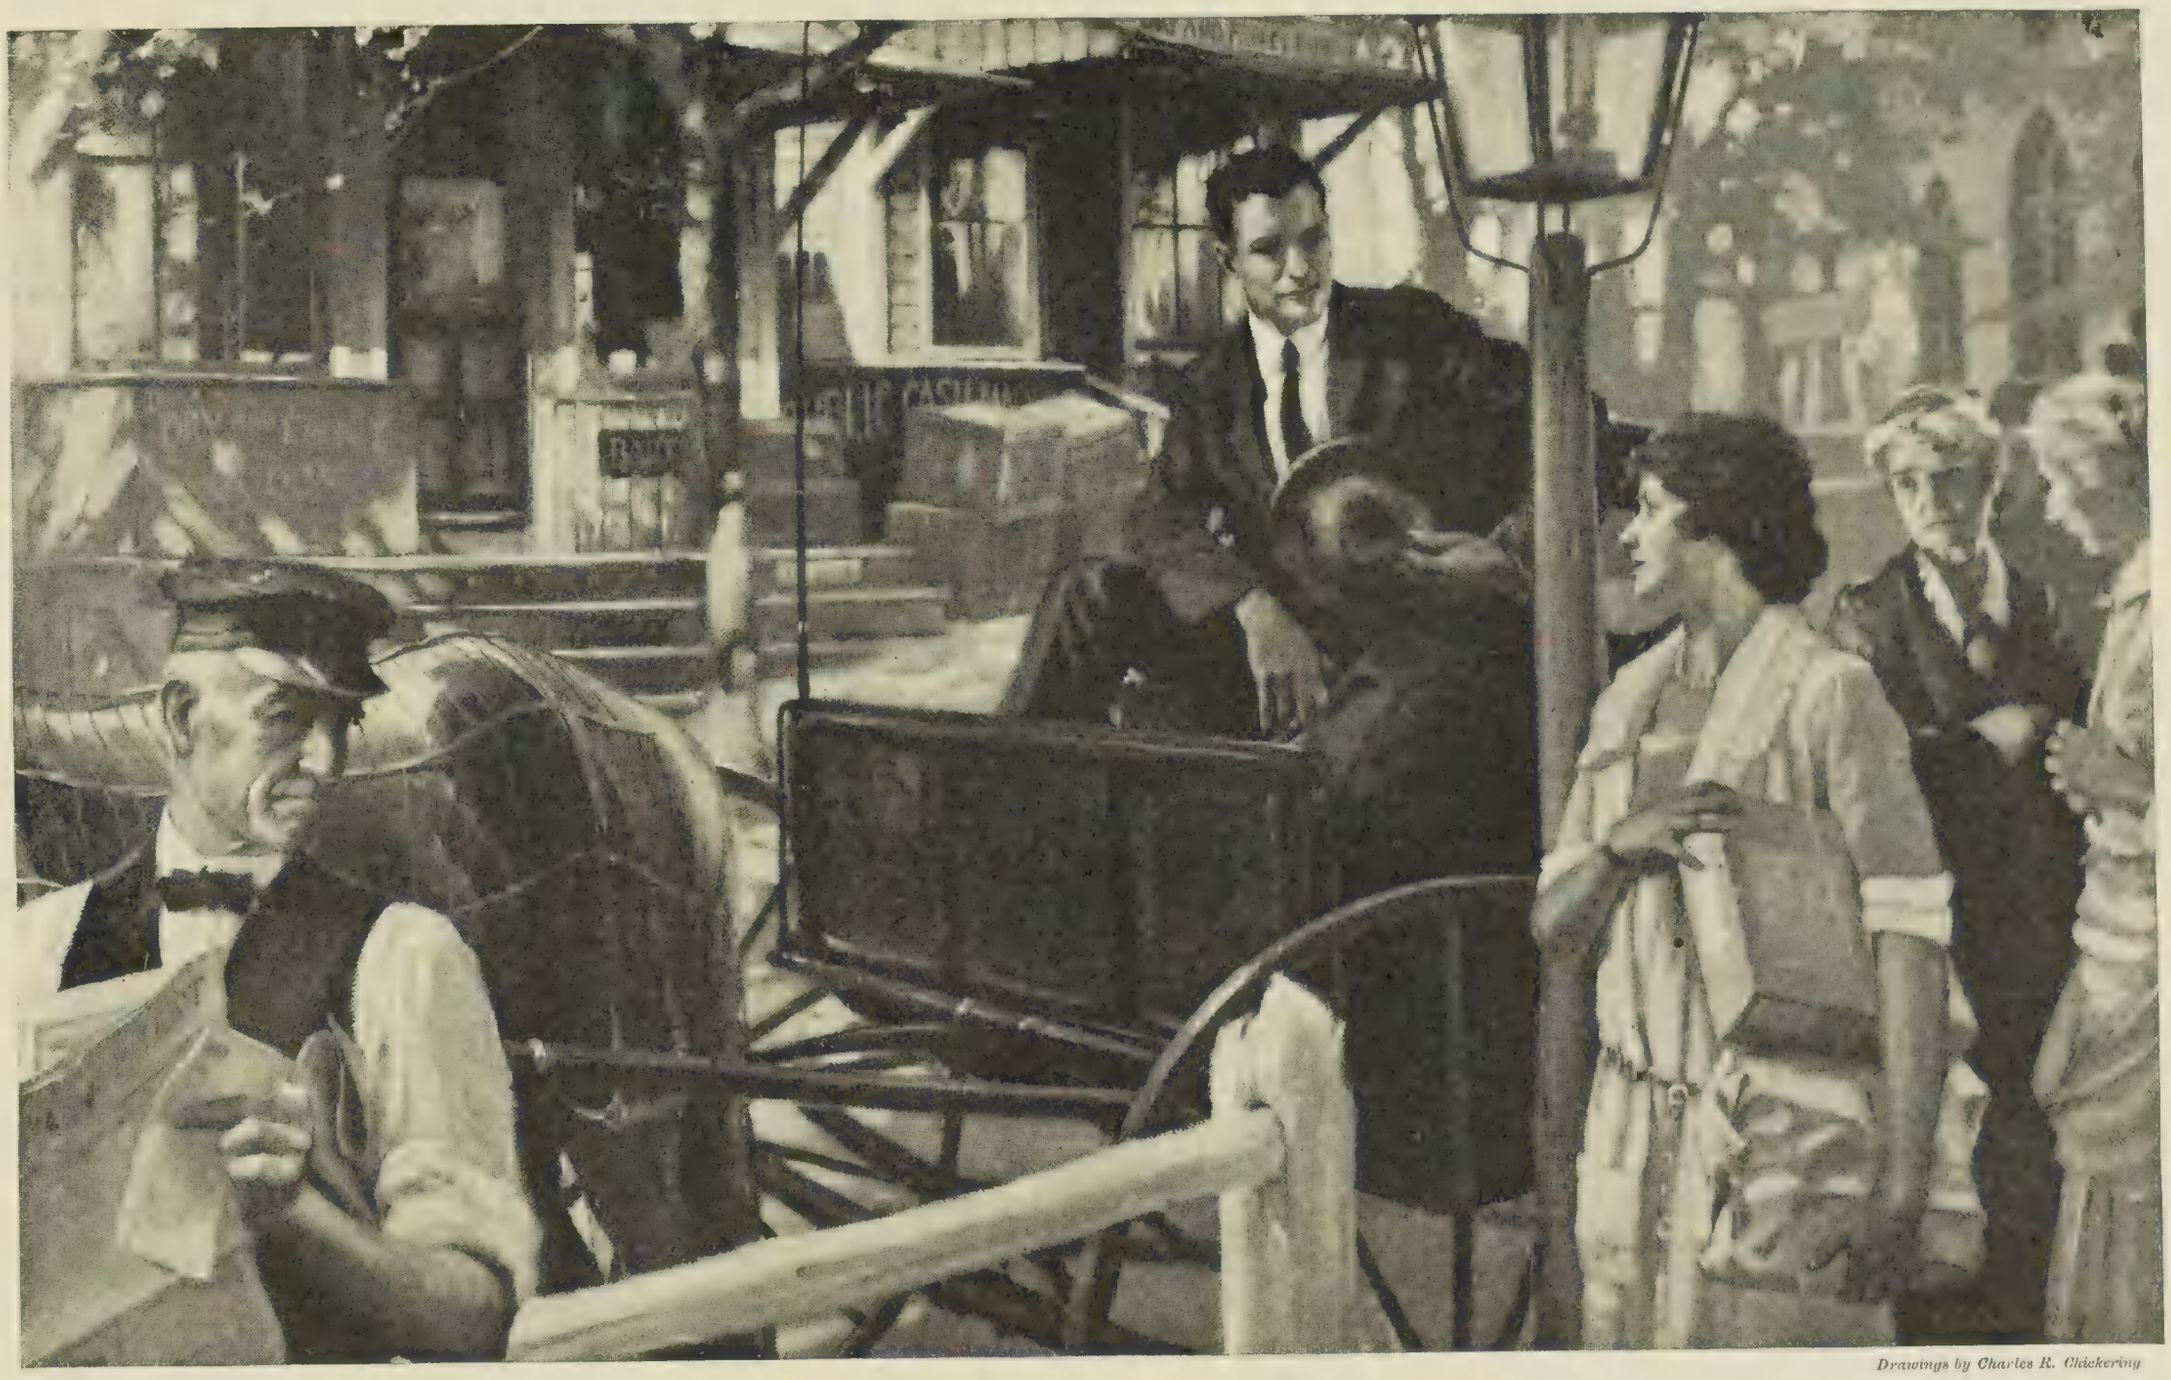
IN THE store she addressed the prescription-clerk.

"Can you make me a root-beer float and have it fizzy?"

"Elmer can," said the prescription-clerk.

"No; thanks," said Mrs. Meddy, and mounted the stairs.

Mr. Meddy winked at Elmer.



"Let's have us a couple o' Gum Arabics," he proposed, "or maybe some ging' ale'll do."

They drank together, man to man. Two men, whom women had joyed and badgered.

And Mr. Meddy said, like a toast: "Ain't life just the opposite o' heaven?"

FOUR o'clock the next afternoon, and Elmer stood polishing glasses. Yesterday at this time! In eight hours he had met her, talked with her, danced with her and lost her. And lost Mrs. Meddy. And his job.

THE PEEL TRAIT

By

JOSEPH C. LINCOLN

Love and heredity at war in a Cape Cod fishing village

ALL THE STORY IS HERE:

CAPTAIN ELIPHALET PEEL was a tyrant on land and sea—so said the Cape Cod village of Wapatomac who had watched his two domineering marriages, his domineering rise to fortune, his lordly retirement from seafaring to live at home with his beautiful daughter Lettice. How he loved her, but how he wished to rule her! When a true lover, Farley Crowell, came a-courting, the old cap'n, distrusting all artists, treacherously conspired to make Lettice refuse him. In this he was abetted by his two older children, Susanna and Amarias, now married, who jealously hated their lovely half-sister. Still secretly ordering his daughter's life, Captain Peel steered Lettice into matrimony with Dave Booker, sporty keeper of the Ocean House. "It's jest common sense," he salved his conscience. But Peel "common sense" spelled great suffering for his favorite. She learned too late of her father's trick—and a serious falling-out between father and daughter followed. Old Eliphalet now began to show signs of breaking up. He lived all alone in the second of a row of three cottages that he owned—nicknamed the A B C houses by fun-poking villagers—but he took no interest in the property and the cottages grew daily more ramshackle. Dave Booker, faithless to Lettice, began to run wild with gambling and women. An automobile accident suddenly ended his worthless life. Lettice, penniless, had to open a tiny notion shop to be independent of her father. The whole Peel tribe turned on her in the fury of injured pride. But bravely she faced their opposition and carried on. Life's storms cleared up for a little while for Lettice. Then suddenly, like a bolt from the blue, came her artist-lover, Farley Crowell, back to Wapatomac!

PART III

SOLON PEPPER brought the news of Farley Crowell's return to Mrs. Salt's boarding-house. Solon had been expecting a consignment of Summer boots and shoes and supplies from Boston and had driven up to the express office at the railway station to inquire concerning the delay in its arrival. He was there when the eleven-o'clock train came in—at eleven-forty-five. At twelve-thirty he burst into the Salt dining-room and exploded his sensation.

"What in time do you think has happened now?" he demanded in wild excitement. "You'll never guess in this world!"

Captain Ziba Bangs had eaten too many clam fritters at breakfast that morning and his noontime appetite and temper were impaired in consequence.

"Then there ain't much use wastin' time here on earth tryin' to guess, is there?" he snapped. "I ain't got so many years left—judgin' by the way my consarned dyspepsy is tormentin' me—and I don't cal'late to spend 'em doin' riddles. Why don't you heave overboard what you've got to tell and be done with it?"

Mr. Pepper drew a long breath. "You won't talk that way when you hear what 'tis," he declared. "Farley Crowell's come back to this town. He's come back here to live, too. Come on the mornin' train. And he's a total wreck, that's what he is. Blowed up by a bomb-shell over in France, and been toted from one hospital to another ever since. And he ain't got a cent to his name scarcely, so they tell me. And he can't hardly walk—and never will except with a crutch—and——"

He was interrupted here, of course. This was news, and the manner of its reception was sufficiently tumultuous to satisfy even Mr. Pepper. Every one exclaimed and asked questions.

By the end of that day all Wapatomac had learned of the return. Solon's yarn was, in all essentials, true. Farley Crowell had come back, and if he was not exactly a "total wreck," he was—to continue with the nautical simile—a pitiful contrast to the trim and able craft which had sailed out of Wapatomac harbor twelve years before.

HE HAD a story to tell and he was obliged to tell it—or a part of it—over and over again that day and the days which followed. The town learned that he had enlisted in the camouflage corps of the army and had spent eight months in France painting all sorts of weird illusions intended to deceive the enemy. He had painted cannon to look like tree trunks and yards and yards of canvas to resemble bush and grass and foliage. He had been in the Argonne and at a place with the familiar New England name of Nancy, but which was as unlike New England as a place could possibly be. At last a bomb, dropped from a German airplane, had fallen upon the dugout where he was sleeping, and he awoke from that sleep to find himself in a base hospital. From that hospital he was taken to another and from that to a third. In the end he was brought, with other fragments of humanity, to the States, and after more sessions with surgeons and nurses was discharged as cured, or as nearly cured as he might ever hope to be. An official commendation for bravery, an honorable discharge from the service of his country and the crutch which was to be his lifelong companion were his souvenirs of the World War.

His aunt, Miss Sylvia Perry, had died while he was overseas, and she had left the little property she possessed to him. It was that inheritance which brought him to Wapatomac. It was scarcely worth the trip, so Lawyer Barnes told Captain Peel. Some Victorian furniture and a few hundred dollars, that was all. What he intended to do next was the question which interested everybody. According to Mr. Barnes, his plans were most indefinite.

"He'll stay right here for the present anyhow, I guess," observed the lawyer. "He says he might as well and I agree with him. This town is the nearest thing to a home he has, and he seems to figure that he may as well settle down here and try to pick up a living by his sign painting and such work as may come his way. I asked him how about his picture painting—you know we all calculated he'd be an artist some day—but he wouldn't talk about that. When I asked him, he just smiled, in a lop-sided way, and changed the subject. I rather guess he wasn't able to make much of a success with his pictures."

Captain Eliphalet grunted. "Nobody with sense ever expected he would," he declared.

Barnes shook his head. "Oh, I should hardly go so far as to say that," he said. "A good many folks used to think he was a wonder at it."

Eliphalet pulled at his beard. "So he's goin' to live here in Wapatomac, is he?" he asked. "Where's he cal'latin' to live? Found a place yet?"

"Why, no, he hasn't. He's got a room down at Mrs. Salt's just now, but he can't afford to pay her prices. I judge from what he said that he hoped to find a set of rooms—cheap ones—or maybe a little house or something, move the furniture his aunt left him in there and kind of keep bachelor's hall. I imagine that's what he wants to do. The trouble will be to find a place at the rent he can pay."

"Humph!" grunted the captain, and walked off.

A week later and that question at least was settled for Farley Crowell. The rumor spread through Wapatomac that the crippled painter had leased the C house from Captain Eliphalet Peel, obtaining it at a rent that matched the condition of the house itself, and was planning to live there and carry on whatever business might come his way.

So Farley and his marble-topped centertable, haircloth parlor-set, and kitchen and dining-room oddments and remainders moved into the dilapidated rooms of the C house. A sign was painted and erected in the front yard with "F. Crowell, Sign Painter" lettered upon it. In the course of time another sign was fastened to the gatepost announcing that toys and Cape Cod windmills and souvenirs might be obtained within. Little by little, custom passed through that gate. An occasional citizen left an order for a sign or a placard and the Summer visitors purchased the toys and windmills and souvenirs. The business done was small, but it was better than no business.

FARLEY saw his landlord only on the days when he went into the B house to pay his rent. The conversations between the two were brief and businesslike. Occasionally Captain Eliphalet asked a casual question.

"Comf'table in there, are you?" he inquired.

"Yes, thank you."

"Humph! All right. Good day."

Only once did he show more curiosity concerning his new tenant's personal affairs. It was on the occasion of Crowell's second call with the rent money. Payment having been made and a receipt given, the captain, sitting at his battered desk in the B house sitting-room, fidgeted with a pen and then, without looking up, said gruffly:

"Ain't paintin' many pictures of cows and stone walls same as you used to, I judge—eh?"

"Not many—no."

"Humph! Found that kind of work a pretty hard way to scratch out a livin' didn't you?"

"Rather. Yes."

"I cal'lated maybe you would. Ever wished you'd gone with those Boston wholesalers when you had the chance?"

"No."

"Eh? You never have! Why?"

Farley smiled. "Because I should probably have been quite as much of a failure at that," he said quietly.

Captain Eliphalet looked at him then.

"So you call yourself a failure, do you?" he asked.

His tenant still smiled, but with his lips only.

"You would scarcely call me a success, would you, cap'n?" he observed.

Eliphalet's reply was, for him, an odd one. He frowned and pulled at his beard.

"I don't know as I'd call anybody in this world a success," he growled. "No, nor the world neither. Hum! Well, suppose I could get you another job up in Boston, or around here, would you take it?"

Crowell was surprised.

"What sort of job?" he asked.

"Oh, clerkin' or keepin' books, or somethin'."

The younger man shook his head.

"You know what sort of bookkeeper and clerk I was when I lived here before," he said. "No, thank you, Cap'n Peel."

"Humph! Just as stubborn as ever, aren't you?"

"Perhaps. But, see here, cap'n. When the Jones & Corcoran offer came to me, you were very decidedly against my accepting it. You said I should stick to my painting."

"Eh? I said so! Who said I did?"

"My aunt for one, and Mr. Duncan for another. They told me that you——"

"Well, well, I don't care what they told. Maybe I did say it. And maybe I've changed my mind since."

Crowell shrugged. "Cap'n Peel," he declared, "you astonish me—you really do. I thought you never changed your mind. I remember hearing you boast that you never did. And now do I understand that you are advising me——"

Eliphalet threw the pen down upon the desk with a savage grunt.

"Advisin' be hanged!" he snarled. "Most advice costs nothin' and is worth about half that. Do what you darn please. Only do it—don't let somebody else talk you out of it— There, there! I've got work to attend to, and I hope you have. Good-by."

He never again referred to the possible clerkship.

Farley Crowell and Lettice Booker had met. Their first meeting was at the post-office, the day after his return, and the meeting had many witnesses. Farley had ridden down to the office in Mr. Barnes's buggy, and Lettice, coming over from her notion shop to get the noon mail, saw him sitting in the buggy seat, a group of chattering townsfolk on the walk beside him.

She saw him and he saw her. The group of idlers saw them both and watched them eagerly. But if they expected a sensation—and, knowing something of the old-time intimacy, that was precisely what they did expect—they were disappointed. Lettice caught sight of him in the buggy and for just an instant she stood still. Then she walked briskly through the crowd and held out her hand.

"Why, Farley!" she exclaimed. "How do you do? Glad to see you home again."

Farley leaned forward and shook the proffered hand.

"Thank you, Lettice," he said. "I'm glad to be here. It is a wonderful day, isn't it?"

That was all. No wonder the crowd was disappointed.

But had Mr. Pepper and Cap'n Ziba and Mrs. Salt been present at another meeting between Lettice and Farley they might have found the conversation more interesting. They were not present, however. No one was within sight or hearing except the two principals. It—the interview—took place on the evening of the first day of Crowell's occupancy of the C house. It was ten-thirty, and most of Wapatomac—the respectable part—was already in bed. Farley was seated in the kitchen of his new domicile, staring wearily at the remains of a hit-or-miss supper still upon the table and trying to summon sufficient courage to begin dishwashing. He had been busy superintending the moving in of his furniture, and it was after nine before he had found time to think of eating. He was tired and lonely and despondent, and his feelings showed in his face. The window-shades were but partially down and the interior of the dimly-lighted kitchen was visible from the road.

There was a knock at the street door. Farley, starting from his dreary reverie, picked up his crutch and hobbled to open the door. Who on

Be a Good Sport

By FIELDING H. YOST

Director of Intercollegiate Athletics, University of Michigan

THE perfect democracy—mankind's objective—will be a state of society in which perfect sportsmanship will prevail. Sportsmanship is a term most frequently associated with competitive games, but in its final analysis it is equally applicable to all human relationships. It implies a perfect regard for the rights of others and a perfect respect for the ambitions and attainments of one's fellow men. Any one who performs a duty to the best of his ability, giving a little more than the minimum required of him and observing the rules of fair play, honesty and courtesy, possesses the characteristics of good sportsmanship. Any one failing in the whole or in any of the parts of this program is guilty of a lack of sportsmanship.

In theory, the perfect democracy is entirely feasible. In practise, it falls short because the individual is unable to reconcile himself to the mass. In other words, a democracy is as nearly perfect as the sportsmanship of the individuals comprising it. It is a fact that any one can easily prove for himself by a careful study of social history that the nations that have made the most progress in civilization have been those in which the ideals and practise of sportsmanship were the highest.

Since sportsmanship can best be taught on the athletic field, it follows that the most progressive nations have been those that have paid the most attention to clean, manly, vigorous sport. It is entirely possible, of course, that one can be a thorough sportsman without ever having taken part in competitive games. Some of the finest sportsmen that I have known have been men unable to go into athletics at all. But in the ordinary walks of life it is not always easy to distinguish the sportsman from the man who lacks sportsmanlike qualities, while on the athletic field a lack of sportsmanship is very soon detected and the man who lacks it is branded for just what he is.

Although there may seem to be some glittering exceptions to the rule, the best athletes are usually the best sportsmen. I have known, it is true, some men who achieved a measure of success without having the right fundamental qualities. That is to say they achieved the success that goes with physical proficiency; they scored touchdowns and they batted winning runs and they scored points on the track. But—they never were able to attain the greatest prize that the athletic field has to offer, the respect and admiration of both their associates and their opponents. I am sure that some of these men would gladly have exchanged all the glory they achieved for the satisfaction that goes with the knowledge that they had "come clean."

THE contribution of sport to life may be divided into three parts. The first and most important part is the development of character. Without this qualification games would lose a very large percentage of their value to the nation. The second part is the building up of the physical man. In a way, this is supplementary to the development of character, since high ideas are best lived up to by a healthy person. The third part is the recreational feature, which in college football is considerably more important to the spectators than to the contestants, since in the nature of things more persons will see an important game than can play it.

The recreational side of sport ought to help toward the more important feature of character building, since the spectators as well as the players should learn sportsmanship. There can be no denying that the standard of sportsmanship in American crowds is constantly improving; but up to date it has not reached the splendid sportsmanship of the athletes themselves.

Of course, it is only natural that the players should lead the crowd in sportsmanship. The athletes are a carefully selected lot, who have been through a rigid course of discipline, while the grand stands are filled with a cosmopolitan crowd, many of whom never played the game and, consequently, do not know what it means to fight hard and fight fair. Furthermore, the players have learned respect for the enemy, one of the most important foundations of sportsmanship. They know that the opposing team is made up of men of much their own stamp, trying just as hard to win and frequently possessing just as many of the qualifications for victory. They go into battle expecting a hard struggle and knowing that only by their best efforts and a fair share of the "breaks" can they expect to come out ahead.

Unfortunately the loyalty of the crowd to one team or the other often takes the mistaken direction of a belief that their team is absolutely invincible. Naturally the man who goes to a game believing that his favorite eleven must win is disappointed if it fails. He is prone to blame the players for their mistakes and to criticize the adverse rulings of officials, without having the least idea of the fundamental reason for any decision that hurts his team. You will often hear a roar from the crowd when a penalty is assessed, while the team against which the penalty is levied accepts it with perfect good grace, knowing that it is deserved.

WE HEAR a lot about "upsets" in big football games. The season of 1924 was remarkable for the number of them in all sections of the country. But just what is an "upset?" It is a reversal of the result that had been expected and predicted. If a man thinks his team cannot be beaten, every defeat is an "upset," because it tears down his ideas of what the outcome ought to be. The perfect sportsman experiences very few "upsets," however. He goes to a football game knowing that each side will have the same number of men fighting with the same weapons and that the result will depend upon how each team plays that particular afternoon—not how it played last time or may play next time. He realizes that his team will have a certain share of the "bad breaks," and he will accept them as part of the attraction of any competitive sport. Mechanical certainty is usually lacking in excitement.

Only a very limited number of Americans will ever have a chance to play in a big football game; but the great majority of them will play competitive games of some sort. A vital part of every child's education is received on the playground, and the lessons in sportsmanship that he learns there will have a marked effect on his later life. The Duke of Wellington's famous remark that the battle of Waterloo was won on the playgrounds of the great English public schools might be combined with that equally famous remark of Daniel Webster: "The sun never sets on the British empire," to show that Britain's leadership in world affairs and her victories in commerce and science as well as in war have been due to the training in sportsmanship her youth has received.

IN A recent address, President Coolidge said: "It is characteristic of almost the entire American life that it has a worthy regard for clean and manly sports. It has little appetite for what is unwholesome or brutal." This is an exemplification of sportsmanship. You cannot picture an American crowd enjoying a bull-fight, for example, not necessarily because the animal is frequently killed, but because from the very beginning he has no chance. We naturally find cruelty revolting, but we are even more outraged by a so-called "sport" in which one side is hopelessly handicapped.

The average American is very jealous of his reputation for sportsmanship. While we have no exact equivalent for the British expression "It isn't cricket," we have exactly the same attitude toward unfairness. A true American would rather take just a little that is honestly gained than a whole lot that was won by unsportsmanlike methods. The worst insult that you can offer him is to call him a "poor sport." That is a fighting term.

There is no exact synonym for sportsmanship. Perhaps the word that most closely approximates an equivalent is respect. The good sportsman respects himself,

The Seriousness of Heart Trouble in Children

"The world is mine!"

OVER four hundred thousand school children in America have heart trouble. This is one of the most serious medical problems with which physicians have to deal, for reports show that death from heart disease is increasing year by year.

A certain amount of heart disease among children can be prevented. Furthermore, and what is more important, by wise and constant care and attention it is possible to keep most children with heart disease from becoming chronic invalids and to guide them safely through the dangerous period of childhood into a normal and active adult life. Once developed, heart disease requires constant supervision, for it frequently progresses silently and insidiously until, before it is realized, it has reached a point where little or nothing can be done.

HOW DOES THE HEART WORK?

IN ORDER to understand heart disease it is necessary to know something about the heart and its work. The heart should be considered as a machine—a pump. And a most remarkable machine it is. Night and day, year after year it pumps steadily away, sending blood through every part of the body, until at the end of our three score and ten years it has pumped over several billion times without a stop.

The heart is a hollow muscular organ divided into two sides, and each side into two chambers. When it contracts, the blood in the chambers is pumped out into the blood vessels, and when it relaxes, the chambers are opened up and filled with blood. This never-ceasing alternation of contraction and expansion forms the beating of the heart to which the physician listens with his stethoscope. He counts its rate when taking the pulse.

The left side of the heart pumps pure blood through the arteries to all the tissues and organs of the body, carrying oxygen to them so that they can continue their various duties. From the tissues, the veins carry the blood, loaded with impurities, back to the right side of the heart. The right side pumps the blood through the lungs where the impurities are given off and where oxygen is obtained through the air we breathe. Then this good or oxygenated blood goes back to the left side and the process begins again.

Most important from the standpoint of heart diseases are the four sets of valves—the two between the chambers on the sides and the two at the beginning of the big blood vessels which lead out from the lower chambers. If it were not for these valves there would be a back flow of blood. The valves between the chambers close when the heart muscle contracts and the blood is pumped out of the lower chambers. Those at the base of the vessels close while the heart muscle is resting and the chambers are filling with blood.

The heart beats with a regular rhythm at a certain fairly definite rate during rest or sleep. In infants the normal rate is high, but decreases gradually until the thirteenth year, when a rate of about seventy times a minute is established—a speed which remains fairly permanent through the rest of life. A great many things affect the rate of the heart's beat. Nervousness or excitement will cause it to go faster. When running, hurrying or exercising in any way, the body requires more oxygen and the heart automatically beats faster in order to pump more blood. When a child has fever, the cells of the body are more active and require more oxygen, and so we find the rate increases.

At every contraction of the muscle the heart is active and at work. During the relaxation period while the chambers are filling, the muscle is resting. When the heart beats faster, it does so at the cost of this rest period, which becomes shorter. The normal heart adjusts itself rapidly to changing conditions and has the power of increasing its usual load of work tremendously when the occasion arises. From the standpoint of mechanics there is nothing that even approaches the heart in regard to the efficiency and the rapidity with which it responds to the ever-changing load of work placed upon it.

WHAT CAUSES HEART TROUBLE?

SOMETIMES an infant is born with a malformation of the heart, just as babies are born with a hare lip or a club foot; sometimes the disease develops in a normal heart during childhood. Congenital heart disease is usually a serious condition and frequently causes death at birth or shortly after. The baby with heart trouble does not thrive like a normal child, nor is it able to throw off infections easily. Sometimes the malformation is slight and unimportant and does not interfere with the pumping of the blood. In cases of this kind, children may go through life without having the heart cause them any disturbance. There are many types of malformation. How serious it is depends upon how much interference there is with the normal circulation of the blood.

Acquired heart disease appears more frequently. As the result of certain infections, tonsilitis for example, the smooth lining of the chambers of the heart become diseased. The valves which check the back-flow of the blood suffer in particular. It is for this reason that we sometimes speak of "valvular heart disease." The valves become leaky or they become bound together and fail to open properly, thus obstructing the flow of blood. Sometimes both conditions occur in the same valve. The result to the heart is the same as when the valves in any pump go wrong: the pump fails to act properly and does not do its work efficiently.

If the valves of the heart leak and a back-flow takes place, the heart must do one of two things to keep the necessary quantity of blood flowing through the body: it must either pump faster and more often, or else it must enlarge to hold more blood. Then even if some does flow back or in the wrong direction there will be enough blood to supply the circulation. If the valves obstruct the flow of blood, the muscles have to work with more force to overcome the obstruction.

As long as the heart overcomes the faulty action of the valves by pumping faster, or by enlarging to hold more blood or by an increase in the size of the heart muscle to add more force (and frequently all three take place), sufficient blood is kept going through the body. When the time comes that the heart can no longer meet the extra work put upon it by the defective valves, the circulation breaks down. This is first noted when any unusual demand, such as running or jumping, calls for more blood and the heart is unable to respond normally. When the circulation slows down, the lungs become blocked with blood. The column of blood slows down in the legs and feet and they become swollen. There are all degrees of poor circulation from simple shortness of breath after some slight exertion to the pathetic state when a child can not even lie down but has to sleep in a sitting position.

Heart disease does not go to this extreme in all children, however. Frequently the valvular lesions are slight and interfere only a little with the flow of blood. With proper care and treatment many children who have heart disease may live a long life of happiness and activity.

Heart disease in childhood is often the result of some infection due to bacteria. While it occasionally develops as the result of some one of the contagious diseases such as scarlet fever, in the vast majority of cases it develops from the disease known as rheumatism. There are four diseases occurring in childhood which have a close interrelationship or dependency upon one another: tonsilitis, acute rheumatic fever in which the joints become swollen and painful, chorea or St. Vitus' dance, and heart disease. Sometimes all four are associated in the same child, but more frequently only two or three are seen in combination. Thus, chorea and tonsilitis, tonsilitis and heart disease (St. Vitus' dance and heart disease, or a combination of three as in tonsilitis, rheumatism and heart disease, are frequently seen. The most frequent combination, however, is heart disease and acute rheumatism. When these conditions exist, either the bacteria get into the blood and are sometimes found in masses upon the valves of the heart or else the bacteria are concentrated at some point, such as the tonsils, and the damage results from the absorption of the bacteria poisons which in turn affect the joints and heart.

Let us assume that a child develops a fever and his joints become swollen. By listening to the heart, the physician may hear new sounds develop. These are called murmurs, and they indicate that the heart is affected, and that the child has heart disease in addition to this other illness. Sometimes after a case of tonsilitis the fever does not go down, and further examination reveals the heart to be involved. During a period of fever the heart condition is said to be acute. If bacteria are present in the blood, the condition may go on progressing until a point is reached when the heart fails to act entirely and the disease ends fatally. As a rule, however, the fever dies out and the child becomes better, but he is left with a permanent injury to the heart. Then we have the condition of chronic heart disease which is so frequent among children.

It is unusual to find rheumatism or heart disease in children under four or five years of age, but it is a most frequent trouble between the eighth and twelfth years. Heart disease is more common in girls than in boys.

HOW TO HELP THE CHILD WITH HEART DISEASE

VERY little can be done to help the child who has acute heart disease, except to put him at absolute rest in order to avoid as much strain as possible upon the heart. The cause of the trouble should be determined and treated. For the parent there is a real problem in the management of a child who has chronic heart disease, or, as it is usually termed, "heart trouble." First of all he must be kept at rest for many weeks after the acute difficulty has quieted down, so as to give the heart time to strengthen and the injury to the valve an opportunity to heal.

Any source of infection such as diseased tonsils must be removed or treated so as to prevent a second acute attack. Overstraining the damaged heart, which may result from new infections or from physical overstrain, is a grave danger. The severity of the infection often depends upon the general health of the child, and so the nutrition must be at or above par in order to keep up a good resistance. It may be said that the prognosis or outcome of heart trouble goes hand in hand with nutrition.

The amount of play or exercise which a child with heart disease may take depends entirely upon the degree of the heart injury. When the injury is bad, even walking up stairs may have to be forbidden; while in children with slight injuries, mild forms of sport may be permitted. Every child with heart disease must be treated and advised individually. No general rules can be laid down. In many severe cases a certain amount of limited exercise of a special type is needed after a time and is of benefit to the muscles of the heart. This strengthens

ARE YOU A "HAPPY CHILD" MOTHER?

That's to say—are you a member of "The Happy Child Clubs," and do you get Doctor Shaw's monthly letters?

They're letters from this eminent child specialist, warning of seasonal epidemics, discussing important problems of hygiene, and helping you bring your little one up in health and strength. Every month four different letters go out according to the ages of the children: one for Expectant Mothers, one for New Babies, a third concerning little Runabouts, and a fourth about School Children. Four clubs—four letters!

Membership in a single club is only fifty cents a year, and in all four the special price of one dollar. Send your dues to "The Happy Child Clubs," THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., stating which membership you wish, and your first letter will go to you at once

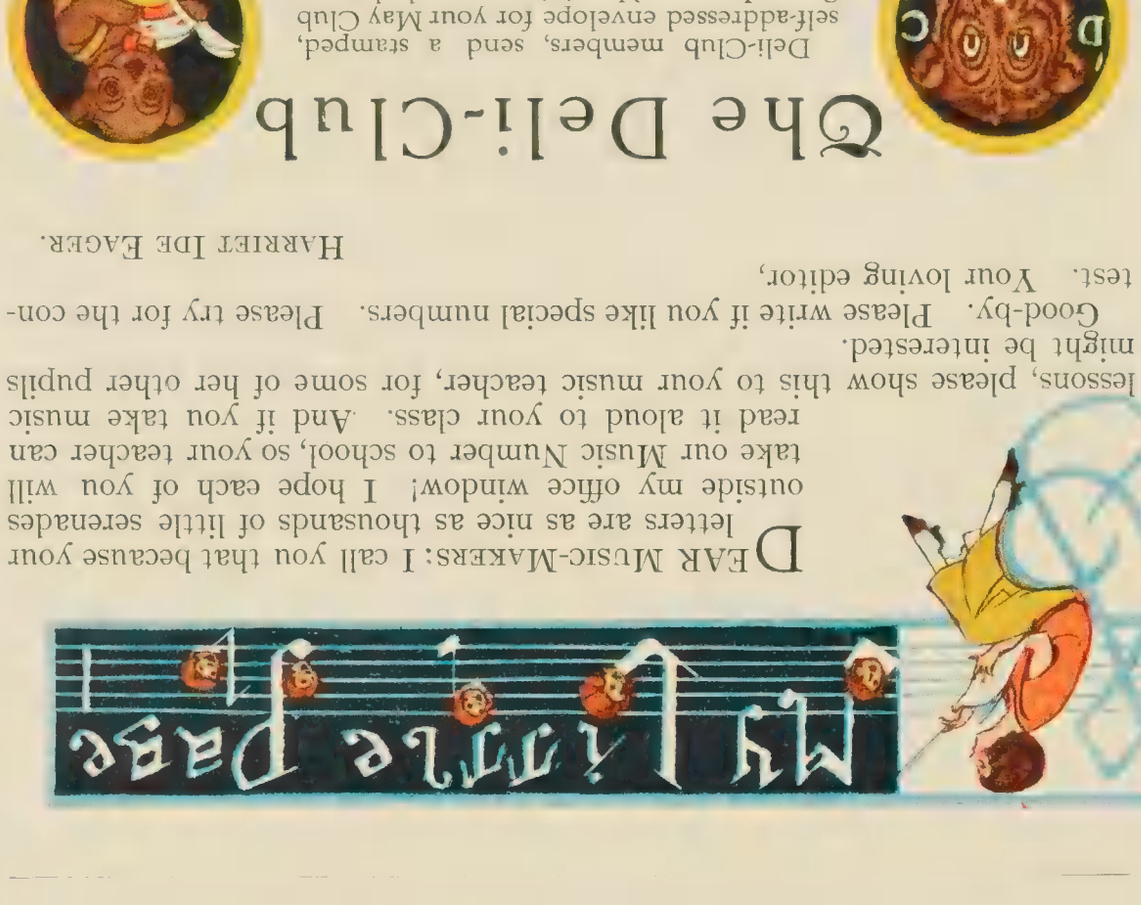
The boy who ran after the stage coach

HIS name was George Frederick and he was born in a quaint little town of Germany, two hundred and forty years ago, (about the very time that William Penn was founding Philadelphia, the City of Brotherly Love). His father was a barber, surgeon and dentist of Halle, for, in those days, barbers cared for bodies as well as beards! And a stern severe old barber he was, who determined, the day George Frederick was born, that his son must grow up a lawyer.

Poor little George Frederick, knew nothing of this. He only knew that from the time he could remember, he loved music better than anything in the world, and that music was always forbidden him. His father thought it a namby-pamby business; he allowed no musical instrument in the house, and even kept George Frederick home from school for fear he might learn a scale or two!



But there was music in George Frederick's heart, and not even a stern old barber father could stop it. Somebody, probably his mother, helped the little boy to drag a rickety old spinet into the attic where he slept. (The spinet was a sort of feeble great-grandfather of our piano.) So when all the family were safely asleep, little George Frederick would crawl out of bed and practise and practise on the spinet till his fingers ached and his eyes blinked with sleep.

He was only seven years old, and practising in secret every night, when one day his father started on a visit to George Frederick's elder brother, a page in the household of the Duke of Saxe-Weissenfels. The little boy begged and teased to go, but his father refused. So the stage-coach drove up, father climbed in and off clattered the horses. But why were all the passengers craning their necks out of the window? George Frederick's father looked out. There in the road behind them ran a small, determined figure—his son!

Perhaps the old barber was pleased with his boy's persistence, or perhaps he was cross. At any rate, he called to the driver to stop the coach and pulled in poor little panting George Frederick.

Of course, once at the estate of the Duke, it did not take the little boy long to discover the wonderful organ in the Duke's chapel. And somehow one day he managed to steal in and take the organist's seat. Though he had never had a lesson in his life, beautiful sounds began to peal forth from under those seven-year-old fingers. The Duke, who was a musician himself, heard, and went to see the stranger organist. There sat a small boy—George Frederick!

The surprised Duke chatted with him kindly and when he understood his love for music, he told George Frederick's father it was wicked to make a lawyer of such a talented young musician. Little George Frederick was sent to study with the organist in the Halle Cathedral.

Long and hard he worked, but it was all joy for George Frederick. He learned to play the organ, the violin, the oboe and the harpsichord (another great-grandfather of the piano). Before he was nine years old, he was composing his own pieces and playing the organ on Sunday mornings in the cathedral.

At last his old teacher declared that his pupil knew more than he, and when he was only eleven, George Frederick was sent to Berlin to study and to meet other musicians.

When his father died he managed to send money to his mother and yet save enough to travel in Italy to hear music and to meet the great musicians of the day. When at last he journeyed to London, a grown man, his success there was so great, that he made England his home.

Probably his music that you know best is: "The Harmonious Blacksmith," and his oratorio, "The Messiah," with its famous "Hallelujah Chorus" and its beautiful "I Know that My Redeemer Liveth."

Now have you guessed George Frederick's last name?

It was Handel—George Frederick Handel, one of the great musicians of the world, the boy who ran after the stage-coach and found his dreams come true at the end of the road.

Sleep well, sleep well, and dream of me,
And dream this night of me!
That when thy mother slumbers deep,
Her heart may hover o'er thy sleep,
Her heart its quiet watch may keep,
My darling dream of me!

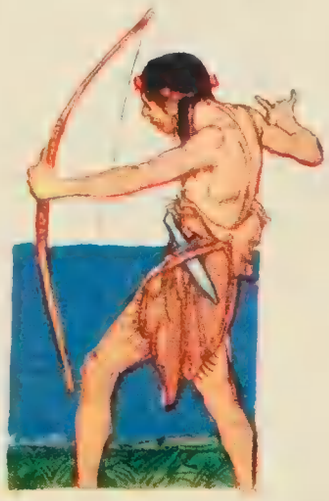
Any You Hop? Can You Skip? Can You Jump?

One of the first ways people began to feel music was by dancing. Haven't you noticed how even little babies jig up and down to tunes?

Did you ever try putting some pretty, skippy piece on the phonograph and skipping all around the room, as the tune tells you? When the tune skips high, so do you, with your arms high in the air. When the tune seems to skip in whirls, you whirl, and when it does funny little trills, you invent funny little steps of your own.

Or perhaps you would rather play a solemn march, and pretend you are a stately queen, with a crown and a long train, marching slowly, slowly and beautifully at the head of some grand procession, with hosts of your subjects following behind.

Then there are pieces like butterflies, and some like elves underground, and some that just sound like happy children playing in the sunshine, and others like babies going to sleep. If you know any pretty songs, you can sing and dance them at the same time.

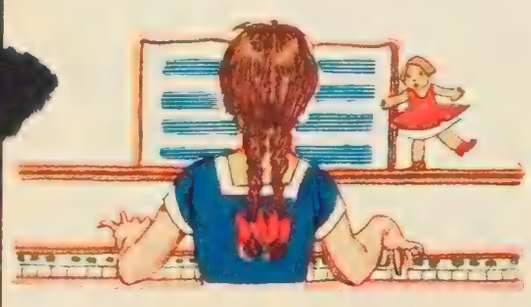


It is nicer to take off your shoes and stockings, shoes anyway. And if mother will make you a little soft gown like those in the picture, you will feel more like a fairy or a butterfly. You can play the dancing game alone or with friends.

If you or your mother or your teacher would like an interesting letter from Miss Ruth Ingalls, who teaches this kind of children's dancing in New York, telling how to dance some fun-fancies, send a stamped, self-addressed envelope to The Little Delineator, New York, N. Y., and ask for the "Dance Letter."

How Music Began

WE CAN only guess how music began, thousands and thousands of years ago, when savage men roamed the strange and ancient world. But scholars believe that man's very first music was his hunting call, cried out as he tracked beasts through the deep forests. Probably he began to like the sound of his own voice, and one day as he rested, he repeated the hunting call, for his own pleasure. That was his first music. When he and his tribe learned to put this cry together with other signals, the sounds became more like real music.



Guessing by the queer old relics dug up by scientists in various parts of the world, the first instrument man used to make music was the flute. Perhaps one day some savage more clever than the others heard the wind whistling through a hollow reed, and suddenly thought of cutting off the reed and using his own breath for wind. As he played with his new toy, he found that if he cut holes, the sounds changed. But reeds do not last long, and other men began to carve flutes from bone. So the changes went on, until the flute grew into the beautiful thing we hear to-day.

Perhaps a branch bumping against a tree first gave man the idea of drums. Savages in some parts of the world to-day still beat hollow tree-trunks, or pieces of skin tied tightly over bowls for drums.

After man had learned to use a bow-and-arrow, an archer one day noticed the pleasant twang of his string as the arrow shot from the bow. He began to try different kinds and numbers of strings and that was the first harp.

When you are practising or listening to music, remember how it all began thousands of years ago.

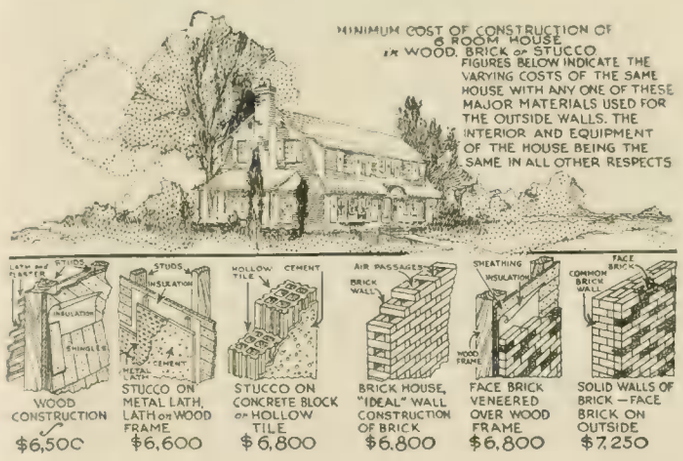
"It's not my fault," poor Deli-Mother thinks, "if Deli fails."

4—Next morning come the Deli-folk to ask him please to play
A piano piece all by himself on Forest Concert day!

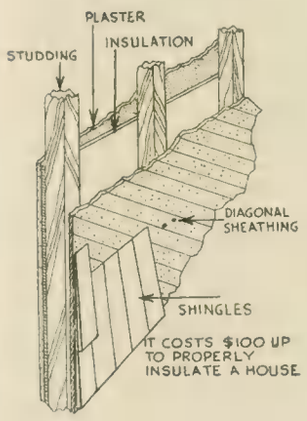
5—The Concert's here! With trembling paws, he sits down, bold and proud.
He starts. He stops. Alas! he's stuck. The others laugh aloud.



6—Instead the modest birdies come and trill with all their hearts.
They've waked at sunrise every day to learn their singing parts.

What a Home-Builder Ought to Know

By EDWIN H. BROWN



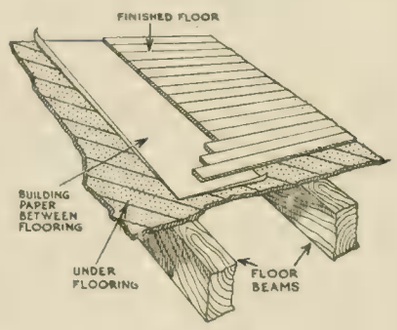
Secretary of the American Institute of Architects, President of the Architects' Small House Service Bureau, and Director of Better Homes in America

EVERY family hopes at some time to build a practical, comfortable, well-constructed home which will be easy to care for and reasonable to keep in repair. But until a person has actually approached the project of home-building he is unaware of the snares and pitfalls that lie in wait.

The advice of well-meaning friends is generally too vague to be of value and the technical knowledge of architects and contractors often results in bewilderment. The puzzled home-builder with the thousand and one questions that perplex him is, indeed, at a loss.

To all those of our readers who desire scientific facts presented in practical every-day language, THE DELINEATOR dedicates this article. It is planned to answer those questions which the prospective home-builder most often asks.

Construction costs—wherever they are given—are approximate—as these differ greatly in various parts of the country.



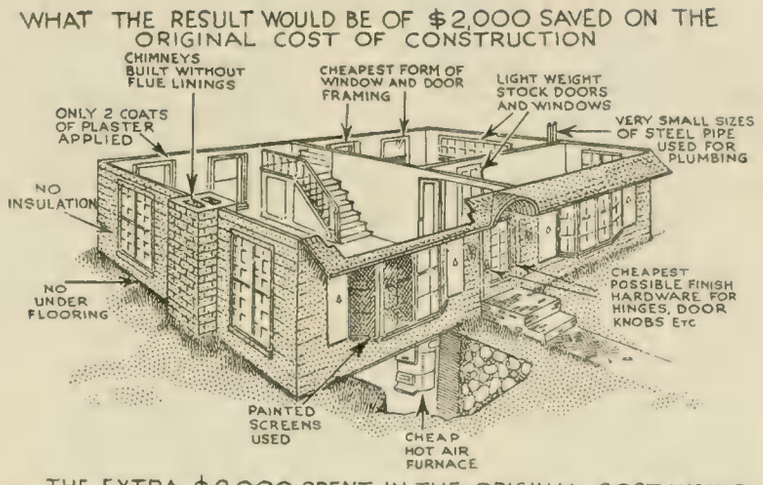
Question 1—What is the mimimum cost of building a six-room house of (a) wood, (b) brick, (c) stucco?

Answer—It is difficult to make any comparison between these three types of houses. One can only attempt to strike an average, a probable standard for each house, assuming it to be a rather simple small house. An all-wood house could be built for about $6,500; a stucco house, stucco on metal lath on a wood frame with wood sheathing, with a standard dash finish, for about $6,600; a stucco house on concrete block or hollow-tile walls, with a standard finish on the stucco, for about $6,800; a brick house with ideal wall construction of brick, for $6,800; a house of face brick veneered over a wood frame, sheathed with wood, for about $6,800; a house with solid walls of brick with a good face brick on the outside, for about $7,250.

Question 2—What is the difference, approximately, in the cost of upkeep of these different types of houses?

Answer—We have to consider, so far as upkeep is concerned, only those things which weather can destroy. Concrete and brick may be considered more or less indestructible, but a wooden house will deteriorate very rapidly if it is not kept protected. On the stucco and brick houses we have to look out for the doors, windows and their frames, shutters, columns, cornices and other wooden trimmings. On the wood house we have to consider, in addition to these things, the entire wall surfaces. Depending on the climate and on the kind of wood used these parts must be either painted, stained or oiled at regular intervals, varying from once in two or three years to once in twenty or thirty years. On the size house we are considering this upkeep would cost about $50 a year for the brick and stucco types and about $200 for the all-wood type.

Question 3—Granting a minimum sum for honest construction—say $9,000—how much in upkeep would be saved by adding $2,000 to the construction cost?



EXTRA COST OF UNDER FLOOR FOR 30×40 FT. HOUSE WILL NOT COST OVER $30 FOR FIRST FLOOR

Answer—This is a very difficult question to answer, depending upon what is meant by honest construction. Roughly speaking, however, $2,000 extra could be invested so that the following would result:

(a) A saving of 50 per cent. on the fuel bill.
(b) Protection against fire.
(c) Quiet, durable plumbing.
(d) A heating plant that would last for years without repairs.
(e) A house easy to keep clean and free from dirt.
(f) A house that was cool in Summer and warm in Winter.
(g) An unknown amount in doctor's bills due to good health.
(h) Doors and windows that would open and shut at all seasons of the year.

Question 4—What are the chief extravagances in small-house construction?

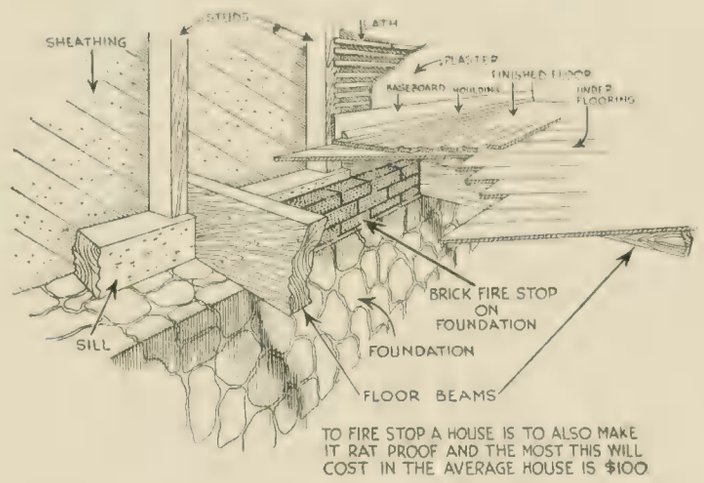
WHAT THE RESULT WOULD BE OF $2,000 SAVED ON THE ORIGINAL COST OF CONSTRUCTION

THE EXTRA $2,000 SPENT IN THE ORIGINAL COST WOULD BRING THE FOLLOWING DESIRABLE RESULTS.

Answer—Fancy fixtures, elaborate woodwork and all those things which make for show and ostentation are the chief extravagances in small-house construction.

Question 5—Have people been converted to the use of part of the first-floor space in one large room, kitchen and breakfast-nook?

Answer—People are using the kitchen with a breakfast-alcove arrangement more and more. It is proving eminently satisfactory.



Question 6—Health authorities tell us that an important decrease in mortality from kidney trouble could be obtained by putting an additional toilet on the first floor of every two-story house. How much would this add to the cost, not merely for plumbing, but for space and construction?

Answer—Outside of what the health authorities so wisely announce I know of nothing that simplifies the living in a house more than a first-floor toilet. The cost of this extra convenience is small. If the entire space for it on two floors must be added, the expense would not be more than $200. The cost for the plumbing, depending on the place where you live and on the local ordinances, would run from $75 to $100.

Question 7—How much saving in up-keep is there in brass plumbing?

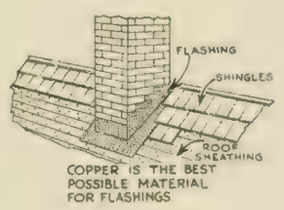
Answer—That, too, depends on where you live. In some parts of the country it is most advisable to use brass plumbing because of the character of the water. In other parts it is not so essential. In the first case you might have to replace steel pipes every few months or years. In the other case you might never have to replace them.

Homebuilders!—Are you looking for house plans or seeking other building advice? Is it the problem of remodeling the interior or exterior of your old home, or of building a new house, that bothers you most? THE DELINEATOR offers its assistance—without charge—to anyone who contemplates building. Write your problem to the Home-Building Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and be sure to enclose a stamped envelope for reply

TO FIRE STOP A HOUSE IS TO ALSO MAKE IT RAT PROOF AND THE MOST THIS WILL COST IN THE AVERAGE HOUSE IS $100

Question 8—How long do iron pipes last? Does climate—that is, cold weather or freezing weather—affect them?

Answer—The first question has already been answered. There I referred to steel pipes which are commonly called iron pipes. If you can get genuine wrought-iron pipes, they will last longer than steel or iron. Cold or freezing weather does not affect steel or iron any more than other metals. If you live in a cold climate, you must not have water-pipes where cold can get at them, as a pipe full of water will burst if allowed to freeze. Hot water causes more damage to pipes than any other thing. Study local conditions before deciding on what kind of pipe to use.



Question 9—How about lead pipe?

Answer—So far as I know, the lead pipe is rapidly going out of use. It is no longer a real factor in the plumbing of a house.

Question 10—How much in upkeep do copper flashings save? And what is the additional cost of copper flashings?

Answer—Again a matter of locality. Copper undoubtedly is the best possible material for flashings, but it does cost more than other materials, such as tin or galvanized iron. In certain parts of the country it is safe to dispense with the use of copper if you will keep the house and roof property painted. Compute the cost of paint and the cost of replacing your flashings every few years, and you can find out the upkeep.

Question 11—Isn't a floor laid without the rough under flooring noisy, uneven and difficult to heat? How much is saved by this skimping?

COPPER IS THE BEST POSSIBLE MATERIAL FOR FLASHINGS

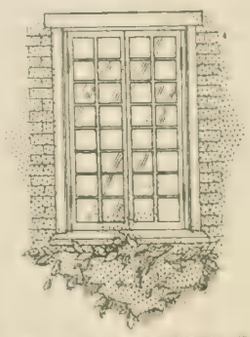
Answer—Such a floor is not only noisy, but it is hard to keep clean because of the dust from below coming up through it. It is hard to heat, and it does not stand up well under hard service. For a house thirty feet by forty feet the extra cost for the under flooring should not exceed $30.

Question 12—How much is saved by having one chimney in a house?

Answer—This depends on how many flue linings you have. In some houses one chimney will have as much as four flues, providing for furnace, kitchen and two fireplaces. An ordinary one-flue chimney costs around $150.

Question 13—What is the additional cost of an open fireplace?

Answer—A very nice-looking fireplace, with a hearth, front, mantel, damper and combustion-chamber, can be built for about $100 to $150.



Question 14—How large a cellar is necessary where there is rock foundation under the house? Is it costly?

Answer—It costs more than the ordinary excavation, but you can very easily save here by merely excavating enough space for your furnace and fuel room. You can also save by building a cellarless house. Heating plants that do not require cellars have been made possible for small houses.

Question 15—How much money is saved by copper screening that doesn't rust?

Answer—If you get galvanized-iron screening and keep it painted it will endure as long as a screen will ordinarily escape being broken. There are other types of screening,

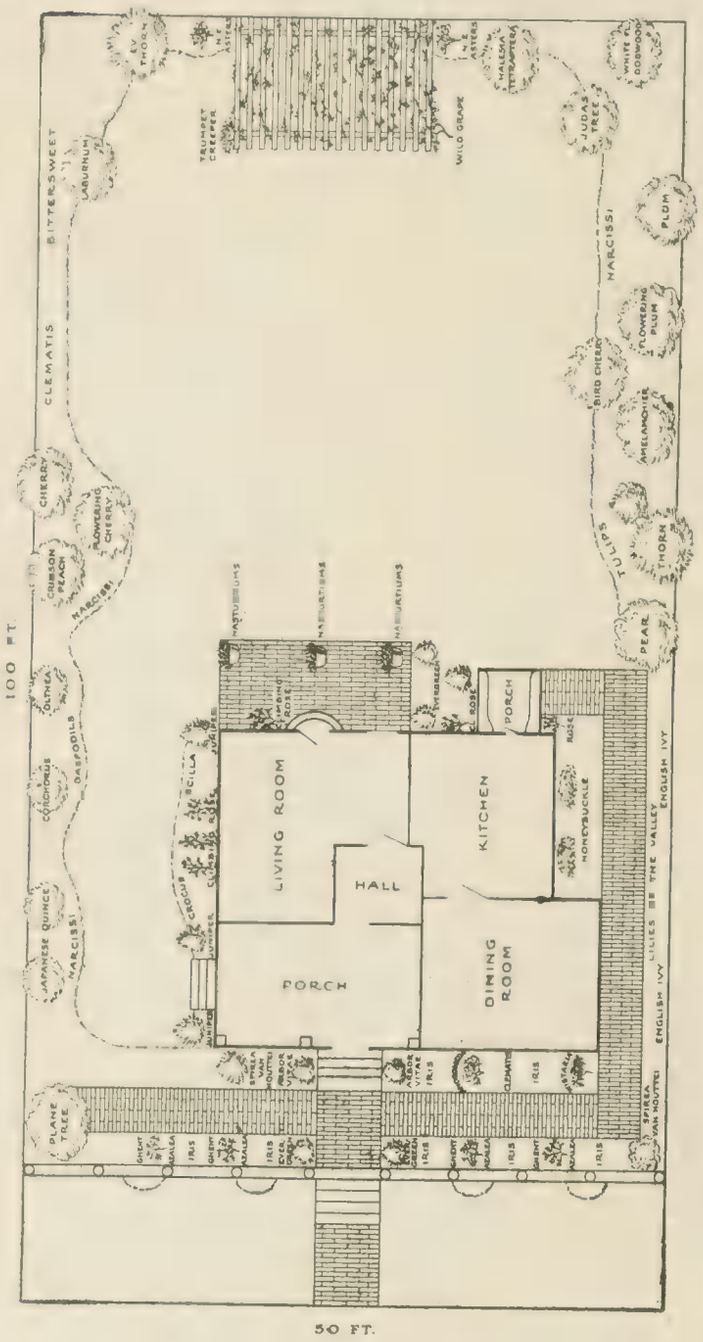
Beautiful Grounds for your Home

How you can turn a plain yard into a lovely garden

By FRANCES DUNCAN

Author of "The Joyous Art of Gardening"

"I went into a house, and it wasn't a house,
It has big steps and a great big hall;
But it hasn't got a garden,
A garden,
A garden,
It isn't like a house at all."
A. A. MILNE



IT IS a delightful truth that our pleasure in our gardens does not in the least depend on the size of our estate or the depth of our pocketbooks. One person can make as much garden loveliness in a small backyard as another can with a baronial estate at his disposal.

Blest with a charming garden the plainest, shabbiest, most unpretentious of little houses may have real beauty; without it the handsomest house has a forlorn, orphaned appearance. "It isn't like a house at all!"

But suppose you live on a suburban street, in a house exactly like dozens and dozens of other houses on that street and other streets. Suppose you have but ten or fifteen feet of ground between your door-step and the side-walk and a yard just big enough to hang up the clothes. What will you do about a garden?

EVERY CHILD SHOULD BE GIVEN THE JOYOUS OPPORTUNITY OF PLAYING WITH A GARDEN

EVEN A BUSY HOUSEWIFE CAN HAVE THESE SIMPLE LOVELY GROUNDS ABOUT HER HOUSE

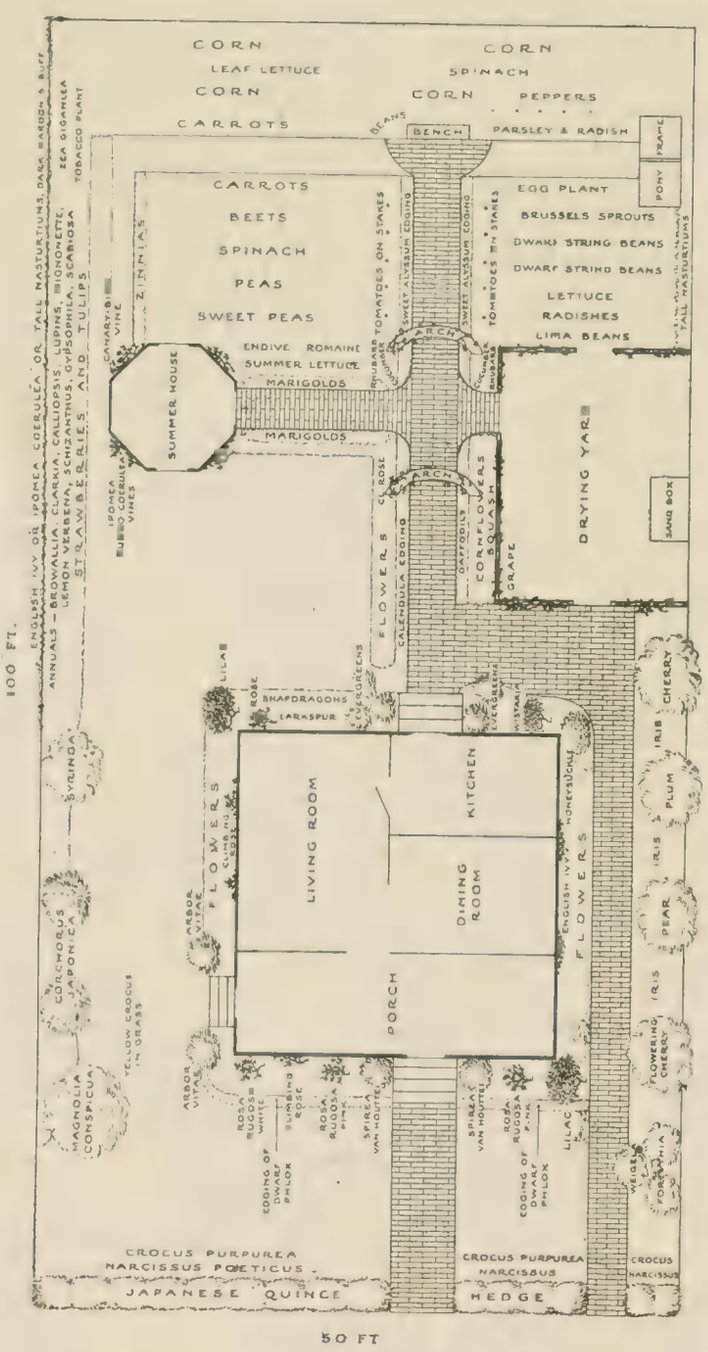
Contractors have made things difficult for beauty-loving people. Many a young couple who imagined their home a charming, piquant little place, a rose-embowered cottage possessed of a quiet distinction of its own, must needs take what the contractor hands out—one of the thousands of homes built just alike because it is easier and cheaper and requires less mental effort to make them all alike. So it happens that the householder's chance of individuality for the outside of his house often lies in the planting of his dooryard and of the garden space, even though it be at the rear of his home.

The owner's first consideration is that he extract as much enjoyment as is possible for himself, his wife and family out of the tiny space. I remember a house in Charleston, South Carolina, which had but a few feet between house and street—but there was a rare and beautiful oleander growing there, with the result that the passer-by gave not a thought to the smallness of the space but saw only the oleander's rose-colored loveliness.

Wherefore consider, all you people with a tiny garden space, what it is you would most like to have in your door-yard, and plant accordingly. If you have a memory of a lilac blossoming at a house corner, then plant one of those; or if you have dreamed of a rose-arched doorway then plant the climbing rose. Only make sure to have the soil rich so your lilac and rose will grow their handsomest.

It is all very pleasant for the speeding motorist to glimpse street after street which has been "parked." Such an arrangement gives him the impression of a wide avenue that actually reaches to the front walls of the little houses. But the thousands and thousands of home-loving folk who sit evening after evening on their porches fronting the street should certainly have something more to interest them than a stereotyped bit of greensward. And then the little folk of the household, if little folk there be, should not have to hear the ceaseless iteration of "keep off the grass." For children see a reason for keeping off tender little flowers, but they see nothing but an amazing denial of their rightful heritage in "Keep off the grass."

For my part, I would be glad to see a return to the fenced-in yard because this fashion would mean the return of the small flower-plot. Who thinks it worth while to make a garden when his neighbor's dog, in a single visit, may destroy it? The lovely little gardens which abound in England and France are all walled or fenced or hedged for safety.



A FLOWERING hedge makes a most charming boundary. Or a stout fence of poultry-wire supported by posts which are painted green and which opens with a gate of good design, if planted with nasturtiums or morning-glories, will give excellent protection to the garden, and the wire goes unnoticed under the cheerful bloom. Using a two-and-a-half-foot fence of poultry-wire as a garden fence in this way is both practical and decorative, especially for those people whose house is very new, whose grass plot is still in the making.

Contractors have a most inconvenient habit of leaving the small plot about the house with hard-pan on top and with the good soil buried some four or five feet deep. In this case a thrifty housewife will make a hedge of wire-supported nasturtiums, which will bloom in soil where grass will starve. Then she will spade up her plot and sow it with crimson clover. In the Autumn, the clover can be dug in, and the soil will be in far better condition for planting grass or other kinds of seed next year.

This temporary hedge is excellent for sea-side planting,

WHAT A DIFFERENCE!

Flowers can make such a difference. Even if you haven't room for an elaborate garden, a few bulbs or some flowering shrubs will make an amazing change in your yard you'll be surprised how much bloom you can have in a small space. This month THE DELINEATOR offers you two garden "Patterns" especially planned to glorify the home with the very little yard. And with them come a Garden Calendar which tells you how to care for your flowers month by month. Just send twenty-five cents to the Department of Home Building, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

WHERE THERE IS MORE TIME FOR GARDENING THIS ATTRACTIVE PLAN MAY BE REALIZED for the nasturtiums are delightfully gay and Shirley poppies may be sown close to the wire. These sturdy flowers thrive joyously in places where roses lead a melancholy existence.

Wire makes a protection for any newly-planted hedge, it insures its safety and the safety of the garden. Wire, too, is unnoticed when the hedge is grown. When annuals are grown next to the wire, the effect is better if boards, three inches by one inch, are nailed flat across the tops of the posts and wire is stretched between these and a board at the lower edge.

In the plan given here, Japanese quince is suggested as a hedge. This, like nasturtiums, blooms nicely in poor soil and it will make the little dooryard fairly sing with

A grown-up Bungalow

Small cost and big appearance characterize this charming house

Come and make yourself at home, says this friendly little house to all you who are thinking of building. And we advise you to step inside; for you will find comfort in its rooms and efficiency in its arrangement. If you like this grown-up bungalow, we can send you a workable blueprint with practical suggestions for building it. Just mail a dollar to our Home-Building Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and the plan will be forwarded to you. And for a two-cent stamp we will send you a sheet which shows fourteen other DELINEATOR Houses that you can look over and choose from

Designed by
DONN BARBER
Fellow of the American Institute of Architects, and Architect of the New York Cotton Exchange

THE OUTSIDE OF THIS LITTLE HOME WITH ITS QUAINT CURVING DOORWAY, LITTLE DORMER WINDOWS AND BROAD PORCH IS NO LESS CHARMING THAN ITS COMPACT AND WELL-ARRANGED INTERIOR

A GROWN-UP bungalow is DELINEATOR House Plan Number Thirteen—a bungalow, because it has but a single story—grown-up, because it has the sophistication, the personality of a large house. Its wide, open porch, its windows, ordinary, casement and the little dormers peeping up in the roof, the quaint curve of its doorway, all combine to give it an air of friendliness and cordiality. It fairly smiles at the tired home-owner as he comes up the walk at the end of a busy day.

But the outside of this home is no less charming, no less satisfactory, than the inside, which has four large, comfortable rooms with closets and cupboards, plenty of storage space and a dining, alcove that is almost a room. And without altering the charm of the exterior or changing the compactness of the inside, this house can be stretched to larger proportions as easily as elastic!

Just supposing the family should increase or the problem of housing a servant should arise—the half-story which, as the plan stands, is meant for storage, could be finished and partitioned off into at least two comfortable bedrooms, and still leave space for another bath. In case it was desirable to make such a change, the breakfast alcove could be converted into at dining-room, and lo, the little home would be quite large enough for one or two more occupants.

Very often a small house suggests cramped unlivable rooms to the prospective home-builder. But if properly planned, a room can be snug without seeming so. It is the architect's duty to give a liberal amount of space in such good proportions that a suitable setting for the furniture will be provided in each room. Architects sometimes do not realize the size of beds, bureaus, dressing-tables, divans, tables and chairs, and the housewife has a difficult time fitting these articles into her home. Naturally, any house with rooms which are too small to accommodate a reasonable assortment of standard-sized furniture is a failure.

Besides the fact that the rooms of this bungalow are big enough to attractively hold ordinary furniture, and that they are planned so as to give the effect of even more space, a careful study of the accompanying plan will show that every iota of the little house is efficiently utilized. A minimum amount has been put into the back hall and into the snug little entry way at the front, notwithstanding which these two places give no sensation of crowding.

The living-room is especially large for so small a house Think of it, fifteen by twenty-five feet full of charm and downright comfort. Furniture can be arranged in this room most attractively. A couch or davenport, which is also useful for the unexpected guest, may be placed at right angles with the fireplace at the left; a long narrow table may go back of it, or small tables may be set at either end convenient for an attractively shaded lamp, a bowl of flowers or a book or two. This arrangement would permit a delightful view through the two glass doors which open onto the porch. Two or three deep, comfortable chairs, a desk and a low bookcase are all the furniture necessary to use in the development of such a room. As it receives light from three directions, it is always bright and cheerful and easy to ventilate.

In these days when building materials are standardized, a contractor can use such items as windows, doors, built-in cupboards, breakfast nooks, mantels, stairs and radiator disguises which can be ordered already made. These are very attractive and a house of this type can be built at much less expense than if these details had to be cut and made specially for it.

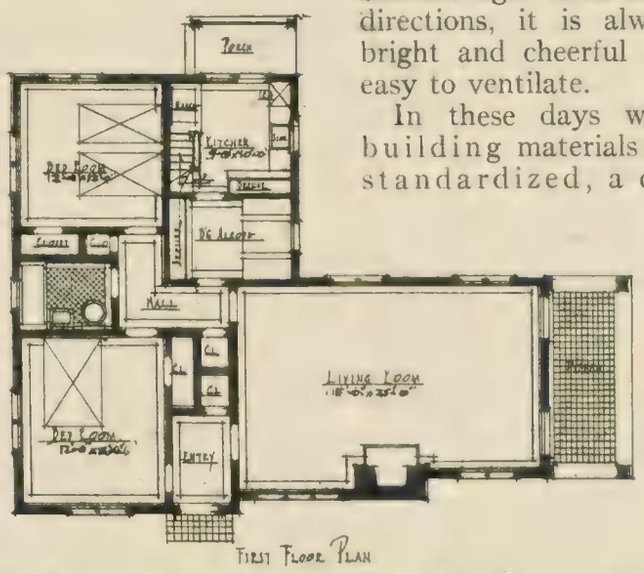
The heating and plumbing equipment, and their installation, should be carefully considered. These are two most important matters, and neither should be bought cheaply or installed by the amateur. It is evident that in order to give satisfaction a heating plant must have flexibility. Steam, hot water, vapor-vacuum and hot-air will meet this need if the equipment is standard and well made.

The American custom of opening windows at night cools off the sleeping-rooms and the home owner demands that when he turns on the heat in the morning the radiators will immediately respond. The steam system of heating has been found the quickest. If a house has an unusually cold exposure, it is wise to have the contractor's figures checked up by a heating engineer, for nothing is more important than installing an adequate heating system at the time of building.

Such suggestions as having a radiator beside the front door to counteract the cold air which rushes in when the door is open, a plate-warming radiator on legs in the kitchen or serving pantry to keep the plates warm, a low radiator with a seat over it in the bathroom for convenience and protection when bathing, come from specialists whose work it is to recommend special features and systems adequate in every detail to heat a house comfortably.

The architect has rendered this attractive bungalow in wood, believing the wide clapboards suggested are a more appropriate material for this type of architecture than either stucco or brick. Shingles laid about seven inches to the weather could also be used with a charming result. Shingles allowed to weather, with only the window and door frames painted, or the entire shingled siding painted in light buff or white, with soft green blinds, would provide the home-builder with attractive color schemes.

The roofing, if not of slate or asbestos should, in all probability, be of wood shingles. These dipped in a green preservative stain should match the soft green of the blinds, window-boxes or lattice—the last two suggestions being afterthoughts which may easily be added to suit the taste of the individual.



The open porch, which might be lined with window-boxes filled with riotous nasturtiums and shaded by gay-striped awnings, makes an inviting spot to serve tea on a warm afternoon. It would be an easy matter to convert this porch into a sun-room as Winter approached and one began to consider the cheer of a crackling wood fire. This sun-room could be of a more or less permanent construction Glass which is removable and replaced by screens in the Summer is most satisfactory.

This plan is adapted to any site provided the ground is either flat or only slightly sloping. A gently-sloping lot, however, will be found to insure the best drainage.

MERRY, MERCILESS MAY

By CELIA CAROLINE COLE

Drawing by Charles R. Chickering

THERE are women whom almost all men like and whom almost no women like. And very few of the men understand why a woman of this type doesn't appeal to the women, but very few of the women are in the least puzzled as to why she does appeal to the men. The reason is that she is charmingly friendly and delightful and understanding to one sex, and doesn't at all "play straight" with the other.

And that's the kind of a month May is. She comes floating radiantly in, looking like the friend of everybody. She calls out to the young, "I am youth, eternal youth. I am poets singing. I'm the sun rising. I'm joy, joy, joy! And you are mine!" And to those who have gone past youth, she calls in the same sweet, rill-like tone, "How haggard you are! How yellow your skin! How dull your eyes! Ho, really, my dear! Look at me!"

And you do. And while you don't stick your tongue out at her—you haven't done that to anybody for years—you do "size her up" for exactly what she is—an enchanting-looking baggage who shows you up and doesn't give a hang—ignorant and merciless and young!

And then if you are wise, you smile straight back into her face with all the knowledge and power of your 'round forty years tucked into your smile, and realize unheatedly that the only way to make a baggage like that behave to you, is to show her that you have a few magical little tricks up your sleeve that young things like her never even heard of! And you clap your new Spring bonnet on your head—not the flaunting, gay thing she enticed youth into buying, oh no, far subtler yours is, like a mauve, gray, blue windflower blowing on a hill—and slip on your tenderest frock, like the valley under a thin morning mist, all soft green and gray and lavender and blue it is—and twist your most run-away scarf, like a wispy, mocking, scarlet challenge about your throat, and off you go to the nearest first-aid saloon or shop and buy—if you never did before—a jar of one of those circulation, or bleach, or antimoth-spot ointments. They have many different names and makers, but only one purpose—to draw up the blood hard into your face and throat and to loosen up all the dead particles. Then when you have left it on perhaps ten minutes, perhaps twenty, the old yellow tinge is all extracted and you have a nice, new, May skin.

AND if you haven't any skin food (only we hope you have, if you're past thirty) you buy a tiny, little jar of it to spread on after you've taken the ointment off. And you purchase a new bottle of tonic because yours is nearly gone. And then you think how glad your rosy-posy face (yes, that's the color the ointment and the skin-food make it) is going to be when that ice-cold pad of cotton—which you have wrung out of ice-water or left on the ice until it's quite frigid—soaked with the cold tonic, begins to pat gently all over your pink surface. And you remind yourself, as you wait for the tonic to be wrapped up, that you mustn't give yourself the treatment just before you go out, for you must give your face at least two hours to be rid of all signs of the strong but gloriously transforming application. And, by the way, if your skin doesn't seem to clear in one treatment, give it another in three or four days.

There, now your skin is all clarified and ready for May. But if your throat still looks a bit dull and unluminous—it should always be whiter than your face, of course—you should put on the bleach that you have found is exactly right for you. Some of them bring out a little rash unless you are very careful: but we know one so mild and yet so lovely that almost any one can use it and sing a hymn of praise at the result.

THE THING TO DO!

"When I look in the mirror and see wrinkles and all my years making faces at me, I say, 'Well, the thing to do is to write C. C. C.'" That's what one of our readers wrote. And we wish that every other woman with a beauty problem would do likewise. C. C. C. wants to help you. She'll tell you how to beautify your hands, your hair, your face or your figure. Just write to her at THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N.Y., enclosing a stamped, self-addressed envelope for her reply. Remember, it's "the thing to do!"

AND now you catch sight of yourself in a mirror and your heart sinks. Your wispy scarf doesn't hide—no, it doesn't, that saggy look under your chin even when you draw yourself up. Hide! You don't want to hide. You want to retrieve! And so you pop into a car and hurry likkety-split to the home of that heaven-born, corrective rest-strap which was evolved by a trained nurse who understands every little bad and good habit a muscle can have. You hold it—all soft and pale pink satin—in your hand. You put it on, it's comfortable and restful and astonishingly becoming! And you remember what your friend who has used one nearly a year told you—that you don't have to wear it at night—in fact you shouldn't, for your muscles will get to depend on it instead of themselves, but for half an hour a day while you read or sew or lie and think, or just before you go to sleep so that the muscles are all in perfect place for the night.

It isn't fat that brings most double chins when one is around forty; it's bad carriage of the head. We let it hang forward and down, we let our shoulders droop a bit, and we let the muscles of our cheeks and those large muscles on the sides of our neck sag. But this beautiful strap, which can be adjusted minutely to one's face and throat by one's own self, will not conform to imperfections, but, like the law of good, will keep its own integrity of line and make you conform to it, it will lift those muscles back up where they were born to be and—triumphant stroke, this—make it impossible for you to droop your head and so pull everything out of line. And yet you you will find that you are as comfortable as if your head were on a pillow!

You go out of the shop with the dainty straps in a nice little box. And then you go around the corner and gather unto yourself a jar of that luscious, frothy, pinkie cream for bare throats and shoulders and arms. You will need it a little later in the Summer, even if you don't need it now to face the merciless stare of May. It not only gives your skin an opalescent, velvety look, but it keeps you from tanning and burning—even when you're in the sea, because it's water-proof!

Don't let May throw dust in your eyes! There is mild salt water or boric-acid water to bathe them in night and morning and to keep them clean and strong. And we've just been trying out a little bottle of precious fluid that seems to give the eye a sparkle that has nothing to do with age.

And there's a new lip-stick which is especially useful because it has firm cold-cream on one side and red on the other, so that one need no longer fear that the scarlet they take unto themselves in this fashion will dry out the sensitive skin of the lips and make it less thin and tender. A little whisk of the cream first and then the scarlet—it makes a lovely color, too.

And as you pass a certain shop, you slip in there, though this is the very last thing you are going to buy—except some lemons—because you simply can't resist getting a jar of that beautiful, soft, cleansing cream which comes in a dull gold case, very plain and very chic, and equally becoming to the glass shelf in your bathroom or the top of your dressing table.

And then the lemons, and home, in a little covered dish you must always keep half a lemon. Squeeze quite a lot of it into the water you drink the first thing in the morning; and squeeze a bit on your hands each time you wash them to whiten and soften them. Then when you have time, put a bit on your neck to add to its whiteness. And during the day add just a bit of the juice to your glass of water when you take a drink. No self-respecting woman in May should be without a lemon.

And though she always eats only two-thirds of what she wants at any meal, in May she eats only a half. She looks at the platter when it is passed to her and measures with her mind's eye just how much of the chicken she'd like to take, and then she takes only half of that measure. And she does that with all the other foods as they are offered to her. But it's worth it! Slim hardness, a clear skin, shining eyes, and that feeling of wings!

There is more than a metaphysical meaning in the saying "Whatever you're building up on the inside will surround you on the outside."

MERRY, merciless May swinging radiantly along with her floating chiffons and her little feather-boa clouds and her blue-and-gold days, so shining and high and eternally young and fair—teach her to behave to you. She's a nice person when you have the upper hand.

And her youth, pooh! "Youth," says a wise, every-day man we know, "is not a time of life, but a state of mind. It is not a matter of ripe cheeks, red lips and supple bodies. It is a temper of the will, a quality of the imagination, a vigor of the emotions. Youth means a predominance of courage over timidity, of the appetite for adventure over the love of ease. Nobody grows old by merely living a number of years. People grow old by deserting their ideals. You are as young as your faith, as old as your doubts; as young as your self-confidence, as old as your fear; as young as your hope, as old as your despair."

Joy is in the heart of everybody—that's the only home it has. Lift up your heart and let it out!

For the Spanish or Russian type long hair combed straight back from the face and dressed low and close to the head is very beautiful. Only a woman with dark hair and a beautifully modeled face can attempt such a coiffure. (Nita Naldi, photograph by Nickolas Muray)

Only the very young girl wears the outstanding bob. (Greta Nissen, photograph by Nickolas Muray)

The immemorial symbol of growing up is to put up your hair. So the débutante is letting her hair grow to her shoulders, waving it softly and dressing it in a tiny roll at the nape of the neck. (Lillian Gish, photograph by Kenneth Alexander)

The shingle, except with the débutante, keeps its vogue. The hair is cut close to the head in back to a point on the nape of the neck. At the sides it covers the ears. It may be parted at the side or center and worn in soft flat waves or straight. (Marilyn Miller, photograph by Nickolas Muray)

THE NEW IN NEW YORK

By Evelyn Dodge

THE Spring silhouettes are: The windy-day silhouette with all the fulness blown to the front in the circular cut of skirts and flounces; the straight, narrow sheath; draperies that fall in cascades or handkerchief points, or are lifted at the hip; a straight but soft and easy silhouette used for certain silks and cottons; the molded bodice and bouffant skirt worn principally by young girls.

THE May-pole figure—slim, flat, straight and curveless—is the vogue. The modern Portia who can devise a way of disposing of the pound of flesh wholesale will reap a fortune. Diet, girth control, rubber corsets and calories are employed to take off the excess weight put on by the car, the bridge-table and the desk.

WOMEN are going back to corsets to keep themselves flat and to prevent the dreaded middle-age spread. Corsets are large in the waist, low in the bust and light in the matter of bones. If you are reasonably slender you wear a corselet which supports the bust, controls the hip and gives straight, unbroken lines. If you're a little heavier you wear a part-elastic, part-fabric corset of light material, lightly boned. If you're really heavy, diet and wear a firm corset until your figure returns to fashionable proportions.

SKIRTS are decidedly shorter. They begin at ten inches from the floor and go up. Paris advocates the sixteen-inches-off-the-floor length. New York is more conservative and seems to feel that twelve or fourteen is going far enough. The short skirt looks young, trim, boyish, and is very popular.

THE Spring ensemble lightens itself for warmer weather. Coats of cashmere and cashmere twills are worn unlined over thin frocks of printed silks. In some cases the coat is sleeveless. In others it is replaced by a short cape.

THE two-piece jumper frock or blouse ensemble is the most important mode of the moment. It has a shirt-like top or blouse and a straight skirt with a kick plait at the front or at the front and back, or with a cluster of knife plaits at the side closing. It is the newest type of the sport frock that is used for general wear and is excessively smart.

THE fashionable materials of the late Spring have taken violently to prints, borders, half-and-half effects, crosswise designs and stripes. Roman stripes with orange, lemon yellow and Pompeian red mingled gaily with blue, green, natural color and beige in flannel and in the smart tub silks, such as crêpe de Chine, radium and silk broadcloth, will have a tremendous vogue this Summer. Printed Georgettes and chiffons are quite the rage for evening frocks with points, cascade draperies, jabot effects, etc. For the street, natural-colored kasha and beige are very chic.

JABOTS are one of the successes of the season. There are little jabots below V necks, longer jabots that trickle to the waistline, and frock-length jabots that cascade from shoulder to hem. They are charming and show a softer side of fashion that gives just the right relief from more masculine styles.

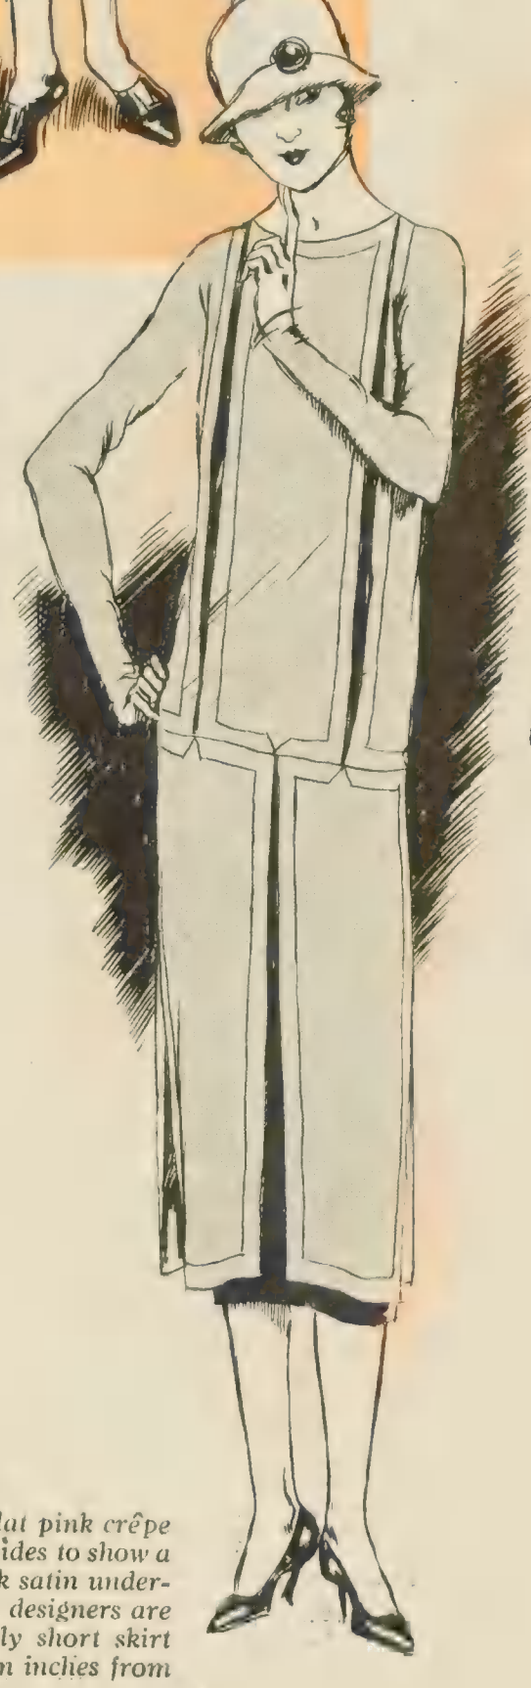
NECKS, after years of freedom, are bending themselves to yokes and collars. Tie collars flutter with loose ends or tie snugly under the left ear. Small standing bands are used for peasant blouses and Chinese tunics. The shirt-like collar belongs with the new jumper. The sports-shirt collar is worn with a four-in-hand. Flat collars and the small collar that frames the neck in back and opens in a V in front are used for all types of day frocks, while the bateau neck is being reserved more and more exclusively for afternoon.

SLEEVES in general will be long for Spring and short for Summer. The long sleeve is smart for Spring in the so-called tailored tub-silk frock and in the new blouse ensemble. The soft sleeve with fulness at the wrist is extremely pretty in Georgettes and voiles and other light materials. The sleeve running into the neck, forming a tiny yoke or epaulet, is used in many of the new French models.

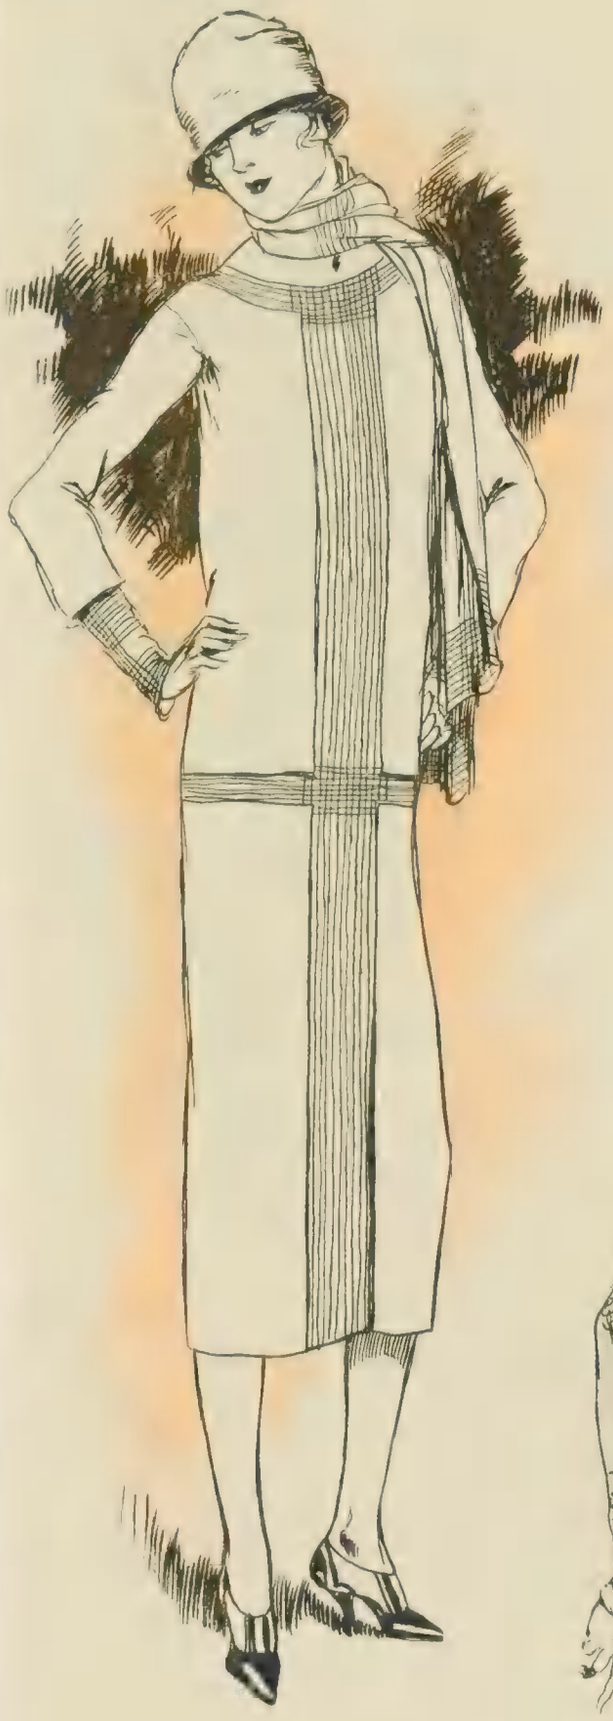
PEASANT styles are being used in three forms. There is the short peasant blouse or guimpe gaily smocked at the neck which is worn with the popular suspender skirt. There is the longer peasant blouse of the tunic type made with a raglan sleeve and trimmed with peasant embroideries. Lastly there is the peasant frock which is both smocked and embroidered, the smocking at the neck, wrist and waistline, the embroidery forming a bosom in front. All the types are made of soft materials such as crêpe de Chine, Georgette, cotton voiles, and the smocking is usually done in bright, light colors—red, yellow, jade green, purple, royal blue, etc.

SOULIÉ'S ORIGINAL DESIGNS SENT ESTABLISHMENT KEEP WITHIN THE VOGUE OF THE ENSEMBLE, THE NECK AND THE USE OF

Soulié uses the full-length coat and the tunic blouse for a Summer ensemble of white wool and white satin with leopard spots of green



Soulié in common with other French designers believes that any length is the right length for a smart ensemble coat. Soulié's coat of green and beige wool is in a seven-eighths length that shows a bit of the beige crêpe frock beneath

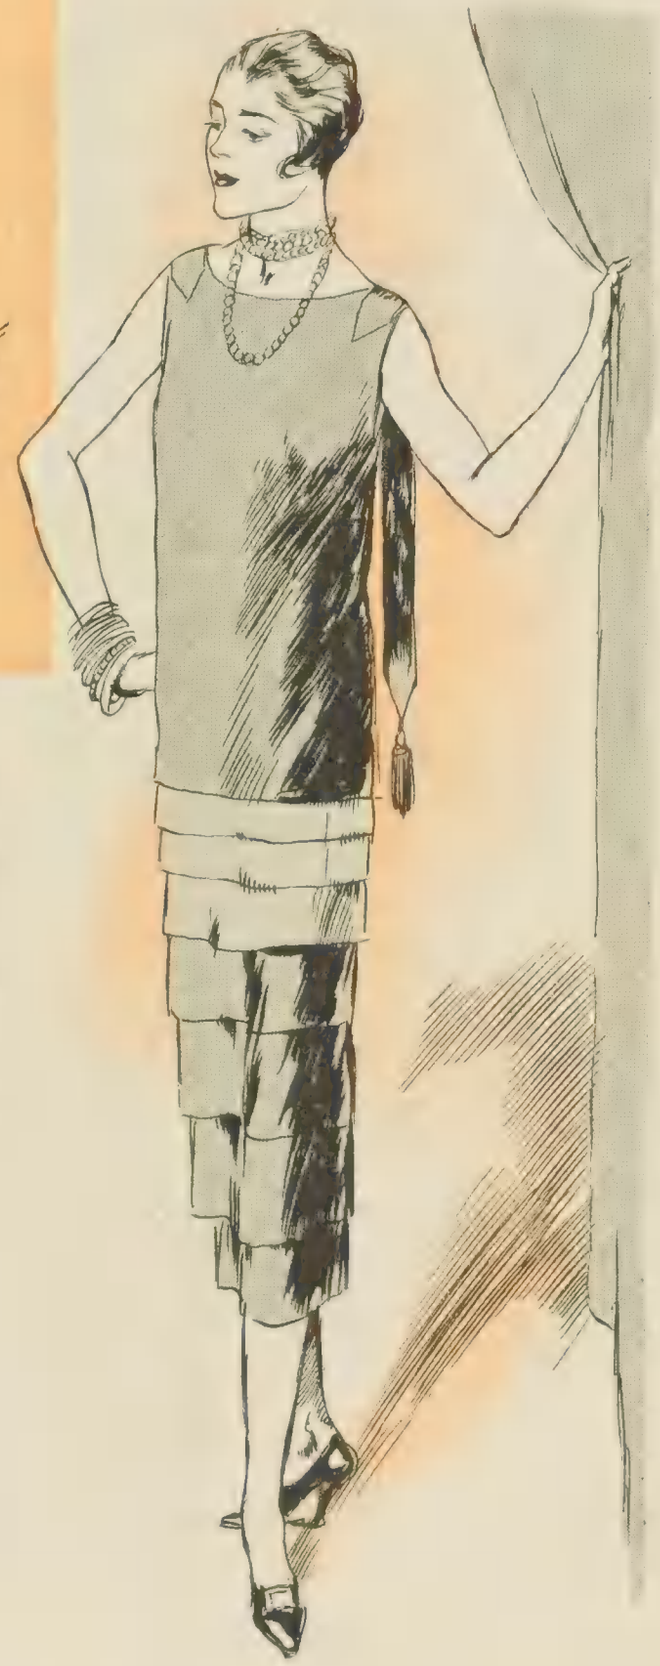


The tailored suit that the well-dressed Parisienne always includes in her wardrobe is made this year with a straight box-coat and a skirt with the kick plait. Soulié's collar and pockets are interesting in a suit of brown-red-and-blue plaid with a red rep coat

A silhouette that will be much in evidence this Summer keeps decidedly straight but eases the narrow lines for the thin silks. Soulié designs a frock for white surah spotted in blue and trimmed with frills of white organdy

A Soulié frock of flat pink crêpe splits its front and sides to show a narrow slip of black satin underneath. The French designers are using the excessively short skirt which is often sixteen inches from the floor

FROM THE DELINEATOR'S PARIS STRAIGHT LINES AND REITERATE SHORTER SKIRT AND THE HIGHER PLAIDS AND PRINTS



Rows of stitching in bright scarlet have the effect of fine tucks on a straight frock of white alpaca. Soulié has a great affection for the long close sleeve, but many of the French houses are using fulness at the wrist

Soulié expresses an interest in the long-neglected back, and places a plaited section below the hip in an ensemble costume of gray rep. The small standing collar is new and smart and frequently has long, narrow tie ends in front

Soulié turns up the hem of a blue-crêpe frock and faces it with a deep cuff of white satin repeating the arrangement of the sleeves. There is a decided drift toward collars, high necks and tie ends of this type

The plain bodice and the lower part trimmed in front with tiers, panels, flounces, etc., is used for afternoon and evening gowns. Soulié makes a frock of black satin with tiers of satin and fuchsia crêpe

Soulié uses a charming printed crêpe with stiff little pink bouquets on a green ground for a frock crossed and draped in front. Prints, borders, half-and-half materials, and crosswise designs are the rage this Spring

THE French dressmaking houses are presenting three silhouettes for the Spring fashions—the straight narrow line of the sheath, unbroken or ending in a flare somewhere about the knee, the circular movement in skirts and flounces, and soft fluttering draperies for evening and afternoon. Because your light woolen frocks are straight, however, does not mean that you are shackled by fashion. Many of the new frocks have an inverted "kick" plait at the center front or the inserted plaits at either side of the front. These plaits give more ease in walking but preserve the smart straight-line silhouette. "Natural" kashas, cashmeres or camel's-hair twills and flannel are fashionable woolens for Spring. Silk broadcloth, radium and heavy crêpe de Chine make satisfying frocks for general wear. Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, heavy crêpe de Chine, flat crêpe and crêpe satin fall very gracefully into the new two-piece circular skirts, while for the draperies of evening either the printed chiffons, chiffon voiles and Georgettes or plain silk crêpes and crêpes de Chine are very lovely.

The dress is smart for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

13 years requires 2⅞ yards 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 16 years.

6027—Some schools permit the graduating class to wear a pastel shade in the material or in a ribbon girdle and flower such as are used to trim a frock of Georgette, chiffon, net or cotton Georgette. It slips on over the head and the full straight skirt is joined to the basque at a slightly low waistline. The frills may be self material or lace. With taffeta, organdy or crêpe de Chine they should be self material.

12 years requires 2¼ yards 39-inch Georgette (including frills).

The dress is attractive for juniors and girls 8 to 16 years.

5989—The sleeveless frock with the tiny yoke is adorable for parties and Summer use. It slips on over the head and has a straight lower edge. You may use crêpe de Chine, Georgette, organdy, cotton voile, cotton Georgette or batiste with Val. lace. With frills of self material use taffeta, crêpe de Chine, Georgette, cotton Georgette or organdy.

8 years requires 1⅜ yard 35-inch Georgette.

The dress is for little girls 4 to 10 years.

5960—This slip-over frock of plain Georgette, chiffon or chiffon voile has a basque closing under the left arm, a full straight skirt over a narrow drop skirt and camisole of flesh-colored satin. A lower neck and cut-down armholes may be used for evening. Lower edge of skirt 3 yards; of drop skirt 46 inches.

17 years requires 3½ yards 36 or 39 inch Georgette.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women; and for ladies 38, 40 bust.

6034—10978—Slip-over frocks with full straight skirts are picturesque for graduation. This dress closes under the left arm. Use plain cotton Georgette, radium, crêpe de Chine or Georgette with same material in contrast. A flower motif decorates the skirt. Lower edge 2 yards.

16 years requires 3¾ yards 27-inch dotted swiss.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years and ladies 38 bust.

6044—Seventeen may graduate in this soft one-piece frock of plain cotton voile or fine cotton crêpe with lace or organdy frills and a cluster of tucks at each side in front and back. It has a straight lower edge and slips on over the head. You may use plain crêpe de Chine, batiste, etc. Lower edge 51 inches.

17 years requires 2¾ yards 35 or 39 inch cotton voile.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also small women.

6029—10825—The tucks, the frilly trimming and the dainty flower embroidery of this one-piece slip-over frock will please the junior who wants to finish with as much éclat as her sister. It has a straight lower edge. Use Georgette, chiffon or net with satin ribbon, lace or self frills, cotton Georgette with self material or lace, cotton voile with lace, etc.

13 years requires 2⅛ yards 39-inch cotton voile.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 16 years.

5995—Smaller girls graduate from bloomer dresses into this type of frock before adopting older modes. It has a straight lower edge, is plaited at the front and back and may omit the straight bertha. Use plain crêpe de Chine or Georgette with Georgette flowers in contrast, etc.

6008—The buttoned center-front closing and the new epaulet shoulder make a chic little one-piece coat dress with the close-fitting hipline. Plain heavy silk crêpe with satin in self or contrasting color, or plain heavy satin with silk crêpe trimings make an attractive frock. You may use plain flannel all one material or with flannel in contrast, kasha, soft twills, or camel's-hair twills with faille silk in self or contrasting color, wool crêpe, etc.

16 years or 33 bust requires 1¾ yard 54-inch kasha. Lower edge 40½ inches.

The coat dress is good style for misses 16 to 18 years or 33 to 35 bust, also ladies.

6002—10312—Soft gathers at the yoke and the tie-collar make a one-piece sports frock for the striped radiums, flannels, silk broadcloth, heavy crêpes de Chine, etc. It slips over the head and the lower edge is straight. The embroidery is easily worked. Use plain radium, silk broadcloth, heavy crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe or pongee with self material in contrasting color or with printed silk, satin with contrasting satin, plain light-weight flannel or wool jersey with contrasting crêpe de Chine, etc.

16 years or 33 bust requires 1⅞ yard 54-inch wool jersey. Lower edge 42 inches.

The dress is becoming to misses 16 to 18 years or 33 to 35 bust, also ladies.

6039—What smarter outfit for the last days of school than this three-piece suspender skirt with the new inverted "kick" plait at the center front worn with a separate blouse in peasant style! Use plain cotton voile, crêpe de Chine or soft pongee with or without the smocking, etc., for the blouse. Make the skirt of twills, serge, flannel or wool crêpe with bindings of silk braid.

12 years requires 1¼ yard 54-inch flannel, 1½ yard 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The outfit is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6015—5212—A girl's frock gathered softly at the neck and made of heavy crêpe de Chine or silk crêpe printed in small designs, with shaped band of faille silk, broadcloth, or camel's-hair twills, etc., matching a coat makes an ensemble costume. This slip-over dress has a straight lower edge. Her hat is smart.

8 years requires 1⅝ yard 35-inch printed, ⅜ yard 32 or more inch plain silk for dress.

The dress is smart for girls 4 to 10 years; hat for girls 2 to 12 years.

5990—5966—The new striped heavy crêpes de Chine, silk or cotton broadcloths, heavy cotton crêpes or flannels may be used with plain to match for a one-piece slip-over dress with a new sleeve and a straight lower edge. Or use plain heavy silk crêpe, crêpe de Chine, silk broadcloth, crêpe satin, plain light-weight flannel or wool jersey, plain cotton broadcloth, linen, linen-finished cottons, cotton poplin or plain heavy cotton crêpe, etc. Make the French hat of corded silks or satin.

17 years or 34 bust requires 3¼ yards 32-inch striped tub silk. Lower edge 43½ inches.

The dress is for misses 16 to 18 or 33 to 35 bust, also ladies; hat for ladies, misses, girls.

6000—Paris contributes the plain chiffon or Georgette jabot to a one-piece slip-over frock of crosswise designs, novelty crêpe satin, novelty faille-and-satin, or printed heavy crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, satin, radium or faille. It has a straight lower edge and may be of plain heavy crêpe de Chine or silk crêpe or of crêpe satin, all of one material and with embroidery. Printed crêpe de Chine or silk crêpe with plain chiffon or Georgette to match, or novelty cottons of good weight with jabot and bindings of plain cotton voile or Georgette are suitable.

16 years or 33 bust requires 2¾ yards 40-inch printed crosswise silk. Lower edge 41 inches.

My best strawberry and rhubarb recipes

TO most of us Spring means the beginning of new things. New things to do, new places to visit, new things to wear, fresh fruits to eat.

To me Spring always means new recipes to make with new fruits, first strawberries and rhubarb. I am giving you here four tested recipes for Spring desserts all made with a shortening which is just as sweet and fresh and wholesome as a shortening could possibly be.

This vegetable shortening (Crisco) makes the most dainty delicious things; desserts which melt in your mouth; pastry which is tender and flaky; cakes with the finest texture, light and tender which really cannot be told from those made with butter. And for frying it is ideal, for we can fry in the deep kettle or frying pan with no smoke, waste or unpleasant odor, and never the slightest suggestion of grease in looks or taste.

I find Crisco economical, too. It does not soak into the food when frying, so very little is used up and I can strain it back into the can and use it over for anything I like. It doesn't have to be kept on ice, either, and is always ready to use. You will find that Crisco is the only shortening you need in the house.

I have made all these recipes with Crisco and have had fine results. I wish you would save them and try them with Crisco, too.

W. S. C.

Strawberry Snowballs

A dainty, delicious dessert; quickly made and cooked. Crisco makes them tender and light. Just a fluffy, dainty morsel which melts in your mouth.

¼ cup Crisco
½ cup sugar
¼ cup milk
1 cup pastry flour
1½ teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
Whites of 2 eggs beaten stiff

Cream Crisco and sugar. Sift flour, salt and baking powder together. Add alternately with the milk. Last fold in the egg whites. Divide the batter into 6 or 8 small Criscoed cups and steam 20 minutes in a covered steamer over a kettle of hot water. Turn out and serve with the following sauce:

SAUCE

1 cup sugar 2 tablespoons flour ½ teaspoon salt

Mix thoroughly together. Add 1 tablespoon Crisco, 1½ cups boiling water. Stir all together and bring to a boil over the fire. Just before serving add 1 quart of strawberries cut in half.

Rhubarb Short Cake

This Rhubarb Short Cake is delicious. Even those who do not care for rhubarb like it when served this way. Substitute strawberries, if you prefer, using the same short cake recipe. It is an easy way to make it. No messy rolling. Crisco makes a short cake which is short, tender and light.

½ cup Crisco
3 cups pastry flour
3 teaspoons baking powder
½ teaspoon salt
1 egg, well beaten
1 cup milk

Sift flour, baking powder, salt four times. Cut Crisco in with two knives. Add milk. Last add egg. Spread evenly in well-Criscoed layer cake pan. For individual short cakes drop by spoonfuls the size desired on well-Criscoed baking sheet. Bake about 20 minutes in hot oven, 475 degrees F. Will serve 8 people.

Prepare Rhubarb as follows:

Wash, peel and cut into inch pieces. Cover with boiling water, cook slowly until tender. Drain off water and for every two cups of rhubarb add one cup of sugar and flavor with ground cinnamon to taste. Split the short cakes, spread with butter, put rhubarb between and on top and serve with whipped cream with a little cinnamon dusted over the top.

Rhubarb Puffs

A delicious Spring dessert for those who love rhubarb. Use huckleberries this way or green apples and serve with the same cinnamon sauce.

Use the recipe given at the left for Strawberry Snowballs to make the batter.

3 cups rhubarb cut fine
½ cup sugar
½ teaspoon ground cinnamon

Mix the sugar and cinnamon together. Then mix with the rhubarb. Divide in 8 cups; cover with the batter; set the cups in a covered steamer and steam over a kettle of hot water for 20 minutes. You can bake both these puffs and the strawberry snowballs in hot oven, 375 degrees F., about 20 minutes. But they are lighter and daintier when steamed. Serve hot with the following sauce:

SAUCE:

1 cup sugar
2 tablespoons flour
½ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon cinnamon

Mix together thoroughly. Add 1 tablespoon Crisco, 1½ cups boiling water. Stir all together and bring to a boil over the fire.

Strawberry Tartlets

Crisco makes ideal pastry for tartlets—crisp, tender and flaky, and most attractive to look at. Wholesome, too.

PASTRY

1½ cups Pastry flour
½ cup Crisco
1 teaspoon salt
Cold water to mix

Sift flour and salt. Cut Crisco in with two knives. Add water to hold. Roll; cover the bottom of inverted muffin pans greased with Crisco. Prick with fork to prevent bubbles. Bake in hot oven, 450 degrees F. about 15 minutes. Slip off, turn pans over, and put the tart shells inside.

FILLING:

1 quart strawberries
1 cup sugar
1 tablespoon granulated gelatine
¼ cup water
1 tablespoon lemon juice
Whipped Cream

Wash and drain berries. Take one half, cut in half, mix with ⅓ cup powdered sugar. Let stand a few minutes; then drain off juice. To the remainder of the berries add sugar and lemon juice. Mash all together; then add the gelatine which has been mixed with the cold water and melted over boiling water. Mix all together thoroughly. When mixture has started to set, fill the tart shells; then put on the top of each tart a few of the berries which have been cut in half. Set on ice to harden. When cool, make a border of whipped cream around the edge of each tart and serve. Makes about 12 tarts.

TO MAKE A DELICIOUS OLD-FASHIONED SHORT CAKE WITHOUT A ROLLING PIN

Use the short-cake recipe given under the picture of rhubarb short cake. Lay out on your work table and measure accurately all the ingredients the recipe calls for. Get out all utensils needed.

2.

Cut the Crisco into the flour with two knives instead of rubbing it in with the fingers. We do not touch the short cake with the hands until it is ready to serve.

3.

The method saves time in two ways. No rolling is necessary as we simply spread the batter into the shallow pan or drop it by spoonfuls for the individuals. No messy table, hands and rolling pin to clean up afterward. No flour wasted.

4.

Now that you have learned this easier, quicker way to make a short cake, use it with rhubarb, strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, pineapple, peaches, apples, bananas and oranges.

Delicious cakes, pies and fried foods

I use Crisco for everything that requires a fat. It makes my pastry crisp, tender and flaky, my cakes light and dainty and in both deep and pan frying it puts a crisp brown crust on foods. It fries without smoke, too.

Embroidery design 10342

10338 — While you are making plans for your Summer, be sure to remember to map out a program for vacation needlework. This centerpiece and scarf make delightful work to pick up whenever you have opportunity. They can be worked in a combination of delightful colors and stitches—in one-stitch, outline, lazy-daisy and French-knot embroidery. This design can be adapted to one 36-inch centerpiece and motifs for the ends of two scarfs.

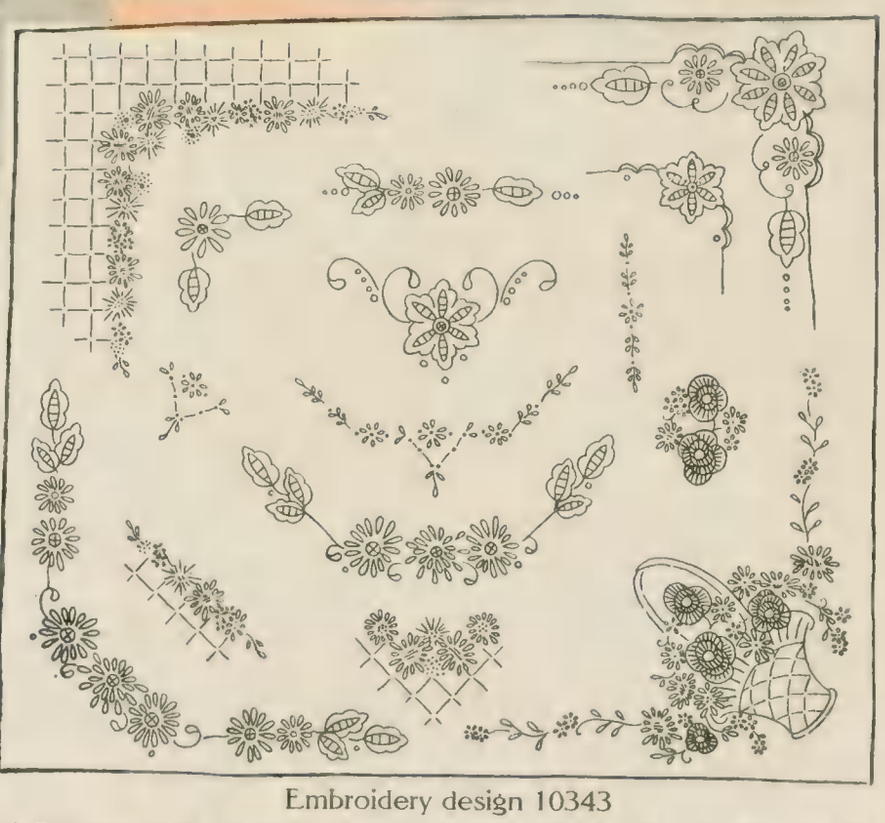
Butterick Patterns with the Deltor Picture Instructions for Cutting, Putting Together and Finishing may be purchased at leading stores throughout the world, at prices given on page 96.

CROSS-STITCH AND ONE-STITCH ALLY FORMING ONE DESIGN TO TRIM TWO GARMENTS

Embroidery design 10339



10339—There are a great many times when you want just such a dainty embroidery which will give all the finished effect of great labor, but actually is very simple to do. The banding and motifs of this design are worked in unpadded satin-stitch, French stemming and French knots. If you want your work to go even faster, you may use lazy-daisy stitch, outline stitch and French knots. These dainty motifs and bandings are just the thing for baby clothes. Little children's frocks, caps, petticoats, etc., may also be trimmed with this design. It is suitable for your own fine underwear and sachets, etc. The design can be adapted to 1⅝ yard each of banding 1¾ and ¾ inch wide and 77 assorted motifs.

10341—You get several trimming combinations in this embroidery, for after you have finished trimming your peasant blouse with the cross-stitch bandings and motifs, you can use the one-stitch banding in bright wools down the front of your wool jersey sports frock. What is more, no one will know that the trimming on each garment is part of the same design! The cross-stitch banding and motifs can be worked in attractive color combinations. The one-stitch banding may combine different bright colors in wools, and since it serves this double use it is the really useful design. It can be adapted to 1⅝ yard each of bandings 4½ inches wide, 2½ inches wide, 1⅝ inch wide and 1¾ inch wide and 32 assorted motifs.

10340—Some of the smartest dresses and tunic blouses are trimmed with a beading design of this type. The large floral pattern is always effective. It is also a suitable trimming for other blouses, skirts, etc. This design can be adapted to 1¾ yard of banding 20¼ inches wide and 9 motifs in 2 assorted styles.

10343—Give your linens a breath of Spring with this flower embroidery. It is suitable for scarfs, tea-cloths, napkins and other household linens. Both motifs and corners should be worked in French stemming, cut-work, satin-stitch, eyelets, French knots, lazy-daisy, one-stitch and outline. It can be adapted to 16 corners, of which 4 are 6½ by 13½ inches, 4 of 4 by 10 inches, 4 of 2 by 10¼ inches and 4 of 1½ by 13½ inches and 60 assorted motifs.

"In FEBRUARY OF THIS YEAR (1924) my third baby was born. Three months later found me with constipation, headaches and just dragging around—and three small children. I decided something had to be done. I started taking Fleischmann's Yeast, a cake morning and night. In a few weeks I was able to stop the use of cathartics; headaches and backaches were gone; and I had plenty of energy. I felt like a different woman." MRS. MARIE T. GARDNER, Glencarlyn, Va.

"AFTER THREE YEARS of strenuous work training, I found myself a graduate nurse struggling to keep up, with lowered resistance, nervousness, indigestion and loss of appetite due to chronic constipation. My physician advised me to take Fleischmann's Yeast three or four times daily. At once I began to feel better. Today I can cheerfully and bravely face my patients. Long hours, responsibilities, I no longer fear, thanks to Fleischmann's Yeast."
MISS KONSTANCE WELLCOME, St. Paul, Minn.

You Know Such People—

Full of a new zest and joy in living. Read their remarkable tributes to this simple fresh food

"AS A HUMANITARIAN, and as a physician for twenty-two years, I unhesitatingly recommend that persons suffering from deficient digestion give Fleischmann's Yeast a test for a few weeks. I suffered from a bad stomach for nearly twenty years. Abandoned hope of receiving permanent relief. The unsophisticated would remark, 'Strange the doctor cannot cure his own stomach.'

"Since taking Fleischmann's Yeast cakes, which I began last June, I sleep one and a half hours more and can eat 'a man's dinner' without distress. I am happy now and those around me appreciate it." DR. WILLIAM NEALON, Philadelphia, Pa.

A FAMOUS FOOD for health—start eating it today

"AS A TRAVELING salesman I found myself suffering from chronic constipation and general stomach disorders induced by irregular meals. My head ached continuously. I lacked 'pep.' My record fell off alarmingly. . . . I tried Fleischmann's Yeast. In a few weeks my tendency to be constipated had practically disappeared and with it my headaches. I have broken all my previous sales records. I feel that Fleischmann's Yeast has materially helped me up the ladder toward success."
FRED CORRINGTON, Litchfield, Ill.

"I WAS A PALE, thin, sickly child. At twelve I developed acne of the face, which became chronic in spite of medical care and good hygiene. Serums, ointments, washes, drugs, diets, lotions, made me wretched without improving the unsightly condition.

"Then I consulted our family doctor, who strongly advised trying one cake of Fleischmann's Yeast before meals (three times a day). I took it regularly for six months. . . . My face cleared, I lost that thin, pale look, and was able to continue with my work at college." MISS ROSE COOPERMAN, Brooklyn, N. Y.

NOT a "cure-all," not a medicine in any sense—Fleischmann's Yeast is simply a remarkable fresh food. The millions of tiny active yeast plants in every cake invigorate the whole system. They aid digestion—clear the skin—banish the poisons of constipation. Where cathartics give only temporary relief, yeast strengthens the intestinal muscles and makes them healthy and active. And day by day it releases new stores of energy.

Eat two or three cakes a day before meals: on crackers—in fruit juices or milk—or just plain. For constipation especially, dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) night and morning. Buy several cakes at a time—they will keep fresh in a cool dry place for two or three days. All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Start eating it today! And let us send you a free copy of our latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. C-16, The Fleischmann Co., 701 Washington St., New York.

Grouchy Husbands

EVERYTHING a moment before had been peaceful—and even comparatively quiet. Perhaps the youngster did make a slight disturbance at play, but it was unintentional—not anything over which a normal father should hit the ceiling. Perhaps some remark was made, innocently enough—but from the eruption which followed it might have been criminal!

What is the cause of outbursts like that? Unreasoning fits of temper on the part of men who ordinarily are kindly husbands and fathers!

The chances are that the man isn't well. Nerves! He would be the first to deny it, of course.

Why men fly off the handle

"Never felt better in my life!" he sputters. But he doesn't. His very vehemence is indication of the trouble which is secretly worrying millions of men in America. They are wearing out prematurely. They are not "sick," no; but certainly they are not well.

And nine times out of ten the reasons are these: they neglect exercise, they don't get enough sleep; they shun fresh air; they eat too much, and eat the wrong things. And worst of all, they unthinkingly load their systems with artificial stimulants which contribute nothing to their well-being, but which rob the body of its reserve strength.

Perhaps the most widespread offender among these artificial stimulants is caffein. It has no food value. It seems to give new energy, but this is a delusion. Actually it whips and goads the tired nerves to action when what they really need is rest.

In 2,000,000 homes, people are eliminating one form of abuse by making Postum their regular mealtime drink. It is all wheat, skillfully blended and roasted. Instead of caffein, an artificial stimulant, it gives only the healthful elements of whole wheat and bran. It is delicious!—rich, full bodied, with the appetizing flavor of roasted wheat.

Here is a drink which every member of the family can enjoy together, with no fear of sleeplessness, ragged nerves, headache, indigestion—with no sign of a grouch! Made with hot milk instead of the usual boiling water, it is the ideal drink for children, too.

You—the wife, the mother—are in a wonderful position to improve the health of your family. Postum is one easy step! Get it at your grocer's—or accept the offer of Carrie Blanchard, famous food demonstrator!

FOR YOUR "COMPANY" MENU

By E. L. Boyd

Recipes have been tested and approved by the School of Home Economics, Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

Did you ever eat Spring chicken baked with green peppers? Or chicken creole, savory with celery, onion and carrot? Or chicken sauté served with asparagus on toast? Each one of these dishes is a treat and so are the other enticing chicken recipes which our Home-Making Department has collected. It will gladly tell you how to make them if you will write to it care of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a stamped, self-addressed envelope

SQUAB farms are cropping up all over the country—the roof of city skyscrapers as well as pigeon-cotes in barns are being utilized to raise them. As the supply increases these delicacies become less prohibitive in price and as they are quickly cooked, as they are tender and have a delicious flavor, it is not surprising to have them usurp, to a great extent, the place of the chicken or duck in the "company" menu.

The amateur cook as well as the experienced hostess can depend on them to furnish a course to be proud of. Squabs are equally delicious and appropriate for two—the young bride will have no difficulty in preparing them—or for twenty, served hot or cold at a formal luncheon or dinner.

For the home dinner, three-quarter or pound squabs are the best, particularly if they are to be the main dish, but for formal luncheons or dinners, where there are several courses, the half-pound squab is sufficiently large.

Broilers may be used in any of the recipes given if squabs are not available.

ROAST SQUABS

Clean and cut off the feet and heads of two fat squabs. Dry them well and stuff them with a forcemeat made of two cups of fresh breadcrums which have been soaked in cold milk for a few minutes. Squeeze out the milk and to the bread add one tablespoon of cold chopped meat, one-half teaspoon of chopped parsley, a saltspoon of thyme, salt and pepper to taste. Brown one tablespoon of finely minced onion in a tablespoon of butter and add this to the forcemeat. Mix well and add the yolk of one egg as a binder. Fill the squabs with this mixture, closing the opening and trussing the little legs and wings with toothpicks or with small metal pins or skewers.

Put them in a small baking-dish and roast them (at 400 degrees Fahrenheit) until they are well browned and look glazed.

Serve them with squares of currant jelly, pouring a little of the rich pan gravy over the squab.

SQUABS PEASANT STYLE

Prepare the squabs as for roasting. When they are dry, rub with butter both inside and out. Place them unstuffed in a deep casserole and bake them in a very hot oven (400 degrees Fahrenheit) until they are brown, basting only with a little melted butter and water.

Drain and heat a can of small French or wrinkled peas with enough salt, pepper and butter to season them.

Cook about twelve small white onions and season them.

Place the squabs in a glass serving-dish, arrange the peas and onions around them and pour a little melted butter and minced parsley over them. Cover them and set them in the oven for half an hour. Serve them in the same dish.

Concluded on page 47

Squabs should be split and flattened for broiling

And then dipped in oil or melted butter, well seasoned with pepper and salt, placed over a hot fire and cooked seven minutes on each side

Squabs or broilers with mushrooms or a savory sauce make a tasty, easy-to-prepare dish that any hostess may be proud to serve for a company meal

Raisin quick breads you will love to make

By Sarah Field Splint

If most women take the responsibilities of homemaking with a smile, it's not because they don't encounter difficulties. Who of us, for instance, hasn't suffered from having her mind go on a strike one fine day when she put the polite question to it, "What shall I give them to eat today?"

For by the time we have considered the individual tastes of each member of our family, the necessities of a well-balanced menu, the size of our pocketbook and the amount of our own time and strength available, our choice is whittled down to uninspiring proportions.

It is then that the thought of raisins comes to me like a life preserver and I strike right out from my sea of gloom for the cheering refuge of my pantry.

Raisins dress up familiar foods. And, very considerately, they don't demand that you learn a new recipe in order to use them. Just add them to your old "stand-bys."

Even a favorite biscuit recipe becomes better if made with raisins. Add them after the shortening is cut in and just before you combine the dry ingredients with the liquid. Cut out the biscuits with a tiny round cutter, serving them hot and buttered.

Quick Raisin Bread

1½ cups flour
1½ cups whole wheat flour
1 teaspoon salt
4 teaspoons baking powder
¼ cup sugar
1 egg
1½ cups milk
2 tablespoons melted shortening
1 cup Sun-Maid Raisins

Sift flour, salt, baking powder and sugar together and mix with the whole wheat flour. Add well beaten egg and milk and mix thoroughly. Add melted shortening and Sun-Maid Raisins. Put into a greased loaf pan and bake in a moderate oven—380° F.—for 1½ hours. This makes one loaf.

Danish Raisin Pastries

2 cups flour
1 teaspoon salt
½ cup shortening
1 egg
1 tablespoon milk
3 tablespoons shortening
1 cup chopped Sun-Maid Raisins
½ cup chopped nuts
3 tablespoons sugar

Mix and sift flour and salt. Cut in ½ cup shortening with a knife. Beat the egg and milk together and mix with the dry ingredients, adding only enough liquid to hold the mixture together. Turn out on slightly floured board, roll out thin and spread with 3 tablespoons softened shortening. Cut in 4-inch squares and sprinkle with raisins, nuts and sugar. Roll like a jelly roll and press edges together. Place rolls on a baking pan, cover with a clean, damp cloth and place in the ice chest until ready to bake (they can stand 3 hours). Brush tops with yolk of egg mixed with a little milk and sprinkle with sugar. Bake in a quick oven—425° F.—for 20 to 25 minutes. Serve hot.

The next time you entertain your bridge or sewing club, try the Danish Raisin Pastries. They are a novel and dainty sweet which can be made up several hours ahead of time; keep them in the ice-box until ready to bake.

The suggestions I have made here are only a few of the countless ways in which raisins can be used to relieve the monotony of plain foods. Many others will occur to you, I feel sure, if you follow my plan and keep a box of raisins always on hand. Sarah Field Splint

There is a difference in flavor, sweetness, size, color and cleanliness. To make certain of the finest results, be sure that the raisins you use are Sun-Maids.

For Sun-Maids are made from the tenderest and sweetest grapes, grown where they reach perfection—in the beautiful San Joaquin and Sacramento valleys of California. They come to you in sanitary packages—raisins large, plump, juicy, with an inimitable delicacy of flavor. Thoroughly cleaned and sterilized, they do not require washing before use.

You can use these perfect raisins freely, for they are inexpensive now—cheaper than they have been in years. Buy a package today and try them in the recipes Miss Splint has given you here.

Raisin Muffins

Perhaps muffins are one of the most frequently made "hot breads" today. In a very smart New York restaurant hot raisin muffins are served for tea. No sugar is used to sweeten them, as the raisins take the place of sugar. Add them to your own muffin recipe and you will have a new creation.

She who loves him best of all has seen the bitter truth

TO the world beyond his threshold he is an envied man. Head of his profession at thirty-eight, wealthy as the world computes its chattels.

Through the leaner years they had dreamed of this day and of its many pleasures; of travel and all the joys that well-earned leisure brings.

But she who knows him and loves him best of all has seen the bitter truth. Success has begun to take its toll!

In his consuming passion to forge ahead he has ignored the simplest law of health.

The time has come when he must pay.

Men and women who neglect their bodies must sooner or later face the day of reckoning.

Eating the wrong kind of food and taking too little exercise cause faulty elimination.

Unless the intestines regularly cast off their accumulations of waste, poisons generate in the human body which destroy health and pave the way for sickness. The intestines need bulk to function properly.

Now you'll like bran. For years the medical profession has counseled you to eat more bran to prevent intestinal sluggishness.

If you have tried and found ordinary bran unpalatable, know then, there is a bran that's good to eat.

Post's Bran Flakes is the most delicious cereal you ever tasted. More of it is sold than any other kind.

In millions of homes it comes to the table every morning. Everybody eats it as an "Ounce of Prevention."

Serve it at your house as a cereal, with milk or cream. You'll like it with any kind of fruit in season.

Mix it with the children's hot cereals. Bake it into bread or muffins.

You'll find Post's Bran Flakes wonderfully effective. It supplies the intestines with needed bulk and serves as an "Ounce of Prevention" against faulty elimination.

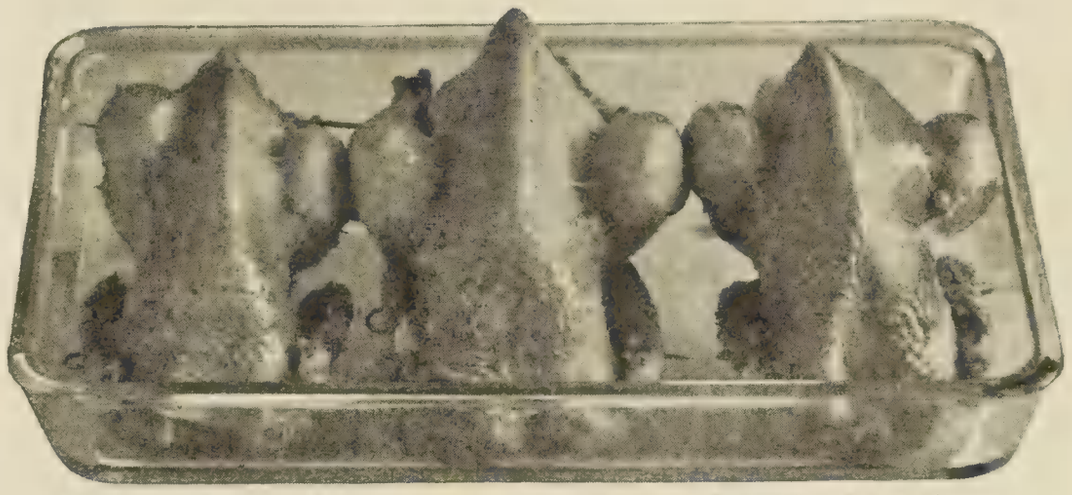
Squabs are delicious served with Lima beans and bacon

BROILED SQUABS

Split two fat squabs down the back and place them in a napkin. Flatten them. Dip them in oil or melted butter which has been seasoned with salt and pepper. Broil them over a hot fire, seven minutes on each side.

Crisp several strips of thin bacon.

Drain and heat a can of small tiny Lima beans. Butter these well.



Put the Limas and the squabs on a hot platter and garnish with the crisp bacon.

Corn-bread sticks are delicious with this dish.

SQUAB PLATE DINNER

Roast unstuffed, but buttered, three or four squabs. Glaze the breasts with the pan gravy. With a potato scoop make eight potato-balls and four carrot-balls for each squab. Cook them separately in very little water. Boil six little white onions for each squab. If you can not get little onions, use the hearts of larger ones, saving the outsides for fried onions at another meal.

Make a forcemeat of bread-crums, one egg-yolk, a tablespoon of melted butter, a little thyme and one teaspoonful of chopped parsley. Roll this mixture into little balls the same size as the potatoes and brown them in a little butter. When ready to serve, surround the squab with the vegetables. Five little cold beet-balls may be added also. Pour the juice of the roast squab over the whole. This is a very luxuriant plate dinner, aristocratic enough for any table. It may sound troublesome to prepare, but on the contrary it is very easy.

When roasting squabs, truss the wings and legs with toothpicks or skewers

CREOLED SQUABS

Split, flatten and dry the squabs—one for each person. Dip them in melted butter and fry until they are brown. Toast slices of bread cut the long way from a sandwich loaf. Trim the toast, butter it and keep it warm.

Make a dressing of one cup of strained tomato-juice, two tablespoons of minced green peppers, one tablespoon of minced onion, a pinch of Cayenne, one tablespoon of Worcestershire and one tablespoon of butter. Let this simmer for fifteen minutes and thicken very slightly.

Spread this sauce over the toast. Shred dried smoked beef on top of it and cover this with a tablespoon of grated Parmesan cheese. Lay the broiled or fried squab on top of the whole, place the dish in the oven for a few minutes and serve.

MUSHROOMS AND SQUABS

Prepare the squabs for roasting, buttering them well inside and out. Fill the squabs with mushrooms, pouring in two tablespoons of melted butter before closing them.

Arrange them in a deep glass baking-dish. Roast them covered for fifteen minutes at 400 degrees Fahrenheit and let them brown for another fifteen minutes without the cover. Serve them with triangular pieces of toast and cold asparagus, dipped in mayonnaise.

SQUAB TART

Boil spaghetti, but do not break it up. Drain it and line a buttered glass dish with it, twisting it around evenly.

Split two large fat squabs, rub them with butter and season them with salt and pepper. Lay the pieces of squab on the spaghetti.

Make a sauce of one-half cup of cream, the yolks of two eggs, salt, pepper, a pinch of nutmeg and a little chopped parsley. Let this thicken in a double boiler with one tablespoon of flour and butter blended together. Pour this sauce over the top of the squab, cover the whole thick with bread-crums and chopped mushrooms, and bake it in a moderate oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit) for one hour.

SQUAB AND MUSHROOM STEW

3 squabs
1 tablespoon butter
1 pint stock or gravy
2 tablespoons cream
½ cup mushrooms
2 tablespoons mushroom catchup
Salt and pepper
Cayenne

Clean the squabs, cut them into small portions and let them cook a short time in the butter in a saucepan, being careful not to brown them. Next add the stock or gravy, the mushroom catchup, and salt, pepper and Cayenne to taste. Let this mixture simmer for an hour, or until tender, add the mushrooms, simmer ten minutes more, and then stir in the cream. Arrange the mushrooms around the squabs on a hot platter and serve.

POTTED SQUABS

6 squabs
3 slices bacon
Any simple stuffing
1 diced carrot
1 diced onion
Hot water or stock
¼ cup butter
¼ cup flour
Buttered toast
Chopped parsley

Clean and dress the squabs, stuff, truss, and place them upright in a stew-pan on the slices of bacon. Add the carrot, onion and a little parsley, and cover with boiling water or stock. Cover the pot closely and let it simmer from two to three hours, or until tender, adding boiling water or stock when necessary. Make a sauce of the butter and flour and two cups of the stock in the pan. Serve each squab on a thin piece of moistened toast, and pour gravy over the whole.

"Do yourself proud" with the wash!

There are lots of women who get an extra cleanliness in their clothes—a brighter, sweeter cleanliness. For they use Fels-Naptha, and have its extra help.

Some women keep on with just soap. Others frequently switch from one form of soap to another. They haven't yet realized that by using Fels-Naptha they can get such beautiful results with less work. But the millions who do use it, know that nothing can take the place of Fels-Naptha.

With naptha and splendid soap working together in Fels-Naptha, you get extra washing value that you cannot get in any other form. Easier work. Clean, sweet, wholesome clothes. And a feeling that you've done a wash you'd be proud for your neighbors to see!

When you prove the extra helpfulness of Fels-Naptha you'll want to use it for everything—from sheets and shirts to your finest things. For general household cleaning, and dishwashing, too.

The first step is to get a bar or two from your grocer. Then, like the millions of women who already "swear by" Fels-Naptha, you can prove for yourself the extra helpfulness of the Golden Bar.

TEST Fels-Naptha's extra cleaning ability. Send 2c in stamps for sample bar. Address Fels-Naptha Soap, Philadelphia.

What will your friends think?

IF FRIENDS drop in, unexpectedly, and you want to keep them over night, it may cause embarrassment if you have to rearrange the family sleeping plans.

It isn't necessary. A davenport bed saves the cost of a guest room. It is all that any good davenport is, plus a good bed. The bed has its own set of springs; the mattress and bed-coverings are out of sight all day. The springs you sit on as a davenport are wholly separate from those you lie on as a bed. You don't use the upholstery to sleep on. The davenport bed is the modern way of furnishing a home.

You can get davenport beds in a large variety of designs, including period styles; in all the beautiful woods; with the favored types of upholstery, any color. Chairs can be had to match.

COOK EFFICIENTLY, TOO!

Do you know how hot your oven should be for meringues or sugar cookies, pies or popovers? And do you know exactly how long each should cook? We have a chart which tells you the right temperature and length of time for baking, broiling, boiling and frying. Write to our Home-Making Department, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and ask for THE DELINEATOR Temperature Chart. It costs you nothing but a stamped, self-addressed envelope

Keep your records where you can refer to them easily

IF SECRETARY HOOVER'S Committee on Waste in Industry were to make a study of housework they would doubtless find that a large proportion of wasted effort on the part of the housewife is due to faulty management. Fortunate is the homemaker who is not satisfied with mere routine, but who is fired with that spark of imagination which gives purpose to her humdrum work and lures her on to delightful experiments in better management.

Whether your family is large or small, whether you keep servants or not, whether you live on a farm or just a step from the corner grocery, records and memos will save you steps as well as worry and will surely improve your system of managing your household. Good records save time and strength and prevent misunderstanding. Many an experienced housewife has expressed the wish that she had kept records when she began her job. Although a woman may think she can keep records in her head, she is likely to find that her memory will often fail her. And another disadvantage of remembering things, even when this method is used by the rare individual with an infallible memory, is that another person has no easy access to information so recorded.

PLAN YOUR OWN SYSTEM

IN PLANNING a system of records two things are important: first, that you plan your system yourself to meet your particular needs; and second, that you keep the records where they can be easily referred to or added to at a minute's notice.

Decide what you want the records to tell. And, a warning—beware of planning a too-complicated system. Many an enthusiastic housewife has fired her friends to ambitious undertakings in this line only to discover later an unfavorable reaction on their part, because they attempted more than was necessary and did not stop to find out their own particular needs. Household records are almost as individual as clothing, and a system that may serve one household admirably will be totally out of place in a home of different personalities, purposes and interests.

No outsider can provide a system that will work as well as one arranged by the person who is to use it. Suggestions help, but the records must be planned according to the individual situation. The one who best knows that situation is the one to select and discard suggestions. Hold fast to that which is good only. In the enthusiasm of the moment do not start anything that will not be used and useful.

Simple and well-planned records can be divided into three kinds. First, there are memos, or reminders, which will save time and strength and will help produce that orderliness which is not only "the beauty of the house" but balm to the spirit of the dwellers therein.

Then there are both temporary and permanent records which serve as guides for the housekeeper who decides to really study the enterprise which she is managing and to play a good and a winning game.

And lastly there are the records of human interest which form an intimate chronicle of family relationships and an interesting story of individual development.

With a little thought and records of this kind any housekeeper can build up an invaluable first line of defense which will help, in time of emergency, to preserve that composure which is so greatly to be admired and so difficult to attain without foresight.

In home management, as in industry, the manager who is successful both in a business way and in human relationships is generally the one who looks upon her work as a game, and not as a series of unpleasant tasks to be disposed of with the greatest haste possible.

WHAT KINDS OF RECORDS?

"MEMO" pads, with pencils attached, conveniently placed, save an infinite amount of time in ordering supplies by telephone, in shopping, marketing, or in keeping track of the laundry when it is done outside the home. If the housewife finds the flour low when she is making biscuits, a memo jotted down at the time will prevent her from racking her brain later. Also a well-arranged shopping-list will aid in the morning's marketing, for the various articles can be bought with more dispatch and with no retracing of steps. In some families a laundry list hung by the hamper makes it possible for each member of the family to record his or her soiled articles as they are put in the basket, and this system relieves the housekeeper of the unpleasant task of rehandling and sorting them later. Only a moment is required to total the items and to make out a fresh list for the laundress, keeping the family list as a duplicate.

Other memoranda which a housekeeper frequently needs to refer to are addresses,

Make their breakfasts a delightful game

Children think these fairy grains are confections—you know they're rich grain foods

IT'S the unusual in food that tempts the childish appetite; food that's different from the ordinary. Serve that kind of cereal, and you need never coax a child to eat.

Quaker Puffed Rice is selected rice, steam exploded to eight times its normal size—every food cell broken to make digestion easy; crisp and toasty grains, luscious and richly appetizing!

The flavor is like nut-meats; grain food with the enticement of a confection. The needed minerals and carbohydrates you have here in balanced combination. And when served with milk, a dish that's strong in vitamines.

For a delightful change, serve this most alluring of grain foods. Then note the new delight it offers to the children—how, too, it attracts the adults of the family.

Serve with milk and cream, or in bowls of half and half. Try with fresh and cooked fruits, as a garnishment with ice cream, as a between-meal tid-bit to take the place of sweets. Today, order a package from your grocer.

A Mother's Duty

is to help her child keep that schoolgirl complexion

Authorities say every mother should follow this simple rule in skin care with a growing child

SHE'S indoors one moment, outdoors the next. She's exposed to all the extremes of temperature known.

Are you giving her skin the correct care? Beauty scientists now tell us that skin radiance in girlhood is largely dependent upon the precautions taken in childhood.

Help her keep the exquisitely supple skin she has today. Remember that she can, all through life, if only a few simple rules of caution and care be followed now.

Never let a day pass without this

The secret, as experts all can tell, is in the balmy lather of palm and olive oils—the perfect blending as found in Palmolive.

As she grows older, let her use powder if she wishes. But never leave it on over night. It clogs the pores, often enlarges them. Blackheads and disfigurements often follow. The skin must be kept clean, the pores open and active.

Just before retiring, wash gently with soothing Palmolive. Then massage it softly into the skin. Rinse thoroughly. Then apply a touch of cold cream if the skin is dry and needs it.

The world's most simple beauty treatment

Thus in a simple manner, millions since the days of Cleopatra have found beauty, charm and youth prolonged.

No medicaments are necessary. Remove the day's accumulations of dirt and oil, cleanse the pores, and nature will be kind. The skin will be of fine texture. Coloring will be good.

Avoid this mistake

Do not use ordinary soap in the treatment given above. Do not think any green soap, or one represented as of palm and olive oils, is as good. Palmolive is a skin emollient in soap form. The secret is in the oils and their blending.

And it costs but 10c the cake! Obtain a cake today. Then note what an amazing difference one week makes.

THE PALMOLIVE COMPANY (Del. Corp.), CHICAGO, ILL.

Soap from Trees

The only oils in Palmolive Soap are the priceless beauty oils from these three trees—and no other fats whatsoever.

That is why Palmolive Soap is the natural color that it is—for palm and olive oils, nothing else, give Palmolive its green color.

recipes and menus. The address book for the addresses of personal friends has proved to be most popular, since it can be easily carried about, but for trade addresses the small card-file seems better than a book, because changes can be made in it; yet the alphabetical order for quick reference can still be kept. Menus that have been found to be particularly pleasing to the family or to friends, others that have saved the day when a meal had to be prepared on short notice, should be recorded in a convenient card-file.

One small note-book hung in the kitchen or pantry in which to record the date when milk tickets or ice tickets were bought will prove a helpful reference when checking up bills at the end of the month.

An infrequently used but very practical record is one which tells the contents of the safe-deposit box; the numbers and other memoranda relating to documents such as insurance policies, licenses, bonds; and inventories of the contents of trunks or chests which may be stored away. A small note-book is good for recording such memoranda.

An inventory of household possessions proves its worth not only as a reminder of original costs, but as a record in case the house is rented furnished, or as a memorandum for insurance in case of fire or other destruction. If the inventory is classified and kept on filing-cards, it can be quickly referred to or added to. A duplicate copy should be placed in the safe-deposit box.

The contents of a trunk, chest or box should be listed on the outside of the receptacle, and a duplicate list should be filed with other inventories for reference. A separate note-book containing dates of attendance and the names of courses and professors is often invaluable to the student who is occasionally asked for such information in connection with further study or in applying for a position.

Surely no housekeeper, however little or great her interest in the business side of her job, can get along without some such system of memoranda as the foregoing. But when we come to the class of records that serve as guides in management, we can expect to strike a responsive chord only in the hearts of the really superior group of managers. But here we have the key that unlocks the mystery of why some seem to be the mistresses of their jobs and some seem to be driven slaves, of why some seem to get ahead, while others do not.

An alert housekeeper, in order to study her work and manage it more efficiently, will keep temporary records of such things as the way she spends her time, the number of miles she walks in her work, the number of washings a certain piece of material will stand, the amount of garden stuff produced on a certain sized plot of ground, the amount and kind of food preserved during the season, and the amount of fuel consumed in heating the house and cooking.

The competent manager of factory, farm or household studies as he goes, and varies his program according to his results, just as the mariner studies his chart and takes his soundings in strange seas.

HOUSEHOLD ACCOUNTS

JUST so the real household manager keeps financial accounts, however simple, for a sufficient length of time to give her a substantial basis on which to figure possible savings and to plan for a wise use of these savings. She is not a slave to account keeping for the sake of mere balanced books, but she learns from keeping accounts a system which will best meet her particular needs. She summarizes the accounts and arrives at conclusions which will help her to determine a future course. The much-talked-of budget is only this—a plan of procedure based on the study of actual conditions. In general, the simpler the plan the better it is, provided its aim is clear and true.

Many types of household account books may be found in the stores. But in selecting one the housewife should be careful to choose a book that will allow for as much or as little detail as she has decided will be necessary for her particular purpose.

Advocates of household accounts name as one advantage the fact that a permanent record of the cost of furnishings is kept. However, if a record of such costs is not kept in this way, it may be kept by means of an inventory, which is thus made to serve a double purpose. Households that buy supplies in large quantities find an inventory a convenient guide in deciding when and how much to order. A "perpetual inventory" may be used in such a household by recording on a card attached to the storeroom door the total amount purchased and by jotting down the amounts withdrawn from time to time.

Another important record which helps in the management of the household is a page in a financial note-book devoted to debts or other financial obligations, and the dates when payments are due. On the opposite page should be recorded any bills receivable and the dates which will help in making plans for payments. Receipted bills should be saved for one year at least. They can be kept in a simple stiff paper file, which can be obtained in the ordinary stationery store, or they can be arranged alphabetically, clipped together and kept in a convenient drawer or box.

EVENTS OF HUMAN INTEREST

THE march of humanity is recorded for the individual through such simple testimonials as certificates of birth and marriage, commissions, diplomas, portraits and photographs—mute spokesmen of that social heritage which lends dignity and beauty to family life. They are jealously guarded, and rightly so, by families having a true appreciation of their worth.

Parents who begin in a child's infancy to build up a record of his physical and mental growth are preparing for him a valuable gift. Books planned by scientists who have determined the facts important to record are now available at a small cost, and should form a part of each baby's layette. Photographs and snap-shots add immensely to the interest of human records, and they can be classified and mounted so as not to be cumbersome or awkward to handle. Kodak books of uniform size can be arranged on bookshelves as attractively and conveniently as other books. The old-fashioned album, compact and substantial, preserved family history which is of great interest to the present generation.

For the child and also for the grown-up members of the family a record should be kept of sickness, dentistry, visits to the oculist or other necessary medical attention of importance, since in later life the memory often fails when called upon to help a physician make a diagnosis.

Simple records of trips, including dates, routes and costs, whether of motor trips, camping trips or railroad travel, are frequently found exceedingly convenient for the purpose of reference, not to mention the pleasure they arouse in recalling past experiences.

It should be remembered that any record not readily at hand loses half its value. Our interest although keen for the moment is likely to wane if we can not easily find what we are searching for. Our perseverance does not endure, and the result is that we either go without the data we are looking for or we fail to add new data which should be recorded. Our system is upset and, whether we may realize it or not, the success of our undertaking is sharply challenged.

Therefore, when any sort of record is begun, make sure that it is easy of access. Concentrate your records if possible. If one is fortunate enough to have a small office or study, this is probably the most convenient spot for keeping them. Otherwise a desk or a chest may serve. A few well-chosen filing-cases and cards, ruled pads and scratch-pads of uniform size or a size adapted to the filing case help greatly in the convenient arrangement of records and can be obtained at small cost.

As in any business procedure, the more fully all the parties concerned understand the methods the better is the cooperation that can be expected. If all the members of the family understand what the housekeeper is trying to do, their sympathetic assistance can be extremely helpful.

A small amount of time, money and thought invested in the beginning by the young housekeeper, or for that matter at any time by the fortunate person who knows the joy of ever finding a "better" method, pays rich dividends both sooner and later in satisfaction and efficiency.

Your teeth affect your whole appearance. Keep them shining and sound with Pebeco.

Your White Teeth - do you know how to keep them safe ?

Only active mouth glands can protect them from decay

WHITE, shining teeth, a wonderful smile—thousands of men and women possess this real charm today.

Yet few of them are escaping tooth decay.

Dentists say an abnormal mouth condition is the underlying cause.

Modern foods, too soft, too quickly swallowed, no longer give the mouth glands enough exercise. Gradually their alkaline fluids cease to flow. And in your Dry Mouth your teeth, unprotected, are inevitably eaten by the acids of decay.

No amount of brushing and polishing can correct this curious condition. It must be reached through the mouth glands themselves. And recently a way has been found to stimulate the mouth glands successfully.

Pebeco acts directly on the salivary glands. As soon as it enters your mouth it starts a full, normal flow of alkaline saliva.

With constant daily use Pebeco completely restores the natural, protective action of your glands. Their alkaline fluids again bathe your teeth day and night. And the acids of decay are neutralized as fast as they form.

Pebeco leaves your gums clean and soothed—your whole mouth, normal and healthy. And in this healthy mouth, your teeth are kept not only white and shining, but safe.

Keep it in your medicine cabinet!

ALMOST instant relief—even in cases of intense suffering. No wonder those who have used Unguentine are astonished at its effectiveness!

No wonder it is considered the greatest advance in medical science today in the treatment of burns and painful skin injuries!

Unguentine is not simply a salve or ointment. It is a surgical dressing used not only for burns and scalds—but for wounds of every kind.

Whenever such accidents occur—apply Unguentine at once! Bandage lightly if necessary. Almost immediately it begins to relieve the pain.

Prevents infection

Unguentine does more than prevent suffering. It prevents infection also. It is a powerful antiseptic—yet an antiseptic that can be applied to an open wound without the slightest harsh or irritating effect.

It helps the wound to heal more rapidly and frequently prevents the formation of an unsightly scar.

There is nothing like Unguentine made today. No medicine cabinet should be without it. 50 cents at your druggist's.

"Not long ago we received a telegram from one of our India workers, saying his wife was dangerously ill and to come at once. We dreaded the forty-eight miles on such a hot day, but knew that no medical aid could be had at that station, so we went with our medicine kit. On our arrival we found her to be suffering from a very bad burn which had become infected and was paining her most terribly. An experience with a very bad burn treated in some of America's best hospitals had taught me what to do. I applied a generous amount of Unguentine. The next day the temperature had gone down and the patient was well enough for us to go home. I left full instructions as to how to dress the wound, etc., and in a remarkably short time it was entirely healed.

"I feel that I cannot be without Unguentine. It is something I, who am not professionally trained, can use."

RIDDING THE HOUSE OF PESTS

By Martha Van Rensselaer

Head of the School of Home Economics, Cornell University

Insidious foes that creep and crawl are liable to attack the cleanest home. And it is often difficult to know how to get rid of them, quickly and for all time. If you would like to know some safe and sane ways of exterminating roaches and bedbugs—pests as dangerous as those mentioned in this article—write to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a stamped, self-addressed envelope. The information is yours for the asking.

A good fly-trap has a large entrance

WARM weather brings flies, ants, cockroaches, moths, bedbugs, mosquitoes and other pests which the housewife considers actual enemies. For science says that one type of mosquito carries malaria, another yellow fever, the housefly helps to spread typhoid, cholera and other diseases, the rat spreads bubonic plague. And further investigations point to the poisonous effects which the bites of various insects, ordinarily regarded as non-poisonous, may have on many persons.

Very successful campaigns have been conducted in some sections of the country against the rat, the fly and the mosquito, but much remains to be done in the interest of health and economy in the fight against these enemies of man. To destroy their breeding-places; to protect food that is to be used by human beings; to remove dirt, which is a constant carrier of micro-organisms; to screen houses against the admission of pests; to quarantine persons having communicable diseases, and to disinfect places where persons having communicable diseases have been sheltered are all important remedies of a general nature. Even the cleanest home is likely to be invaded at times by pests and every housewife should know how to combat them effectively.

FLIES

AT ONE time the common housefly was regarded as a necessary evil, and was casually brushed away from any food upon which it had happened to alight. Now we are apt to throw away the glass of milk in which a fly has bathed. We feel it has been contaminated.

An anti-fly campaign is a part of a general health program and may be connected quite reasonably with a Better Homes program. To institute an effective campaign against flies, community action is necessary as soon as warm weather commences, for a male and female fly can produce between April and August quintillions of descendants. It takes about ten days for an egg to become a fly and the average life of a fly is about three weeks.

So watch out first for the egg, then the maggot, the pupa, and finally the fly. Flies are born in filth, they feed on it and they carry it. They have no rightful place in any society that abhors dirt. However, mere dirt is not the only problem. The type of dirt which flies carry may be laden with germs which multiply even faster than the flies themselves. It is not always far from the breeding-place of the fly to the kitchen and the food supplies of human beings, and unless a good screen comes between the two, the fly quickly learns the way. The fly never discriminates between the source of his food, be it garbage-can, sputum, excreta or the baby's milk. Do not let flies live. Here are some ways of fighting them.

1. Kill all the flies inside the house.

"Swat the fly" represents an activity for the whole family. Swatters must be numerous and ready for quick action, for flies have eyes enabling them to see from all sides of their heads.

Fly-papers should be placed wherever needed. They should be fastened down, for they are a nuisance when the wind blows them about and turns them upside down. Care must be taken not to place them on the seats of chairs.

Sticky fly-paper can be made at home. Boil two pounds of resin in a pint of castor-oil until the resin is dissolved, and spread this mixture on heavy paper by means of a brush. However, commercial fly-paper is quite inexpensive and there is much less trouble in purchasing it than there is in manufacturing it in the home.

To poison the fly, heat a small coal-shovel and pour on it twenty drops of carbolic acid. Label the bottle carefully in large letters—poison, and keep it where it will not be within reach of the children. Fresh pyrethrum powder may be poured on the hot shovel instead of the carbolic acid. The flies which fall to the floor stupefied may be swept up and burned before they revive. A solution of formalin, which is also poison and must be used with care, may be employed—eight teaspoonfuls to a quart of water. Break a nick in the edge of a bottle, fill the bottle with the solution and stand it inverted in a saucer. The poison will seep down as it is needed. A little sugar added to the solution makes it more tempting to the fly. Be sure to place these dishes beyond the reach of the children or of pet animals. There are various liquids with devices for spraying them into the room that may be used for ridding the house very effectively of flies and cockroaches and other pests as well.

2. Keep the fly out of the house.

Flies frequently gain access to the house through unthought-of openings such as the chimney, and during the Winter they often cluster in warm places, wall crevices or under loose wall-paper. They are attracted by the warm air of the house and by the smell of food. Not only the doors and windows must be screened, but the outside porch as well, if it is used for food storage. An alternative in out-of-door storage is to screen the food itself.

The garbage-can should be screened or covered to prevent its being used as a breeding-place for flies, and it should be disinfected to make it unattractive to them.

Sick-rooms should be carefully screened, especially in the case of contagious diseases, for flies are notorious as carriers of germs.

Screened food displayed in the stores is the safest kind to buy. Merchants who screen their foodstuffs are deserving of patronage. The use of an electric fan over supplies of vegetables and fruits is also an excellent device for driving away flies. A fly campaign should include

A bright, cheerful kitchen —with Valspar-Enamel

"This kitchen I am very proud of," writes Mrs. F. M. Keyser.* "It was finished three years ago, the woodwork in white Valspar-Enamel and the linoleum with clear Valspar Varnish.

"And they've both been put to severe tests. The floor has had boiling water poured on it many times. One evening some vinegar was spilled and forgotten until the next morning. I was very much worried for fear the acid would destroy the color of the linoleum, but the varnish was a perfect protection.

"The woodwork has withstood the smoke and spatters of cooking for three years and still looks as good as new."

You, too, can have a kitchen sparklingly clean and proof against wear. Simply paint your furniture and woodwork with Valspar-Enamel in any color you like. And make your gas range look spick and span with a coat of Valspar Black Enamel.

Anyone can do the work because Valspar-Enamel spreads easily and flows evenly. And besides their cheerful colors, these enamels have a hard, lustrous surface that is easy to clean and absolutely waterproof.

Made in 12 beautiful standard colors: Red—light and deep, Blue—light, medium and deep, Green—medium and deep, Ivory, Vermilion, Bright Yellow, Gray and Brown. Also in Black, White, Gold, Bronze, Aluminum and Flat Black. And by mixing these colors in varying proportions, any desired shade or tint can be obtained.

Color—rich and vivid, or soft and dainty—is everywhere in the modern home. Think how much this room would lack in charm with an ordinary floor. The soft clouded design is Belflor Inlaid Pattern No. 7103/1.

A lovely floor and so economical

BEDROOMS become so much brighter and daintier when given the colorful charm of Belflor Inlaid. And the most surprising part of it is that this new Nairn Flooring is extremely low in price.

The soft, clouded effects are duplicated in no other flooring. A lovely Belflor pattern in hues that blend with walls and furnishings produces the newest and richest of decorative effects. Old, worn-looking floors disappear forever.

And what rugged, lasting service Belflor Inlaid gives you. It is made from the same quality materials as used in all the other Nairn Inlaid Linoleums—goods whose value and durability have stood unsurpassed for nearly forty years.

No refinishing is needed, the colors are permanent. They go clear through to the burlap back. An occasional waxing keeps them fresh and clear.

Noiseless and comfortable underfoot—warm in winter, cool in summer—Belflor Inlaid is the perfect flooring for every room.

And from its wealth of artistic patterns, you'll have no difficulty in securing just the effects you want at a price that means real economy.

Write for the folder showing Nairn Belflor Inlaid in actual colors. Then ask the Nairn dealer to show you the goods "in the piece."

a food-screening ordinance and work for its enforcement.

House screens should be cleaned and repaired before they are placed in the windows and doors for Summer use. And they should fit tightly, for one little crack may admit the obnoxious fly or mosquito.

Since stable refuse is recognized as a common breeding-place for flies, it should be placed in a bin until it can be removed, and should be covered with a wire netting to prevent the female from getting in to lay her eggs. After the refuse has been removed, the ground on which it has lain should be sprinkled with lime because fly maggots often seek further refuge by crawling into the earth.

Although out-of-door toilets are fast disappearing in most communities, many still remain. These should be screened and the vaults frequently treated with a dry dust or lime.

3. Trapping flies is a good supplementary method of getting rid of them.

The principle of a good fly-trap is to make the entrance large and the exit impossible. These traps require, as a bait, food with an odor which will attract the fly. Flies are also attracted by light, so the trap should use this as an additional lure. The food often selected is molasses—one part molasses to three parts of water.

Milk added to brown sugar and water or to a mush of bran may also be used as a bait. Scraps from a slaughter-house or meat will catch blowflies. There are many kinds of traps which are thoroughly described, with directions for construction, in Farmers' Bulletin No. 734, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

MOSQUITOES

MOSQUITOES lay their eggs on the surface of the water. From the eggs hatch the larvæ which most of us have seen in the rain-barrel and which are called wrigglers. If the weather is warm, the wrigglers will change to the pupa state in eight days. Then the skin splits along the back and a full grown mosquito creeps out. If it is a female, she flies away to seek whom she may devour. The males neither bite nor sting. One kind of mosquito carries malaria, but all kinds are pestiferous.

The malarial mosquito draws the blood of malarial human beings—that is, a person in whose blood the germ of malaria already exists. The germ develops in its host, the mosquito, and is injected by it into a fresh victim. The malarial mosquito is necessary to spread malaria. Yellow fever is transmitted in the same way by another kind of mosquito. Fortunately only a small percentage of all mosquitoes are malaria-spreaders and yellow fever is transmitted by these pests only in a restricted territory.

Since mosquitoes breed in quiet waters, the most effective remedy against them is to remove wherever possible all standing water. If the water must remain, as it necessarily must in many still-water ponds, the surface should be covered evenly with kerosene by means of a sprayer or by simply pouring the kerosene over the water if the surface of the pond is small. The kerosene destroys the wriggler when it comes to the surface to breathe. One ounce of oil will cover fifteen square feet of surface, and the oil does not affect the water for use if the latter is drawn from below the surface.

When it is undesirable to spread oil over the surface, as in the case of watering-troughs or lily-ponds, the water can be kept from being a breeding-place for mosquitoes by stocking the water with small fish which feed on the wrigglers.

Plumbing should be kept in good condition in order to avoid leaks. The clogged gutters of the roof of a house afford a breeding-place for mosquitoes. Covers should be kept tight on cesspools. All manholes, gutters, ditches in which there is standing water, and pools by the wayside should be covered with oil. Weeds which hold water on the surface of their leaves, tin cans, bottles and old junk in general should be removed.

Ants will not invade an ice-box if its feet are set in water

ANTS

THE type of ants which often invades a house in the Spring or Summer is generally called workers. The winged males or females are produced during the Summer and immediately take their nuptial flight. The males soon perish, the females tear off their wings and set about the work of establishing new colonies.

Trying to rid the house of ants by destroying them after they enter is like trying to sweep out the water without stopping a leaky pipe. The pests enter faster than they can be killed, and the housewife wonders where they can possibly come from.

The best way to exterminate ants is to follow them to their nests and to destroy the nests by drenching them with hot water or saturating them with coal oil. Or pour an ounce or two of bisulphid into a number of holes made with a stick and close each hole with the foot. The bisulphid penetrates through the tunnels and kills the ants. It is, of course, not altogether useless to try to kill the ants which are found in the house. This can be done by means of insect-powders, by attracting them to a sirup of borax and sugar or by leaving camphor gum where the ants are found. They will not cross a surface of water, and so food will be protected if it is placed in pans of water.

CLOTHES MOTHS

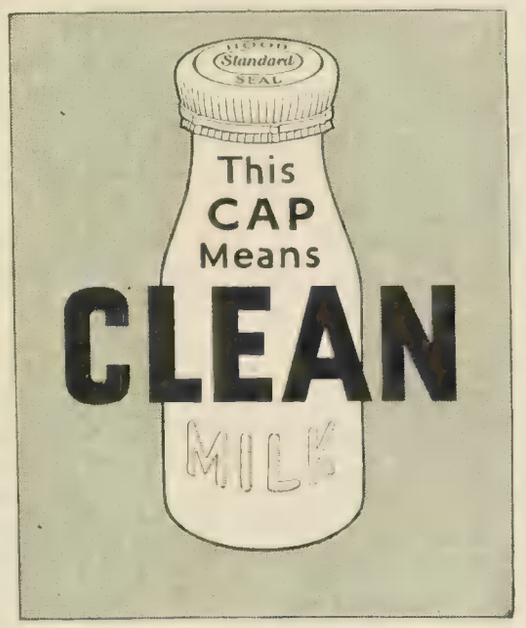
THE miller or mother which we often see flying about in the house, is probably the parent moth which lays the eggs in clothing and in carpets. Each moth may lay over two hundred eggs which hatch in not less than ten days, if conditions are favorable. The larvæ hatched from these eggs eat the clothing and show a special liking for furs and skins and woolen garments.

The best remedy, of course, is as far as possible to kill the female moth before the eggs are laid. Clothing should be frequently brushed, sunned and aired. Brushing and beating, when the fabric will permit it, will crush and remove the eggs. Seams and pockets where dust collects should be carefully brushed. After a thorough brushing, clothes to be stored for the season should be wrapped securely in newspapers or wrapping-paper if moth-proof bags are not available.

Moth balls are efficient moth preventatives because of the naphthalene of which they are composed. But unless the container is tight the fumes of the naphthalene will escape and the moths will be unharmed. A pound of naphthalene is needed for every hundred cubic feet of space. The clothing should be placed lightly in the container to allow the gas to reach all of the infected parts, and the container should be closed tightly for several hours. It is safer to repeat the process in two or three weeks than to trust to the first effort alone.

Cold storage for furs and heavy garments, provided in large towns, is a guarantee of safety. The articles are kept in a cold-storage room at a temperature of about forty degrees Fahrenheit, although a lower temperature is required to kill moths.

When it is necessary to fumigate clothing, brush it carefully and pack it in a tight trunk. Place a saucer on top of the clothing and pour into it some carbon disulphid, or place in the trunk several pieces of old cloth which have been saturated with the disulphid. As it evaporates, it emits a gas which is disagreeable but effective. It is best not to pour it directly on the garments to be fumigated. Carbon disulphid can be purchased at a drug-store. It is explosive and must be kept away from fire.



A CAUTION

WHEN there is an unusual visitation of household insect pests and fumigation is desired, persons who are trained to use poisonous substances for fumigation should be secured to do the work.

A Matter Concerning the Welfare of Every American Household

MODERN DAIRYMEN spend thousands to protect you. Their milk and cream are scrupulously clean when they leave the dairy. So are the bottles. But your dairyman cannot control conditions on your back porch nor those in transit!

WHAT USE is scientific precaution at the source, if householders pour clean milk from a bottle whose mouth has become soiled? What of the dust and dirt and germs that settle on unprotected bottle tops? They mingle with the milk.

The hood and seal that protects the entire top of the bottle is the modern and 100% safe method of keeping milk and bottle clean. Protection in this practical form was invented and developed by Mr. O. N. Tevander, head of the organization you are urged to write.

DON'T IGNORE this seeming trifle. It may easily exact a heavy penalty. But the danger is as easily avoided. All your milk and cream may be protected absolutely from contaminating contacts. From human hands. From exposure to dirt. From any nearby refuse. From all the things that should not touch milk.

A SIMPLE INVENTION now hoods and seals the entire top of the bottle. You may have noticed its almost universal use in the case of extra grades of milk and cream—on certified milk—on milk for babies. But should any milk for human consumption be less carefully purveyed, less carefully poured? Nine hundred dairymen think not. Many dairies hood and seal every bottle, thus giving their customers full protection. This prudence will soon be general practice—if not a law!

LOOK at the picture. A milk bottle with entire top protected from harm. This seal goes on at the dairy. A sterile seal that stays sealed until you take it off—with a flip of the finger. You may replace the hood, but not the ring—so any previous removal or tampering would be instantly detected. Known as the Standard method of sealing, it is a method which is bound to become standard with everybody.

DRINK PURE MILK and be sure it is pure. Doubtful milk is a menace. Good milk is as good for adults as for babies and children. If people all knew this way of insuring purity, perhaps they would drink more milk. We would be a stronger and healthier nation if they did! Health authorities are all agreed on that.

THE U. S. GOV'T is awake to this safety measure! In the Canal Zone where germs are rife, this method of sealing is a government order. And the British government similarly guards its men in India. So this precaution is neither fad nor frill!

YOUR CLUB, and any hotel where the service is fastidious invariably brings the milk you order with this seal that you may remove it at the table. Can we afford to be less particular at home? Do we dare to be less careful where there are children to be considered?

VOTE for this protection for your own household. The coupon for milk consumers is easily signed and mailed—and it will bring you a most interesting and valuable book about Milk and its uses. Dairymen will want the special information their coupon will bring them.

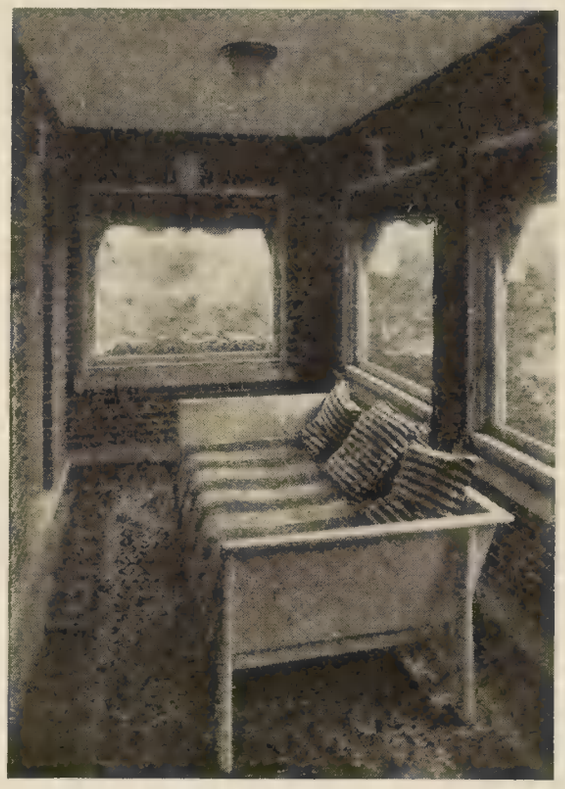
SLEEPING OUT-OF-DOORS



By Mary Harrod Northend

Would you like to know how to equip a sleeping-porch for comfort and convenience? Then write for full information to Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a stamped, self-addressed envelope

SLEEPING-PORCHES within the last few years have gained in favor. To-day they seem almost a necessity, for we have learned of their benefit to our health. Sleeping in the fresh air does one good physically; and besides it seems to renew one's moral courage to meet the next day's work.

With the acceptance of the sleeping-porch as a permanent institution, architects have begun to design them so that they will fit decoratively into the exterior and interior house scheme.

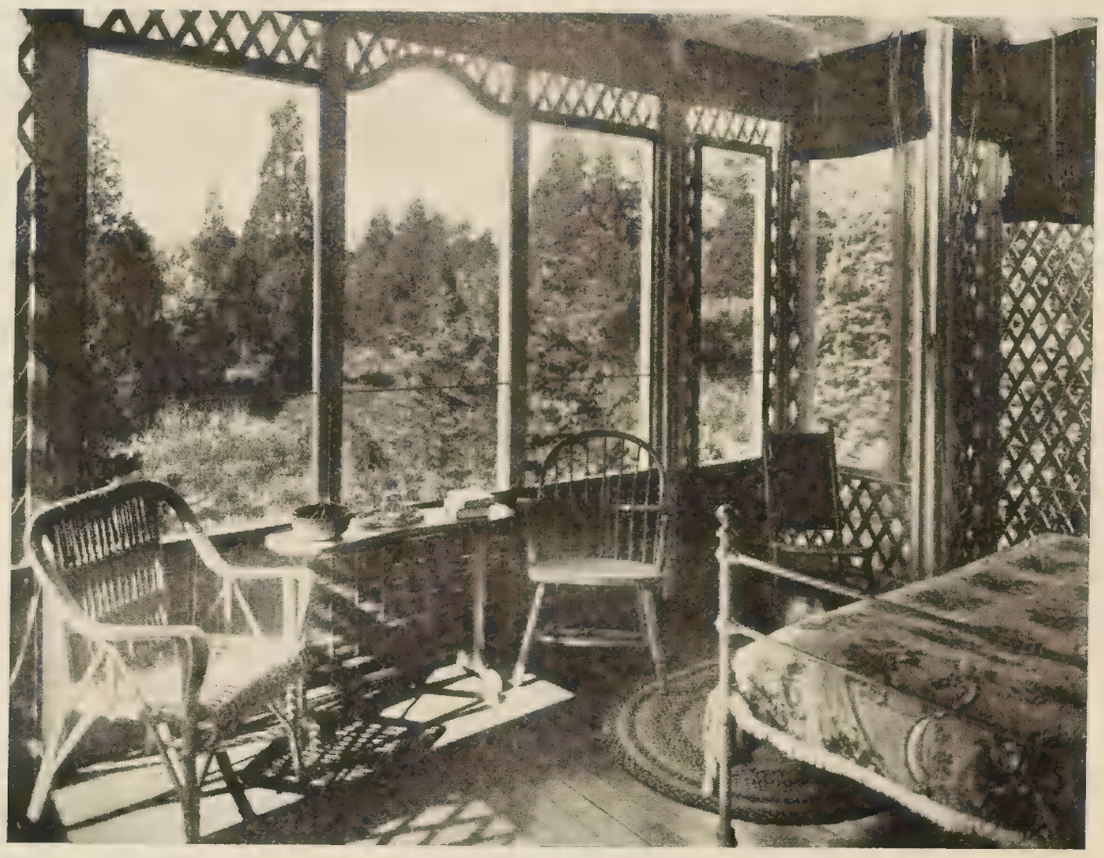
There is no part of the house where they may not be placed, but usually an ell is thrown out either at the rear or side, for it is both economical and decorative in this position. Occasionally the porch rests on decorative columns which form a protection for the veranda or sun-parlor underneath.

Brick makes this sleeping-porch substantial and big windows give it an abundance of light and air

The flooring should be laid double, if possible, with tarred paper placed between, so as to more effectually keep out the drafts. Canvas is adaptable for roofing purposes, and it comes to-day in so many colors that it can be made to blend artistically with the exterior of the house.

The size of the sleeping-porch and its connection with the rooms inside by either French or low windows regulate its furnishing. The exterior can be finished with either glassed-in windows or with canvas curtains which may be lowered or raised as the weather demands. Many people prefer to make their porch into an outdoor living-room, fitting it up with a day-bed, raffia chairs and a table. Others keep it simply as a sleeping-apartment and banish all unnecessary furnishings.

For a floor covering, linoleum gives further protection from drafts. This may be left perfectly plain or a pretty rug may be laid on the floor at one side of the bed. The latter is comfortable underfoot when one steps out upon it in the morning. Care should be taken in choosing the rug that it be weatherproof, so that a sudden storm will not ruin it.



The bed will be selected according to the wish of the occupant. A single iron bed, painted in a delicate color, is effective. The cot bed, while it may be used, is not popular because of its unattractiveness. A pretty covering should be thrown over the bed when not in use, and in addition a rubber blanket should be kept close at hand in case of a Summer shower which, though it did not demand the closing of the curtains or the glass windows, might spatter in on the bed.

Flannel night-dresses or pajamas are necessary in cold weather. Also it is wise to sleep between blankets, care being taken that there are plenty of warm coverings underneath as well as above the sleeper. Flannel hoods can be bought to be worn over the head to protect one from drafts, and sleeping-bags may be slipped over the night-clothes to give additional warmth. Thus equipped one can defy cold weather and become strong and vigorous enough to escape influenza, which ofttimes comes to many who have made themselves tender by sleeping inside heated rooms.

Where sleeping-porches are not available, there are several makeshifts which may be adopted. Sometimes the windows are taken out so that the fresh air can freely circulate. In such a case, thin unbleached muslin shades should be hung at the windows.

Or a window-tent can be attached on the inside of the room. The bed is placed under it so that the sleeper's head fits in, excluding the warm air and leaving the head exposed to the fresh air outside.

This latter treatment is recommended for tubercular or nervous patients.

Here is a porch that is on intimate terms with the garden. Adjustable curtains make it possible to cut out unwelcome sun, wind or rain

Wherever smart women gather you see this charming hosiery

TODAY'S MODE DEMANDS THIS RICH HOSIERY

AS NEVER BEFORE, Madame, Mademoiselle, your hosiery must be perfect in appearance for today's mode!

First of all, hosiery is and will continue to be more than ever conspicuous. Skirts, frocks, gowns —all are short.

So you see why the richness, the lovely sheerness and perfection of Holeproof Hosiery become really a necessity, today. It is not enough that your hosiery be passably fair. It must be faultless.

The most smartly dressed women—wherever you go—are wearing exquisite Holeproof stockings. In exclusive shops—at the theatre—the places where people of fashion gather—as well as upon the boulevards.

For Holeproof Hosiery meets every requirement of style and personal taste.

There are full-fashioned and semi-fashioned styles — in sheerest chiffons or the heavier silks.

All the newest, most correct colors are yours to select from—so that you may have, as you wish, stunning contrast with any costume, or the matching effect that is equally chic. The most skilful work in dyes gives extraordinary richness and brilliance to Holeproof shades and tints.

But perhaps most notable of all its superiorities is the flawless perfection of Holeproof knitting. Never a flaw in the fine fabric is permitted to leave our factories. There are no uneven places. Each pair is inspected by keen-eyed experts—far more carefully than you could do it yourself.

Exquisite sheerness and rich lustre come from using only finest quality silks, specially handled in every process of manufacture, to keep their beauty.

Smooth snugness—from ankle to hem—is assured by careful knitting to shape and size. This is very important, as you know, for no beauty of fabric could overcome untidiness in the fit of your stockings.

Yet, despite its matchless beauty, Holeproof Hosiery is modest in price. No need for extravagance in wearing hosiery that is everything you could wish. What is more, Holeproof possesses the gratifying ability to be worn much, laundered much, and still retain its dainty, fresh-looking newness.

There are ever so many styles offered right now for your selection—in all the accepted colors. At almost all good stores (Holeproof is sold only in retail stores). If your dealer does not carry it, write direct to us for illustrated price-list.

You see it wherever smartly dressed women gather. Sheer, lustrous, of flawless texture and exquisite appearance, it is yet moderate in price. New monthly fashion bulletin—in advance of the mode—sent free on request.

Why shouldn't you be as careful about Quality in Canned Fruits as we are?

You ought to be!

You and your family are the ones who eat them.

Certainly there's no use experimenting with varying qualities—no use "shopping around" among hundreds of different brands—especially when you know how particular we are about the quality of DEL MONTE.

Insist on this well-known brand! And you call for finest fruits from the world's most favored orchards—the pick of the crop—gathered at the very moment of perfection—and brought to your table ready to serve with all their natural delicacy and flavor.

You always know in advance exactly what DEL MONTE quality is—the same uniform goodness in every variety—the same assurance of satisfaction, no matter where or when you buy.

Isn't it worth while being particular?

You'll Never Lose This Book

MENUS FOR MAY

By Jessie A. Boys

These menus were planned to provide correct nutritional values within the budget of an average household. They were edited by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the School of Home Economics, Cornell University

Tasty dishes, these! Salmon puffs light as feathers, cheese dreams all golden brown, and piping-hot codfish bisque—doesn't the very sound of Columbia dressing, eggs renege and strawberry charlotte intrigue you? These dishes—the ones that are starred—are selected because they are seasonable and a little out of the ordinary, because they are nourishing and delicious. We cordially invite you to write us for them. Just tell us the ones you want and send a stamped return envelope to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

BY MAY the embryonic garden has begun to make its contributions to the daily menu, and vegetables from one's own garden seem to have a special flavor that those bought from the grocer lack. On the spur of the moment the housewife can add onions or radishes or lettuce fresh from her garden to the meal without inconvenience or extra work. Even the lowly but cheerful dandelion, although hated by those who take pride in a smooth green lawn, is not to be despised. It adds fresh greenness and crispness to many a Spring meal.

Growing Children Need this rich breakfast

QUICK QUAKER—Savory, flavory, delicious

Cooks in 3 to 5 minutes!

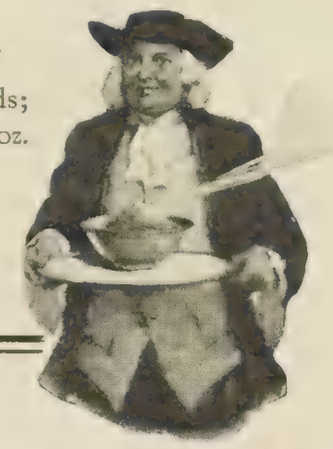
HERE is the "oats and milk" breakfast authorities say no growing child should be denied—cooked, ready and served as quickly as plain toast.

Because of lack of time, many mothers were serving oats too seldom. So Quaker Oats experts perfected Quick Quaker, a new kind of Quaker Oats.

As an emergency food, no other breakfast surpasses. As an early morning enticement, none compares. Rich, full flavored and enticing, it tempts the most indifferent appetite.

All the fine Quaker flavor is retained, all the luscious smoothness. The grains are cut before flaking and rolled very thin. They cook faster. That's the only difference.

Order Quick Quaker today—you will be delighted.



Remember, your grocer now has two kinds of Quaker Oats—the kind you have always known and Quick Quaker.

Why 86% of Home Economics teachers say "I prefer Cream of Tartar Baking Powder"

The teachers of Home Economics in High Schools all over the country were recently asked "What kind of baking powder do you prefer?"

86% of those answering definitely stated "Cream of Tartar!"—then they told why.

They said, "It gives the best results"—"There is no harmful residue"—"It leaves no bitter taste"—"It insures success." An overwhelming testimonial to the superiority of cream of tartar for perfect baking!

Contains no alum
Leaves no bitter taste.

IN Royal Baking Powder are perfectly blended soda and pure cream of tartar derived from grapes grown in the famous vineyards of southern Europe.

Much labor is involved, infinite care and expense—but steadily for more than fifty years Royal's importations of this precious ingredient have gone on so that you may always be sure of having the same high quality baking powder.

Royal's faithful service has extended over three generations. In millions of kitchens daily it never fails to do its full duty.

2c worth insures success!

Cakes and biscuits baked with Royal are so marvelously light and fluffy, fine textured and full flavored that they can be easily distinguished from all others.

And yet enough Royal for a large, luscious layer cake, the sort everybody likes—costs less than 2c!

Experienced cooks know they can depend on Royal; inexperienced cooks use it with the best results.

PRESERVING THE EARLY FRUITS

By Alice Blinn

Recipes have been tested and approved by the School of Home Economics, Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

The early fruits can be combined to make clear and colorful jellies

PRESERVING-TIME IS HERE!

But before you don your apron write for our new booklet, "Canning, Preserving and Jelly Making." It tells how to can by both the cold-pack and open-kettle methods, how to test pectin and jelly, how to prepare sirups, how to dry fruit or vegetables and how to pickle. If you are an experienced housewife, you will be interested in this information, and if you're a novice these comprehensive directions are exactly what you've been looking for. All this information is yours for twenty-five cents. Just send your money and your address to our Home-Making Department, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and the booklet will be forwarded to you promptly.

IT IS certain that the fruits that come in the Spring do not contain enough pectin to be good jelly-making material. It may be due to the weather or it may just be their nature. However, a home-maker need not do without the characteristic flavor of these fruits or their lovely colors, for delicious jellies may be made from their juices by using either a ready-made pectin or by combining the juice with any of the fruits that are rich in pectin.

For instance, one cup of either rhubarb, strawberry, pineapple or cherry juice with one cup of apple-juice and one and one-third cup of sugar will make a perfect jelly. If a ready-made pectin is used, the juice of these pectin-lacking fruits is boiled with the sugar for a minute or two, the pectin is added and the jelly jells beautifully and almost immediately. It is as simple as that!

Fortunately these early fruits blend well together and conserves, marmalades and preserves of the most delicious flavor may be made with various combinations of rhubarb, strawberry and pineapple. As in making any preserves of this nature, the color and clearness of the product is better if the fruit is heated for at least five minutes before the sugar is added and the preserve cooked as quickly as possible. This process gives a jelly-like texture to the preserves and helps to keep the color bright and sparkling. The housewife who takes pride in her jams and jellies will of course use fruit free from dark spots and discolorations.

RHUBARB CONSERVE

2 cups rhubarb cut fine
2 cups sugar
1 orange, juice and grated rind
1 lemon, juice and grated rind
½ cup blanched nuts cut in small pieces

Combine all the ingredients except the nuts, and heat the mixture until the sugar is dissolved. Then boil it rapidly until it is clear. Add the nuts, pour the conserve into clean glasses, and when they are cold seal them with hot paraffin.

RHUBARB-AND-PINEAPPLE MARMALADE

3 pounds red rhubarb
1 cup pineapple cut in pieces
2 lemons, juice and grated rind
2 pounds sugar

Boil the mixture very slowly until it is thick and clear. Turn it into jars. Seal them when they are cold.

STRAWBERRY-AND-RHUBARB CONSERVE

1 quart strawberries
1 quart rhubarb
1½ quarts sugar

Cut the unpeeled rhubarb in one-half-inch pieces. Combine the strawberries, the rhubarb and the sugar and cook the mixture slowly until it is thick and clear. Pour it into hot, clean jelly-glasses, and cover them with melted paraffin.

RHUBARB-AND-FIG PRESERVE

6 pounds rhubarb cut in small pieces
4 pounds sugar
1 pound figs minced
3 lemons, juice and grated rind

Combine the rhubarb, the figs and the sugar, and allow the mixture to stand overnight. Add the juice and the rind of the lemons. Cook the mixture slowly until it is thick, turn into glasses, and seal when set.

PINEAPPLE PRESERVES

Pare the pineapple and with a sharp-pointed knife extract the eyes. Then with a silver fork tear the fruit off the core in medium-sized pieces. Weigh the pulp, then place it in a preserving-kettle and partly cover it with water. Cover the kettle closely and cook the pineapple until it is tender. Then drain the pineapple from the water and add to the water three-fourths of a pound of sugar for each pound of fruit. Cook the sugar and water together until the sirup is thick enough to coat a spoon. Return the fruit to the sirup and cook it rapidly until the mixture is clear. Pour into clean hot jars and seal.

CHERRY-PINEAPPLE-AND-APPLE CONSERVE

2 quarts pitted cherries
3 cups pineapple
2 cups diced apples
2 quarts sugar
½ pound blanched English walnuts

Put the pineapple through a food-chopper. Mix the fruit with the sugar and let it stand overnight. Cook it until it is thick. Add the walnut-meats chopped fine. Pour the conserve into hot, clean glasses, and when it is cold cover it with hot paraffin. The nuts may be omitted if desired.

SUN-COOKED PRESERVES

SMALL fruits like strawberries, raspberries and currants can be preserved by this process. Wash the fruit, drain thoroughly, pick over and stem, then weigh it. For each pound of fruit allow one pound of sugar and one cup of water. Add the water to the sugar and cook until the sirup spins a thread. Remove the sirup from the fire. Add the fruit and let it remain in the sirup overnight. With a skimmer remove the fruit from the sirup, and lay it on platters or flat dishes. Cook the sirup again until it threads. Pour the hot sirup over the berries, cover the platter with cheese-cloth or glass and place in the direct sunlight. A glass cover hastens the process. Allow the fruit to stand three or four days in the sunshine, or until the sirup is thick and jelly-like in consistency. Pack in clean jars and seal.

NEW WAYS OF COOKING VEGETABLES

By Lucile Brewer

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the School of Home Economics, Cornell University

Asparagus tips with vegetable aspic garnished with strips of pimiento and served with mayonnaise is a delicious dish called asparagus-at-sea

Seven splendid sauces to serve on vegetables—a different one for every day in the week! Tart with lemon, savory with parsley or onion, each one of them is a delightful combination of those things which add piquancy and zest to ordinary food. Just write to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and please don't forget to enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

SPRING is too close to the cold edge of Winter for many vegetables to venture into garden and market by the time it arrives. Since the selection of vegetables from which to plan May menus is necessarily limited, the meal-maker needs to make the most of every purple-green shoot of asparagus, and she should not scorn the wayside greens that are at their best at this season.

She must observe with care all the rules of vegetable cookery in order that none of the precious flavor be lost, and in addition she must constantly learn new tricks in preparing and serving the vegetables of early Spring lest her family tire of plain boiled and buttered asparagus and quite refuse the usual "mess of greens."

It is taken for granted that she will cook her vegetables as quickly as possible after they have been gathered; that she will keep them crisp in cold water, if they must stand; that she will use steam or very little water in cooking them, so that the flavor may be kept, and that, at the last, she will remove the surplus water—saving it of course for soups—and let the vegetables simmer in the seasonings in order that the flavor of the butter and salt may become a part of the vegetable itself.

Cooking en casserole and seasoning the vegetable with stock will do much to renew the family's enthusiasm for any one that must be served several times a week during the season when it is available.

Young peas cooked in chicken stock, a bit of cheese added to asparagus, cooked green onions with a seasoning of horseradish sauce add variety to vegetable dishes.

GREEN PEAS SUPREME

Select young tender peas and cook them in just enough chicken stock to cover them. Add cream, salt and white pepper to taste. Serve at once in timbale cases or on crisp toast.

ASPARAGUS-AT-SEA

Sprig of parsley
1 tablespoon sugar
½ teaspoon salt
1 tablespoon finely chopped carrot
1 tablespoon finely chopped celery
2½ cups white stock
1¼ tablespoon gelatin soaked in ¼ cup cold water
1 clove
2 tablespoons lemon-juice

Cook the vegetables and the clove in the stock for fifteen minutes. Strain and add the gelatin which has been soaked and the other ingredients. Pour this mixture into a shallow pan or a mold which has been greased. Chill. When the mixture begins to set, lay bunches of asparagus tips (from four to six in a bunch) in the aspic. Lay a strip of pimiento across each bunch. Cut the whole into squares and serve them with mayonnaise.

Crisp, fresh vegetables make welcome appetizers these Spring days

Can we add years to our lives – increase our strength and vitality – overcome our most dreaded diseases by what we eat ?

"Yes," say the foremost authorities in the world today!

Read these startling statements made by one of the greatest food experts in the United States:

"Old age diseases—breaking down of the heart, hardening of the arteries, diseases of the kidneys, nervous and digestive disorders—are developing in younger people with each succeeding decade.

"Death from these diseases has increased 100 per cent in 30 years.

"They are the causes of inaccuracy, lack of efficiency, lack of success.

"There can be no longer any doubt that our food is one of the most important factors contributing to this condition."

IN your choice of food lies the difference between real health—and that dangerous condition of low vitality that leads to trouble.

It means the crucial difference between inefficiency and driving power—between fatigue and vigor.

The foundation for health both in adult and child is laid largely by the woman who plans the daily meals

An important point

Food may satisfy our appetites—may contain plenty of nourishment—yet may clog our digestive systems and turn to poisonous waste. The longer food takes to digest, the more likely this is to happen.

This important point is one of the explanations of the unusual value of Grape-Nuts as a food.

In Grape-Nuts you get the rich nourishment of whole wheat and barley in its most digestible form.

Baked 22 hours Grape-Nuts is ready for your body to use in about half the time of the ordinary hearty breakfast. There is no long process of digestion that taxes your nervous forces and wears down your body machinery.

On the contrary, Grape-Nuts actually hastens the digestion of various other foods—foods which, eaten alone, would take longer to turn into nourishment.

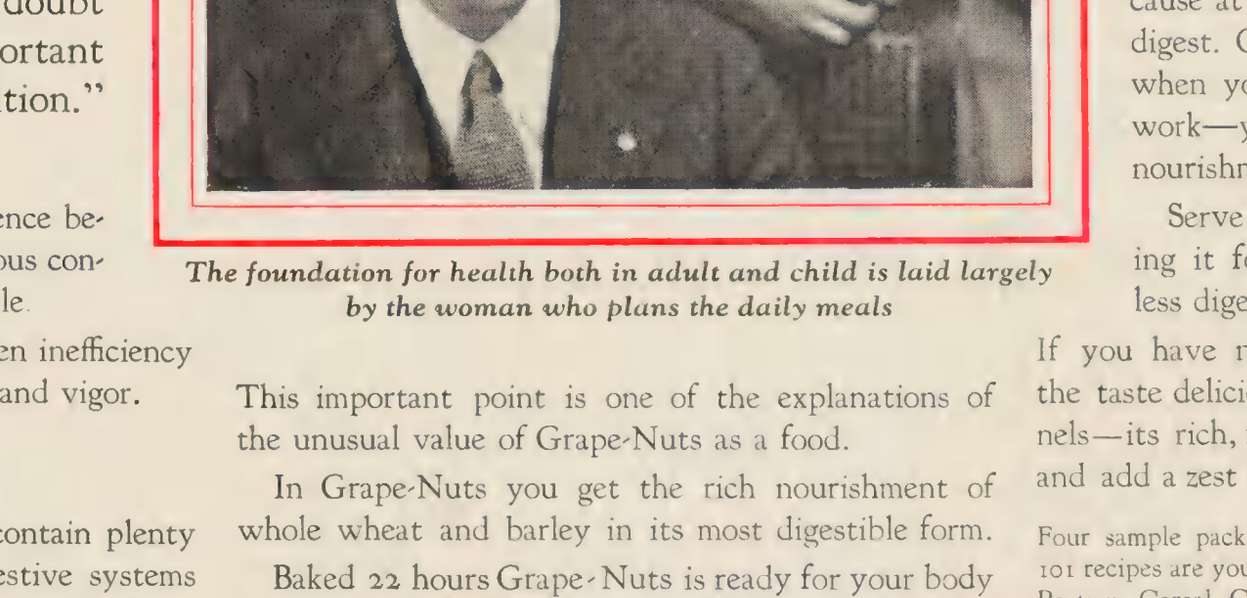
Women who plan the family meals for health and efficiency find Grape-Nuts an ideal food. It supplies perfectly the needs of grown-ups, and of children who use up so much vitality in the strenuous business of growing.

Grape-Nuts gives you the physical endurance, the mental efficiency—the actual exhilaration—that comes from a body that is nourished without being clogged up.

Ideal for breakfast or lunch

Grape-Nuts is ideal for breakfast or lunch—because at these times your food must be easy to digest. Grape-Nuts puts no strain on your body when you need all your force and vitality for work—yet it supplies you with the utmost in nourishment to meet the tasks of the day.

Serve Grape-Nuts every day. Try substituting it for other foods—especially the heavier, less digestible dishes—and notice the result!



If you have never tried Grape-Nuts you will find the taste deliciously different. Its crisp, crunchy kernels—its rich, full flavor—will stimulate your appetite and add a zest to the whole meal.

Four sample packages of Grape-Nuts together with booklet of 101 recipes are yours for the asking. Mail the coupon below. The Postum Cereal Company, Inc., Battle Creek, Mich. The Dentist tells us to "eat more crisp, hard foods" because they keep our teeth and gums healthy.

The Doctor tells us that these foods are vital because by chewing them we start digestion in the mouth, where it should start.

The crisp, crunchy kernels of Grape-Nuts fill a real need in the diet—for children especially, who always will bolt soft foods. It teaches them to chew their food properly, helps to develop healthy teeth and gums, and aids digestion.

NEW WAYS OF COOKING VEGETABLES

ASPARAGUS SALAD

1 pint asparagus
1 pimiento
Paprika
2 green onions
Salt

Cut tender asparagus into one-inch lengths. Cook until they are tender. Drain them and chill. Slice the onions very thin. Shred the pimiento. Mix the whole and add salt and paprika. Serve in lettuce cups with golden dressing.

GOLDEN DRESSING

Yolks 2 hard-cooked eggs
1 tablespoon lemon-juice
⅓ cup salad oil
1 tablespoon vinegar
½ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon mustard

Put the egg-yolks through a sieve. Mix the other ingredients and beat them gradually into the yolks. Place a spoonful on the salad and sprinkle with paprika.

STUFFED GREENS

Prepare about two pounds of greens and cook until they are tender. Drain them, chop them fine and add salt, pepper and butter to taste. There should be one quart of greens after they are chopped. Put one-half of the greens on a greased baking-pan and flatten them with a spoon to form a layer. Cover with a layer of stuffing about one inch in depth. Cover with the remainder of the greens, flattening the top layer to cover the stuffing. Place three thin slices of bacon across the top. Bake in a moderate oven (350 degrees Fahrenheit) for twenty minutes. Serve on a hot platter surrounded with horse-radish or cheese sauce.

STUFFING

1 cup fine dry bread-crums
½ cup cold ham
1 tablespoon butter
Salt
Pepper
1 tablespoon chopped onions
1 teaspoon horse-radish sauce
Crushed tomato, canned or fresh, to moisten.

Mix thoroughly. Serve with boiled tongue either fresh, smoked or pickled.

DAFFODIL CAKES

1 cup sifted cooked carrots
⅓ cup sugar
Juice and grated rind of 1 lemon
Salt
¼ cup ground almonds
1 tablespoon melted butter
2 eggs beaten separately

Mix all the ingredients thoroughly except the whites of the eggs. Beat the whites until they are stiff and fold them into the mixture. Line small patty-tins with a good plain pastry. Fill with the mixture and bake, until it is firm, in a moderate oven.

CREAM OF SPRING VEGETABLE SOUP

2 medium-sized carrots
1 medium-sized white onion
1 cup medium white sauce
2 tablespoons butter
White pepper
2 medium-sized potatoes
1 cup small green peas
1 pint white stock, either veal or chicken
Salt

Cut the carrots and potatoes into match-like strips. Slice the onion and fry it in the butter until it becomes a light yellow. Cook the carrots, potatoes and onions in boiling water until they are tender. Cook the peas uncovered in a small amount of water. Add them to the other vegetables. Add the hot sauce and the stock. Salt and pepper to taste. Serve in hot soup-plates with a teaspoon of whipped cream sprinkled with finely minced parsley as a garnish.

VEGETABLE PLATE

New potatoes
Young beets
Green peas
Asparagus fritters

Select small potatoes, cook them until they are tender, drain them and brown them in a small amount of fat, shaking the pan often to make them alike in color. Cook the peas, add salt, pepper and butter to taste. Cut the cooked beets in thin strips, add salt, pepper, butter and a little grated cheese. Garnish with thin rings of hard-cooked egg.

SPRING TOAST

Cut green onions into one-half inch pieces, using the entire top of the onions. Cook these uncovered in very little water until they are tender. Drain them, add salt, pepper and butter to taste. Serve on rounds of hot buttered toast and garnish with chopped hard-cooked egg-whites.

ASPARAGUS FRITTERS

1½ cups flour
½ teaspoon salt
1 cup asparagus cut in small pieces
3 teaspoons baking-powder
¾ cup milk
1 egg

Mix and sift the dry ingredients. Add the milk gradually and then the well-beaten egg. Stir the asparagus into the batter. Drop the mixture by spoonfuls into the deep fat. Drain on paper. Serve with pimiento sauce.

SUGGESTIONS FOR VEGETABLE SALADS

Any kind of cold cooked greens seasoned with salt, pepper, lemon-juice and minced onion to taste. Chopped green peppers or pimiento may be added. Press the mixture into small slightly greased molds. Chill them and then remove the greens from the molds. Garnish with thinly sliced red radishes. Serve with mayonnaise dressing.

Green-and-white salads are particularly good for Springtime. These may be made from watercress and small green onions or hard-cooked egg-whites with watercress and French dressing.

The white meat of chicken finely diced with green peas set in a gelatin mixture tinted green with spinach-juice or vegetable coloring is excellent served on lettuce with white mayonnaise dressing.

which are very long lived, do not rust, and run in cost about half-way between copper and iron. Generally speaking, there is nothing better than copper, however. The extra cost for a small house is about $30.

Question 16—Is insulating walls very expensive?

Answer—It costs from $100 up to properly insulate a house, which is then easier to heat and more comfortable to live in.

Question 17—Is fireproofing a house costly?

Answer—No. Fire-stopping means that in all the walls and partitions stops, preferably of materials that will not burn, are placed; and these, by removing all the free air-passages, do not allow fire to travel up inside the walls of the partitions. With such fire-stopping the house is also rat-proof. The most this will probably cost is $100.

Question 18—Are casement windows much more expensive than the ordinary kind?

Answer—There is little or no difference. Casement windows are often much more attractive than the more ordinary kind. They give you, also, twice the size opening for air; but they bring up certain difficulties in the way of screens and curtains that should be taken into consideration.

Question 19—How much does it cost to put heating-pipes inside the plaster when building? And what are the benefits of it?

Answer—It should cost no more than the ordinary way of installing them. Uncovered pipes are unsightly, but outside of this covered pipes have no advantage.

Question 20—When plastering is being done, how much more does it cost to put set-in bookcases flush with the wall?

Answer—It does not cost any more. If you stick to the simple types, you can even save money by having them built in rather than by buying separate ones.

Question 21—What is the usual cost of cedar-lining a clothes-closet?

Answer—It costs about $25.

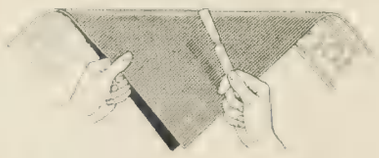
A Complete House Cleaning SERVANT

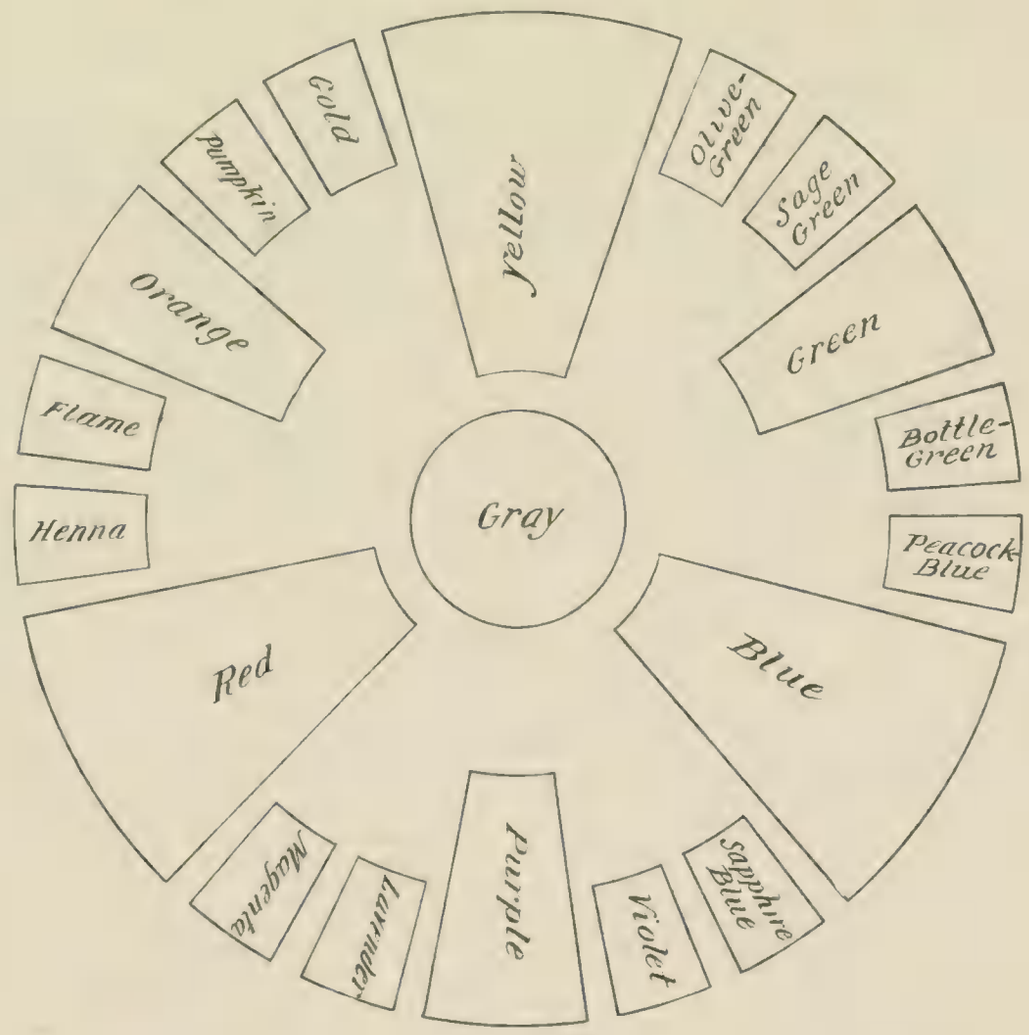
Another laborious housecleaning confronts you. Once again, you must make the choice between dirt —and a Hoover. You can't have both, so which shall it be? Shall your rugs continue to be a hiding place for the dirt that only beating will dislodge? as you can prove*.... Or will The Hoover eliminate the semi-annual housecleaning, by keeping your rugs immaculate the year through—beaten, swept and suction-cleaned, electrically? Shall dust accumulate in the "hard-to-reach" places? Or will you keep your home dust-free with Hoover powerful suction and the new swivel-jointed air-cleaning tools that lock tightly together in a jiffy? There can be only one answer. So don't delay! Let your Authorized Hoover Dealer deliver a Hoover today, complete with attachments. All he will ask is $6.25 down. The balance is payable in easy monthly installments.

CLEANS



Rugs, stair carpets, draperies, upholstered furniture, under beds, beneath and behind radiators, over ledges and mouldings, behind books on shelves, mattresses, clothing, interiors of closed automobiles — and wherever dirt and dust collect.

The HOOVER



It BEATS ... as it Sweeps as it Cleans

*TO PROVE RUGS NEED BEATING: Turn over a corner of a rug; with the handle of an ordinary table-knife, or something of equal weight, give the under or warp side 15 to 25 sharp taps and watch the dirt dance out from the nap depths onto a piece of paper. Feel the destructive character of this grit. This is the dirt only beating will dislodge. Correct use of The Hoover causes this embedded dirt to be vibrated to the surface by the rapid, gentle tapping of the Hoover brush, as powerful suction lifts the rug from the floor and draws all the dirt into the dust-tight bag

HOW TO CHOOSE COLOR

By Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders

Editor, Department of House Decoration

THE problem of choosing correct color for the home is so closely allied with the choosing of furnishings that a knowledge of one without the other is of little value. With the right use of color, or color combinations, the most modest of homes can be made interesting—even charming—regardless of how meager or simple the other factors in it may be. The average home-maker is constantly striving for decorative effects and color schemes that are in good taste and please the eye, realizing that the general effect of a well-proportioned room furnished with fine objects, can be completely spoiled by the wrong use of color.

For expert advice on any matter of house decoration—a rug, a rocking-chair or a room—consult Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York

IN ORDER that one may appreciate and understand the importance of color and color combinations, one must have a knowledge of the principles which govern color harmony. To assist the home-maker in obtaining color harmony with different combinations of colors, we have prepared a chart which will prove a helpful reminder and valuable assistant in the choosing and blending of paint, paper, fabrics and objects.

If one were to choose from a color chart the brightest and most intense colors, he would pick red, blue and yellow, the three primary colors. These colors in their pure and unadulterated state stand out clearer than all others, and by mixing the three in various ways every known color can be obtained. Mixing all three primary colors in equal proportions gives the color gray. By mixing any two of the three primary colors in equal proportions one would get what is known as a complementary or secondary color. For example, the chart shows that mixing blue and yellow will make green, the complementary color to red; yellow and red produce orange, which is the complementary to blue; red and blue produce violet, the complement of yellow. Mixing equal parts of a primary color and its complement—for example, blue and orange—will give gray. Should the proportions be unequal, the predominating color of the two will be softened in tone, grayed, or neutralized.

ALL primary and secondary colors can be brought into harmony by "graying," but neither can be considered harmonious combined in their pure state. Grayed colors in connection with house decoration are very important, as the pure primary and secondary colors should be used sparingly. Grayed colors are sometimes referred to as third-degree colors, or colors of the third mixing.

To make a color more gray or neutral, add some proportion of its complement to it. This rule will assist in the mixing of paint or choosing of fabrics if you are in doubt as to whether it is too bright or not bright enough. The more a color is grayed the larger amount of it may be used, and as complementary colors are increasingly grayed as they diverge from the center color and become more and more appropriate for use in the home, taking one section of the chart one may see that it is safe to use large areas of the grayed colors, or colors of the third mixing, while less should be used of the complementary colors and still less of the primary colors. For example, the complementary color green when grayed gives us olive green, excellent for rugs, etc., in a room with tan-colored walls. Small amounts of either clear blue or yellow in sofa-cushions, lamp-shades, pottery, etc., would give life and individuality to the room.

CERTAIN colors advance certain effects, and it is well to remember which colors to use to create warmth or coolness, as may be desired. Rooms facing north or east require the use of warm, cheerful colors, while those having a southern or western exposure should have cool colors. Red is warm, brilliant, fiery and irritating if used in large quantities; yellow is warm, light and cheerful, but glaring if used in large quantities; blue is cool, quiet and light-absorbing in large quantities; green is cool and creates lightness or darkness, depending on the color used. Orange is warm, typifying the sun, heat and brilliancy, and should be used only in small quantities. Purple is warm or cool, depending on the accompanying colors, and typifies mystery and elegance; use sparingly.

The following color scheme is an example of the different color combinations which may be used in furnishing the living-room, halls and dining-room:

Walls—Gold-and-blue paper, buff paint or tint.

Woodwork—Walnut or ivory paint.

Floor Covering—Tan, or blue-and-tan figured rug or linoleum.

Furniture—In walnut, upholstered in blue, or blue-and-gold velours or damask.

Overdraperies—Old-blue velours or damask.

Glass-curtains—Écru net or light-gold silk.

Lamp-shade—Gold, lined in old rose.

Accessories—In old rose, burnt orange or gold.

Additional color schemes and suggestions will be furnished upon request.

The walls of this interesting room are a soft amethyst with a gray cast, the mantel is of gray stone and the woodwork gray. The rich amethyst damask curtains are shot with a design in magenta, and the carpeting is gray.

Against this effective background are placed the Kroehler Davenport and Chairs upholstered in sage green with green damask cushions. The ginger jars on the mantel shelf repeat the strong color note of deep red purple or magenta. The lamp shades of green-gold silk are edged with narrow bands of magenta and black. The oriental rug has a green background harmonizing with the davenport.

A number of equally effective color schemes are suggested in the "Kroehler Book of Living Room Arrangements," sent free on request.

The Invisible Bedroom

The convenience of an extra bedroom without extra cost

THE younger generation knows to the fullest extent the meaning of the word comfort. It lives smartly and well—yet it wastes no time or money on traditional "extras" whose cost is out of proportion to their value.

To these young moderns the seldom-used extra bedroom is an unnecessary extravagance. Why not, they say, save the extra rent, the extra time that the care of such a room necessitates, for other things!

So they select for their living rooms or sunrooms a Kroehler Suite, with a low, soft-cushioned davenport in which a full-width, luxuriously comfortable bed is concealed. No one would guess that beneath the loungy davenport seat is hidden a convenient sleeping space, with strong, yielding springs and thick, soft mattress. A single easy motion opens this extra bed whenever it is needed, revealing covers all in place, the bed ready for immediate use.

Is it at all surprising that thousands of families, in crowded homes or small apartments, have chosen this modern way to save space and rent?

You, too, can enjoy the comfort which Kroehler Living Room Furniture is giving them. You can choose an interesting period design or a soft-cushioned overstuffed pattern, with deep, comfortable chairs and handsome davenport, with or without a concealed bed. You can have this furniture in fine wood finishes or in painted finishes to match any scheme of decoration. For upholstery, there are all the good-looking, long-wearing fabrics that fashion approves—silk damask, tapestry, mohair, jacquard velours, Chase Velmo or Baker Cut Pattern Velour, leather or Chase Leatherwove.

Important hidden qualities

Kroehler Living Room Furniture has frames of kiln-dried hardwood; seat springs of heavy, high-carbon wire, flexibly interlocked; filling of germ-cured flax fiber, best moss and cotton. Seat cushions are filled with fine wire coil springs, padded with clean, white, felted cotton; the all-steel folding bed frame is fitted with sagless cable fabric and helical springs. The upholstery is given moth-proofing treatment.

Dealers everywhere sell Kroehler Davenport Beds and Suites for cash or on easy payments. Be sure the name plate is on the back of each piece. If you do not know where to find Kroehler Davenports—with or without concealed beds—and matching chairs, write us for the dealer's name and the "Kroehler Book of Living Room Arrangements."

Address Kroehler Mfg. Co., Chicago, or Stratford, Ontario. Factories at Kankakee, Ill., Bradley, Ill., Naperville, Ill., Binghamton, N. Y., Dallas, Texas, Los Angeles, Calif., San Francisco, Calif. Canadian Factory, Stratford, Ontario.

Prevent this

(Good looks ruined by unhealthy teeth)

MANY diseases that bring premature old age are traceable to teeth. Dreaded rheumatism, heart disease and other infirmities that ruin health and beauty can be directly caused by tooth infections.

Prevention of tooth decay is vital to health and beauty. Cleanliness is the most effective method.

Bad Teeth Destroy Beauty and Health

Authorities Call Tooth Care Surest Treatment for Good Looks

Use Colgate's—

It removes causes of tooth decay

GOOD TEETH are as necessary to good looks as pretty eyes and a lovely complexion. And good teeth are more necessary to good health than they are to beauty. Today dental science, through preventive dentistry, is trying to save teeth from decay—to prevent infections that may destroy your health and happiness. Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream is closely allied with this move for better teeth and better health.

"Washes"—does not scour

Colgate's is a preventive dentifrice—safe, effective, and pleasant to use because of its delightful taste. It removes causes of tooth decay by the gentle "washing" action of its non-gritty chalk and tasteless soap. These are the two ingredients that authorities say are most important in a dentifrice.

Of course there are no curative claims for Colgate's. No tooth paste or powder can cure. That is a dentist's function. Colgate's keeps your teeth clean, and cleanliness is the best preventive measure known.

Colgate's is free from grit and harsh drugs. It is sensibly made, sensibly advertised and sold at a sensible price—25c for the large tube, at your favorite store.

SAVE DOLLARS AND HOURS

Hints from successful housewives

If you have discovered some clever little way to save time or labor or fuel or food or anything else connected with housekeeping, tell us about it—and if we can use it in these columns we will pay you five dollars for it. Write on only one side of the paper and address your letter to The "Savers" Editor, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. (If you wish to have your suggestion returned in case we can not use it, please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope.)

SAVE THE SAVERS

I have a large book in which I classify the saving hints found in THE DELINEATOR. My friends have access to this book and it is in constant use.—MRS. C. E. D., San Diego, Calif.

USE THE PILOT LIGHT

During the Summer months I save considerable gas by keeping a kettle of water over the self-lighter during the hours when the gas-stove itself is not in use. A kettle of water placed over the lighter at night is warm enough to use in the morning.—A. K., Milwaukee, Wis.

SAVE THE ICE-CREAM FREEZER

My mother was able to use the same ice-cream freezer for fifteen years. Its usefulness was prolonged by painting the bucket once each year. This not only preserved the wood, but kept the hoops from getting rusty. —MRS. A. C., New Orleans, La.

A TUCK-AWAY TABLE FOR THE PORCH

To provide a convenient table for writing and other uses on the porch of the Summer cottage I took a small bread-board and hinged it to the porch railing. A leg attached provided a support when the table was in place, and when not in use the table could be dropped close to the railing. It was but a little work to stain this useful table so that it harmonized with the color of the porch.—MRS. F. L. H., Cranford, N. J.

A NEW KIND OF TOAST

When making toast, you will find it is a delightful variation if you place two slices of buttered bread together and then toast the outside of the two slices. They will become crisp while the center of the sandwich will be hot and delicious, the butter having melted. —MRS. F. R. Q., Long Beach, Calif.

GROW YOUR OWN FLAVORINGS

Herb vinegar gives a delicious flavor to salad dressing. From a five-cent package of mixed herb seed sewn in the garden many different kinds will be available to the housekeeper. Tarragon, sweet basil, chervil, or a combination of several, such as thyme, savory, marjoram and sage, can be used. Crush the leaves and cover them with a good cider vinegar. Let this stand until it is fairly strong. Then add a little of it to the other vinegar or to the lemon-juice when you make salad dressing.—I. M., Jeffersonville, Vt.

TO KEEP BREAD FROM MOLDING

If a loaf of bread begins to show signs of becoming moldy, hold each side over the gas flame for a moment. The heat will kill the spores, but it will not dry out the bread to any extent.—MRS. A. F. B., Los Angeles, Calif.

SAVE THE ICE-PAN

If a housewife must keep a pan under her refrigerator to catch the melted ice, she may be glad to know how to keep this pan from rusting. By pouring melted paraffin over the bottom and sides of the pan when it is new rust can be prevented, as the water does not touch the pan.—MRS. G. B. S., Danville, Ill.

SAVE WASHING THE WINDOW-SILLS

I find that by waxing my white window-sills they are always kept looking their best and are protected from dust, dirt and rain. I wipe them with a dry cloth two or three times a week, and it is seldom necessary to wash them.—MRS. H. J. H., Chicago, Ill.

AN EASY WAY TO MAKE A BED COMFORTER

To make a bed comforter when ordinary 27-inch calico is used, cut each of the three strips necessary for the width five yards long and sew them together. Fold this large piece and sew it as if you were making a pillow-case. Place it on a bed, leaving the wrong side out and lay the batting—or whatever you are using for a filling—on, pinning it to the upper side so as to keep it smooth. Two persons, one at each side of the opening, can then roll the upper side over the batting and the under side down into a roll, which will make a roll at the closed end of the cover with the right side out.

Lay the roll on a couch, two chairs, a table, the bed, or some other convenient place, unroll it a short distance and tack the batting and cover together, taking out the pins as you go along. Continue to unroll and tack it until the open end is reached. Finish this by turning the raw edges under and sewing the folded edges together on the sewing-machine. Use a long stitch. Then the comforter can be easily opened when the covering is to be washed.

To wash, untack the covering from the batting, unroll the batting, wash the covering, and replace in the same manner as before.—MRS. M. T., Riddle, Ore.

SAVE VEGETABLES

When canning by the cold-pack method, it sometimes is difficult to have enough vegetables to fill all the jars the canner will hold. Fill the extra jars with materials for soup stock, such as onions, carrots, the outer leaves of celery, parsley and a few beans. The process is the same as in canning other vegetables, and in the Winter these vegetable mixtures, with bits of cold beef, gravy and rice added, will furnish a delicious soup.

As some members of the family do not care for carrots and turnips, I cut these vegetables into large pieces and remove them before making the soup. They are then used as a separate vegetable the following day.—MRS. J. H. B., Watertown, S. Dak.

SAVE BUTTERING BISCUITS

If the biscuit dough is rolled quite thin and then folded over, or if one roll is placed on the other before the biscuits are cut and then well buttered, cut and baked, the biscuits will split very uniformly and very little butter is necessary when they are eaten. Biscuits are quite as good if the dough is kept in a refrigerator for half an hour before it is baked.—J. B., Miami, Fla.

SAVE SPACE IN THE CAR

Last Summer we took many all-day trips in our car and had the problem of storing our lunch in the smallest possible space. I bought a large tin bread-box with several shelves and a door opening from one side. The food kept in place much better than when it is placed in a basket. This box also provides a seat for a small child where he could be very comfortable.—MRS. M. D., Gardenville, N. Y.

SAVE TIME WHIPPING CREAM

A double boiler may be useful when cream is to be whipped. Ice mixed with salt should be placed in the bottom compartment and the cream should be poured into the top of the boiler. The cream is thus quickly chilled and whips more easily. After it is whipped, the double boiler may be placed in the refrigerator until the cream is needed.—MRS. E. B., Hanceville, Ala

"Eagle Brand started him on the road to health"

LELAND KENDALL SILVER
Son of Mr. & Mrs. Kendall Silver 477 North University Ave.
Provo, Utah

THIS straight-backed, wide-awake little fellow is Leland Kendall Silver. At the time this photograph was taken he was only eight months old.

To women who are struggling with infant feeding problems, Mrs. Silver says, "I am offering this testimonial for the benefit of any mother who might be having the same trouble as I.

"Borden's Eagle Brand may be given credit for starting our little son on the road to health. Since the time he was six weeks old Eagle Brand has been his diet. We tried many different foods but none seemed to agree with him."

In sixty-five years Eagle Brand has given a million such babies as Leland Silver a sound foundation for future health. For Eagle Brand more nearly resembles mother's milk than any other baby food. If you cannot nurse your baby, or if he is not thriving, start him on Eagle Brand and the road to health at once.

Eagle Brand is pure, whole milk and refined sugar, combined according to a special Borden formula. It has all the necessary food essentials for healthy growth, including all the vitamins. The method of combining makes it exceptionally digestible. Even the most delicate baby stomach can assimilate it. It is always the same—clean, safe, uniform—and you can get it anywhere.

You will want to know about other Eagle Brand babies too, so write for our new book, What Other Mothers Say. In addition to pictures of the babies with their mothers' stories, this book contains feeding charts for infants up to 1 year and for children from 1 to 2 years.

If you wish general information on the care of your baby, send for Baby's Welfare, an authoritative book written for you by a physician.

ASK THE DELINEATOR

We are glad to offer our readers the following services; and we hope they will have no hesitation in consulting our department experts on any personal or household problem. Be sure (1) to address your inquiry to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.; (2) to give us your return address; (3) to enclose the cost of the pamphlet or other literature (in each case a minimum amount fixed to cover cost of printing and postage)

Babies and Children—In its Happy Child Department, THE DELINEATOR offers mothers the medical advice of nationally known baby and child specialists.

The following pamphlets, which are reprints of articles that have appeared in THE DELINEATOR, may be had for ten cents each: "The Expectant Mother and the New Baby," by Dr. Ralph Lobenstine; "The General Care of the Baby," "Maternal Nursing," "Artificial Feeding" and "Diet Problems of Childhood" (four separate booklets), by Dr. L. Emmett Holt; "Early Childhood," by Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw; "The Mental Health of the Child," by Dr. Thomas W. Salmon; "The School Child," by Dr. William Palmer Lucas; "The Child's Teeth," by Dr. Harvey J. Burkhart; "Three Dread Diseases of Childhood: Diphtheria (by Dr. William H. Park), Tuberculosis (by Dr. L. Emmett Holt), Diabetes (by Dr. Henry Rawle Geyelin)," and "Play, Eyes and Movies," by Dr. Ward A. Holden and Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw. There is also a treatise on "Correct Posture," by Dr. Alan De Forest Smith, to be had for ten cents; and a cloth-bound "Baby's Record Book," by Dr. Bird T. Baldwin, which costs one dollar.

Housekeeping—The Home-Making Department has more helpful leaflets than can be listed here. Write for a list of subjects. Ask any question that troubles you in your household management. Always send a self-addressed, stamped envelope for reply.

Building and Decoration—If you want to build, write for pictures of all Donn Barber's model houses, costing you only two cents for return postage. Then for one dollar you may order a print of floor-plans and elevations of the house you decide upon.

Ask Mrs. Sanders, the editor of this department, about furnishing and decorating (not more than five questions at one time, please). Be sure to give dimensions, exposure and full description of rooms—and a two-cent stamp for reply.

Special bulletins, "Good Floors," "Curtains and Draperies," "Walls, Woodwork and Ceilings," "Furnishing the Home" and "How to Choose, Frame and Hang Your Pictures," may be had for twenty-five cents each.

Beauty and Health—You can improve your appearance with a little time and careful study. The Beauty Editor will answer personal questions and send folders prepared by experts on the care of the skin, hands and hair, on lotions and cosmetics. These folders are free. Tell us which you want. Be sure to enclose postage.

Etiquette—Don't make social blunders. Mrs. John Cabot Kimberley will answer any personal quandary or send you instructive leaflets on the various phases of etiquette. Some of the most popular are: "Courtesies of To-day between Men and Women," "Introductions, Invitations and Replies," "Entertaining," "Travel," "House Weddings," "Etiquette at the Table," "Letter-Writing," "Calls and the Use of Cards." These leaflets cost you nothing but the postage, which should be estimated at two cents for three folders.

Entertainment—If you're planning fun for the children, send for our "Let's Give a Jackie Coogan Party."

How old are you? Here are Birthday Parties for everybody with fascinating ideas for decorating the cake, and favors you can make, and everything. And don't forget the charming Birthday Dance.

ASK US

Ask us anything you want to know about housekeeping and we will answer it personally. From our recent correspondence we publish the following questions and answers as being of general interest to all home-makers

QUESTION: When I poach eggs, they always stick to the dish and I lose a great deal of the egg in this way. Can this be prevented?

Answer: If you grease the pan or rings in which you poach your eggs, a thin film of fat will then come between the egg and the pan and thus prevent them from sticking. Another method of poaching eggs is to drop them into greased glass or porcelain ramekins set in hot water. Cream may be added and a bit of grated cheese; or the white and yolk may be separated and the yolk dropped into the center of the beaten white.

Question: One of my friends has recommended the use of baking-soda and salt in an aluminum pan for cleaning silver. It seems to work beautifully for her, but will it injure twenty-year plated ware?

Answer: If you measure the salt, soda and water and use exactly one tablespoon of salt and one tablespoon of soda to each quart of water and have the aluminum pan bright and shiningly clean, the chemical action of this solution on the silver will be practically harmless.

Add the salt and soda to the hot water and have the silver ready to put in the water at once and allow it to boil in the solution.

After cleaning by this method, silver should be washed in hot soapy water, rinsed and dried by vigorous rubbing with clean soft dry cloths. This method of cleaning silver does not give a soft, satiny finish nor quite the same finish that some of the polishes do.

Question: Whenever I fry croquettes in deep fat, they crumble and fall apart. I can not make them successfully. Can you help me?

Answer: The white sauce used in making croquettes is very important. It should be very thick—almost pastelike. Five tablespoons of flour to a cup of milk is the right proportion to use. A cup of this should be used with two cups of the finely divided food. Croquettes may be fried more satisfactorily if they are mixed and shaped when cold.

Careful crumming and egging of the croquettes is essential. The egg cooks quickly in the fat and gives a firm crusty coating which holds the croquettes together. In crumming croquettes, use only two tablespoons of water to each egg and beat the egg only enough to blend the white and yolk together. Each croquette should be coated first with finely ground crums, next with the egg and finally with the crums again.

After they are crummed, croquettes should be allowed to stand for several hours to dry out. If too much moisture is present, the heat changes it into steam, which expands and breaks through the outer coating and causes the croquette to fall to pieces.

Perhaps you do not have the fat at the right temperature. If the fat is not hot enough, the croquette may become fat-soaked and fall apart. If possible, use a thermometer and have the fat from 340 to 380 degrees Fahrenheit. This temperature will brown a crum of bread in about one minute.

Question: I have often wished I had an iron skillet, and so finally I purchased one. The first time I used it the food had a very disagreeable flavor, which seemed to come from the iron. Is there anything I can do to make the skillet fit for use?

Answer: It is a general custom to prepare a new iron utensil for use by rubbing it thoroughly with unsalted fat and baking it thoroughly. It should then be washed in a solution of washing-soda followed by soapsuds and rinsing. Treated in this way, your skillet should give you no further trouble.

FILM the worst enemy to teeth

You can feel it with your tongue

The charm of your smile depends upon the clean, pearly brightness of white teeth

Now Find Out

what beauty is beneath the dingy film that clouds your teeth

Note how simple it really is to have the clear, glistening teeth you envy in others—for health's sake and for beauty, you must remove that film, say world's dental authorities. Send the coupon, make this unique test

MODERN science has found a new way to healthier teeth; to whiter, clearer teeth. Now, as an international movement, the people of some 50 different nations are being offered a 10-day test.

Won't you mail the coupon below? Then see for yourself what as little as 10 days of modern dental hygiene will do for you.

Your teeth may be cloudy—film-covered, discolored. If your present dentifrice fails to cope with that situation, it is surely worth while to try, at least, another way.

That stubborn film—how it makes teeth ugly and invites tooth troubles and decay. You must remove it

Look at your teeth. If dull, cloudy, run your tongue across them. You will feel a film. That's the cause of the trouble. You must remove it regularly. It is ever present, ever forming.

Film is that viscous coat that you feel. It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It hides the natural luster of your teeth.

It also holds food substance which ferments and causes acid. In contact with teeth, this acid invites decay. Millions of germs breed in it. And they, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

So dull and dingy teeth mean more than loss of good appearance. They may indicate danger, grave danger to your teeth.

New methods now that mean greater tooth beauty plus better protection from tooth troubles

Ordinary tooth pastes were unable to cope adequately with that film. Not one could effectively combat it. Harsh grit tended to injure the enamel. Soap and chalk were inadequate.

Now modern dental science has found two new combatants. Their action is to curdle film and then harmlessly remove it. They are embodied in a new type tooth paste called Pepsodent—a scientific method that is changing the tooth cleansing habits of the world.

To millions this new way has proved the folly of having dull and dingy teeth. The folly of inviting tooth troubles when their chief cause can be combated.

Canadian Office and Laboratories:

Make the test Remember, every time you eat, food clings to your teeth. Film is constantly forming. The film that ruins teeth; that mars their luster, makes them look dingy and dull. "For health's sake and beauty's sake, remove it three times daily," says leading dental authority.

This new way removes and combats it in scientific safety—it will give you the lustrous teeth you envy—quickly.

CARE OF FLOORS

By Ruth Kellogg

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the School of Home Economics, Cornell University

Spread a small amount of paste wax on a loosely knit cloth

Fit it over the metal shoe, which should set snugly over the weighted brush

Do floors "floor" you? Then read this helpful article which tells how to care for them, be they oiled, varnished, waxed or linoleum. And then perhaps you'd like to know some cleaning tools with which to keep them and the rest of your house spotless and in good condition. We've a list of useful helps sensibly divided into "essentials" and "desirables." A copy will go to you promptly and free of charge if you'll write to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., enclosing a stamped, self-addressed envelope.

A FLOOR, although well laid and well finished, may be a disappointment unless it is given the proper care. But the average woman wants a method for cleaning her floors that is economical of her time and strength.

Often floors are left in an unfinished condition for some time and dirt easily sinks into the unprotected wood. It usually takes a good hard scrubbing to remove it. For this purpose it is best to use a very long-handled scrub-brush or an old corn broom, as these save the housewife from getting down on her hands and knees.

The floor should be scrubbed first with warm soapy water and then rinsed with clear water with a mop which has been thoroughly wrung out. Water should not remain on any kind of a floor for any length of time, nor should it be used so freely as to flood the floor when it is cleaned. Such methods cause the wood to swell and perhaps later to soften and splinter.

Brush lengthwise along the boards, applying a thin film of wax to the floor

MOP—DON'T SCRUB—AN OILED FLOOR

OILED floors should be mopped—not scrubbed—when water is necessary to remove the dirt. But until the floor reaches this stage, clean it, after it has been thoroughly swept, by going over it with an oiled mop. When water is necessary to clean the floor, use only clear warm water or warm soap-suds made from a mild soap. Follow this with a quick rinse of clear water. If the water is hard and has to be softened, use as little of the softening or breaking agent as possible, because the alkali in it will remove the oil from the floor.

Sometimes a floor has been so poorly oiled in the first place or so neglected afterward that it grows grimy or perhaps streaked with the oil which has settled more thickly in some spots than in others. In such a case it is best to remove this oil and dirt by a thorough scrubbing and then start the whole process over again. After the floor has dried very thoroughly the desired finish may be given—oil, varnish, shellac or wax, as the case may be.

Avoid the use of water on varnished floors, unless finished with a spar varnish as long as possible, because water tends to dull and discolor the ordinary varnishes.

WATER DULLS A VARNISHED FLOOR

VARNISHED floors may be satisfactorily cleaned with an oiled mop or with a chemically treated dust-mop. A chemically treated mop is not oily and is bought already prepared instead of being a home-prepared article. When the floor reaches the stage where the mop is no longer effective, go over the floor quickly with a mop wrung out of clear warm water or warm slightly soapy water. If the latter is used, rinse the floor afterward with clear water. In any case, be sure that the mop is wrung as dry as possible for the final wiping. If the floor looks dull, go over it with an oiled mop.

Chemically treated or oiled mops may be successfully used on painted floors for the daily cleaning. However, paint is much less sensitive to

Your family's health may depend on one simple precaution

Physicians and health authorities emphasize the importance of this new kind of cleanliness in the home

Your guests can feel the difference. Health-clean homes radiate an air of sunny well-being that mere soap and water cleanliness cannot give. Feel for yourself the difference in a health-clean home!

RECENTLY discovered facts about germs have made it possible for you to safeguard the health of your family more effectively than ever before. You can do it without extra effort or trouble.

It is now known that disease germs do not float long in the air. They settle upon all surfaces, where they live and multiply. They attach themselves to warm human hands which come in contact with these surfaces.

Thus the germs are carried from car straps to door knobs, from stair railings to tables and chairs. Often they are blown in open windows from dusty streets to floors and corners. With a microscope you could see them in swarms on the door jambs, door knobs, chair arms, hiding in crevices and cracks of your floors—a hundred places where hands, big and little, may touch.

Out-of-doors, fresh air and sunlight are effective disinfectants. But within the home other means of destroying the deadly germs must be utilized. Soap and water alone are not sufficient. They remove dirt but, as any physician will tell you, are powerless to kill germs.

A cleansing solution that also destroys germs

THERE is an effective method of killing germs—and this method health authorities now advise. Put a few drops of "Lysol" Disinfectant in the water every time and everywhere you clean. This solution destroys all harmful germs. Every nook and corner is left not only clean and sweet, but safe.

"Lysol" Disinfectant has three valuable properties that make it indispensable for the careful housewife: 1. It deodorizes. 2. It purifies. 3. Its soapy nature helps to clean as it disinfects.

You will be surprised to find how the "Lysol" solution helps you in cleaning white woodwork. Finger spots are disinfected and removed like lightning. Floors are cleaned, nickel and white tiling are polished. Your home is cleaned more quickly and effectively by the added help of these magic drops. And the "Lysol" solution will not hurt the most sensitive hands.

This simple precaution of adding "Lysol" to the water (a tablespoonful to a quart) for your daily cleaning, reduces the danger of illness in your family. They are freed from the menace of disease germs within the home. It is a protective health measure that should not be neglected.

Be sure you use the genuine "Lysol" Disinfectant. Your druggist has it. It is manufactured only by LYSOL, INC., New York. Sole Distributors: Lehn & Fink, Inc., New York. Canadian Agents: Harold F. Ritchie & Co., Ltd., McCaul Street, Toronto.

Each year over 2,500,000 new babies are born—

And each year more than half of these mothers choose exactly the same safe baby powder

AMERICA'S great child doctor—Dr. L. Emmett Holt—believed that the greatest weapon against disease is "not medicine, but knowledge."

His own exact knowledge of the proper care of children he spread in his famous baby books. So sound and helpful are these books that today there is hardly a mother who does not appreciate the deep seriousness of every detail of her baby's care.

Many of baby's troubles are skin deep. In the words of a famous skin specialist: "The delicate skin of a baby is very susceptible to the many irritating discharges which assail it." Next to careful cleansing the most important part in counteracting this irritation is powdering.

This knowledge makes more than half the two and a half million mothers each year insist upon the baby powder that they know is safe.

Physicians asked for it

This is Johnson and Johnson's Baby Powder. It was first made at the request of the medical profession. Because there was no such safe baby powder to be had, physicians came to the house they knew was equipped to prepare surgically clean products and asked them to make it.

In its great laboratories the baby powder is made according to physicians' formula. It is safe for baby's skin beyond any possibility of reproach—exquisitely fine, absolutely pure, healing, with a faint fragrance that preserves the adorable fresh sweetness of baby's skin all day long.

Johnson's Baby Powder purifies in a safe natural way the salty stinging effect of perspiration and damp diapers, so that the pores are always open and healthy. It prevents the infections caused by the moisture that gathers in the creases of baby's skin. This means freedom from pimples, blotches and rashes. It means comfort, quiet nerves, refreshing sleep.

A nurse has suggested this perfect way of putting him to sleep:

FIRST make your own hand soft as velvet with a thick coating of the fine white powder.

THEN gently massage the chubby limbs, smoothing the powder into all the folds and crevices—over every

Fresh from his bath—his skin all soft and fragrant roughened, irritated area. Your gentle rubbing lulls the nerves.

Not only do more than half of each year's mothers choose this safe powder but they use it year after year so that today Johnson's Baby Powder is used by more mothers than any other. Your own druggist carries it always.

To the mothers who have not yet solved the problem of the safe way to preserve baby's skin from irritation and the dangers of moisture, Johnson and Johnson are making a special free offer. Read about it in the box below and simply send in your name and address.

CARE OF FLOORS

water than ordinary varnish, so that wet mops may be freely used on floors with such a finish.

OIL SOFTENS A WAXED SURFACE

WAXED floors should not be cleaned with oiled mops as the oil softens the wax. Water, too, should not be used as it tends to dull and whiten the finish. However, a chemically treated dust-mop is entirely safe to use on a waxed floor and it is most effective. Under ordinary wear such a floor can be cleaned for a long time with this mop only. When the floor becomes really dirty, it can be wiped up quickly with a soft cloth wrung out of clear warm water or warm soapy water followed by a quick rinse with clear water. Then the floor should be rubbed up or polished again. Or instead of using water, a soft cloth moistened with a non-inflammable commercial cleaner may be used in wiping up the floor before it is re-waxed. A cloth moistened with turpentine or gasoline will also remove the upper part of the wax film, taking the dirt with it. Remember that these two fluids must be used away from any flame, and preferably when the doors into other rooms are closed and the windows in the room itself are opened.

STRONG SOAP IS BAD FOR LINOLEUM

LINOLEUM floors, although most often used in kitchens, are finding their way into other parts of the house. The manufacturers themselves give sound advice about the care of such floor coverings. But this injunction should be in every housekeeper's mental note-book: Do not under any ordinary circumstances scrub linoleums or use strong soaps, washing-powders or other strong alkalies in cleaning them. Scrubbing and alkalies take the pattern off printed linoleum. Such treatment roughens and dries out inlaid or battleship linoleum so that the dirt only sinks in deeper each time.

Printed linoleum (as well as paper floor coverings which are always printed) should be given two coats of varnish, preferably a good spar varnish, as soon as it is laid and cleaned. To clean it before varnishing, wipe it with clear warm water or warm soapy water in the way we described for cleaning painted floors. Let the linoleum dry for several hours, then varnish it, following the directions on the can. After this has been done clean it in the way given for any varnished floor. In washing linoleum, no matter what kind, take care not to flood the floor, as water underneath this kind of floor covering would rot the linolcum.

As soon as inlaid or battleship linoleum is laid and cleaned, it should be waxed. If it is only slightly soiled, clean it in the way indicated for printed linoleum. If it is badly soiled, it should be scrubbed (this scrubbing is the one exception to the general rule for linoleum) with warm water and a mild soap and rinsed with clear water. It should then be allowed to dry for several hours or overnight. After this, apply a small amount of wax, liquid or paste, rubbing it in thoroughly.

Some of the heavy battleship linoleums require about three thin coats of wax—each one carefully rubbed in—before a thin film remains on the surface, but one or two coats are generally sufficient for the usual inlaid or battleship linoleum. The wax should never be used in such quantities that it forms a heavy layer, because an unsightly floor that quickly collects dirt will be the result.

A weighted brush, ten to fifteen pounds in weight, which swings freely on its handle, greatly lessens the work of waxing. If in addition it has a metal shoe, the housewife may stand upright when applying the wax as well as when polishing the floor. The shoe fits snugly over the weighted brush and over the shoe there is a loosely knit cloth. Between the folds of this a small amount of paste wax is spread from time to time. This wax gradually feeds through the cloth to the shoe, and a thin film of wax is applied to the floor. Afterward the shoe can be removed and the bristle part of the brush with which to polish the floor can be exposed.

HEART TROUBLE IN CHILDREN

the heart just in the same way that the muscles of the arms or legs are strengthened with exercise. Controlling the child is, however, usually the chief difficulty. It is difficult for a boy who may feel perfectly well to understand why he can not run races and romp with the other boys, or for a girl to see why she should be prevented from jumping rope with her companions.

One of the chief differences between heart trouble in the child and in the adult is the fact that heart disease in the child occurs during the period of growth when the heart is increasing in size in proportion to the rest of the body. From the eleventh to the fifteenth year the growth of the heart is very rapid, in fact it almost doubles in size. This growth is necessary to supply blood to the rapidly developing and growing internal organs, muscles, and bones. We all know how active children are at this period and how hard they play. If the heart is sound and healthy it meets the great demands put upon it, but when the heart is diseased the demands of growth and play may be too much. A comparison may be made with a properly running automobile engine and one in which the valves are blocked with carbon. The good engine runs smoothly and, if occasion demands, can be speeded up. The poor engine on the other hand may get along somehow, but it can not be forced to do any additional work.

So it is with the child with heart disease. Growth and development at this period of life put just about as much strain upon the heart as it can stand. So particular care is necessary before and during adolescence in order to protect the child from overstrain. This is the time when so many children with heart trouble break down completely. It may be said as a general rule that children with heart trouble who pass beyond this age without breaking down may live, with ordinary care, many years of usefulness and activity. Of course, it is not easy to manage children at this period and to keep them happy while forbidding them to do many of the things that their friends and comrades are doing. However, this is a part of the care of children which only the parents and family can solve.

VARIOUS FORMS OF HEART TROUBLE

OCCASIONALLY other forms of heart disease are seen in children. One of the most important of these is the poisoning of the heart muscles in diphtheria, which causes a rapid and marked weakening of the heart. This can usually be prevented by the immediate use of diphtheria antitoxin as soon as a child develops the disease. Diphtheria, however, is a disease which can be prevented, as was pointed out by Dr. William H. Park in a previous article in this Happy-Child series, by immunizing the child against diphtheria by the use of a toxin-antitoxin mixture so that the disease will not be developed.

Occasionally an irregular action of the heart is encountered which may be significant. But frequently irregularities which are of no importance develop during childhood. These do not mean that the child has anything serious the matter with the heart, as many children show an irregularity of the pulse during breathing. While the air is being forced out of the lungs the rate of the pulse slows and when new air is taken in the rate becomes rapid.

Pain due to heart trouble is noticed in children only during acute cardiac disease, and then not when the disease is limited to the valves and the lining of the heart, but when the covering of the heart is also involved. Very frequently parents bring their child to "Let me see you do it"

THEY had been reading a magazine advertisement that made a very unusual claim for a certain product.

She was skeptical. He, having made the test once before, insisted that it was possible.

"Well, let me see you do it, if you can," she demanded. "I've used onions often enough in the kitchen, and I know how hard it is to get the odor off my hands."

So he produced a big, healthy Bermuda, proudly redolent in all its pungent glory. He sliced it in half and rubbed its oils carefully on both hands.

Then, as the advertisement challenged, he doused on some Listerine, the safe antiseptic, that possesses such remarkable deodorizing properties.

Even before the Listerine had quite evaporated, the onion odor had entirely disappeared.

If it had not been done right before her eyes, she would probably never have believed it.

Listerine is a remarkable deodorant. And Listerine advertising does not over-state the case.

That is why so many thousands use it daily to combat halitosis (unpleasant breath). And that is why so many thousands of women are coming to use it as a perspiration deodorant. They just apply it clear. It is non-irritating, refreshing, does not stain garments, and it does the work.

Listerine has dozens of other uses, all described in the circular that comes with every bottle.—Lambert Pharmacal Company, Saint Louis, U. S. A.

For HALITOSIS  use LISTERINE

LISTERINE Throat Tablets are now available. Please do not make the mistake of expecting them to correct bad breath. Rely on the liquid, Listerine. Containing all of the antiseptic essential oils of Listerine, however, they are very valuable as a relief for throat irritations—25 cents.

a physician for heart trouble because the little one complains of a pain over his heart. They say the child has been complaining of a sharp, stabbing pain in the left side that comes on while walking or running. Almost without exception this pain is caused solely by indigestion, usually the result of too much pastry, hot breads and candy.

HOW CAN HEART DISEASE BE PREVENTED?

UNFORTUNATELY medical science has not yet discovered a means of absolutely preventing heart disease. But a great deal can be done to alleviate it. Knowing that bad and infected tonsils are frequently the cause of rheumatism and heart disease, they should be removed if they are infected or if the child has recurrent attacks of tonsilitis. For the same reason, bad teeth or a badly infected nose should receive proper attention.

A child with rheumatism should be most carefully studied for the source of infection, as the disease is apt to recur; and with a second attack, heart disease may develop, if it has not already done so with the first. If a mild case of heart disease develops in the course of scarlet fever or rheumatism, with proper care, the heart may become sound during the next year or two. Moreover, if chronic heart trouble does develop, it is possible in the vast majority of cases to prevent the child from becoming a chronic invalid.

All too frequently children come to the physician or the hospital with serious heart trouble. The parents had not suspected the trouble until it had reached a point where little or nothing could be done. Every child should be examined from time to time by a physician, even if the youngster is well, just as mothers have learned to take their babies to the doctor or the clinic regularly to have the little ones weighed and looked over, without waiting until they are sick. If heart trouble is found in this way, the child's life can be adjusted to its strength and measures taken to prevent a strain upon the heart.

Children with heart disease should be under constant medical supervision so that the condition of the heart and its progress can be noted. In many cities, cardiac clinics have been established in connection with hospitals and dispensaries, where special supervision and training is given children with heart trouble, and where not only the heart is watched, but the child's nutrition and growth are carefully followed.

What is most essential in heart disease is to prevent the heart from breaking down for if this once occurs in a child, the outlook for the future is bad. Through proper treatment and living it is often possible to prevent such a breakdown and to enable the child with heart trouble to grow and develop into a normal, useful and happy individual.

his opponents, the officials under whom he plays and his game. He would give everything to win, but would not turn his finger for a victory that did not represent honest effort. He seeks no unfair advantage, and he will do nothing to bring discredit upon the game itself.

Sportsmanship is remarkably illustrated in the following verses, written by two seventeen-year-old Chicago boys, Tom Luparello and M. Sisulak, after the basket-ball team on which they were playing lost a championship by the narrowest of margins:

Dear Lord, in the battle that goes on through life,
I ask but a field that is fair,
A chance that is equal with all in the strife,
A courage to strive and to dare:
And if I should win, let it be by the code
With my faith and my honor held high;
And if I should lose, let me stand by the road,
And cheer as the winners go by.

And Lord, may my shouts be ungrudging and clear,
A tribute that comes from the heart,
And let me not cherish a snarl or a sneer
Or play any sniveling part;
Let me say, "There they ride, on whom are laurels bestowed,
Since they played the game better than I."
Let me stand with a smile by the side of the road,
And cheer as the winners go by.

So grant me to conquer, if conquer I can,
By proving my worth in the fray,
But teach me to lose like a regular man,
And not like a craven, I pray;
Let me take off my hat to the warriors who strode
To victory splendid and high,
Yea, teach me to stand by the side of the road,
And cheer as the winners go by.

You may be sure that those boys had given all they had to win, and that defeat was a bitter disappointment to them. You may be sure also that with such a spirit they are not going to have to "cheer as the winners go by" very often. They will be on the winning side in the big game of life.

A good sportsman is a good loser. I do not mean by that a cheerful loser. No red-blooded individual likes to be beaten. If he did, he would be on the losing side most of the time—beaten by somebody who was not so keen on taking the shorter end.

In life, as in sport, we can't all win all the time. There must be defeats and disappointments that will call for all the sportsmanship that one can muster. There will be bad "breaks," good plays gone wrong, injustice, and perhaps unfairness. Sportsmanship enables the individual possessing it to stand reverses, however. It enables him to learn from his defeats. It inspires him to fight all the harder to win. Best of all, if he has to go through life without achieving the material success that he believes he is entitled to, it enables him to have the satisfaction of knowing that he has played the game.

SPORTSMANSHIP is not primitive ethics. Boys and girls seldom inherit it. The customs of vacant-lot play and all sorts of unorganized competitions are usually at variance with it. The first instinct is often to win by whatever means may come to hand. Experience shows that children must be taught sportsmanship. They learn first that it is unprofitable to try to play unfairly, because the umpire will impose a penalty. Later they begin to realize that it is not only unprofitable in the material sense, but that it imposes the heavier penalty of sacrificing self-respect.

When team games are substituted for individual play, the lessons in sportsmanship take the form of showing that the group is more important than the individual, and that to succeed the player must be willing to submerge self-interest in favor of team interest. The most perfect self-realization comes through sinking one's self in the team. The satisfaction of having served is the finest satisfaction of all.

In all of my thirty years of coaching, I have always insisted that football's value to the players depends on the degree in which it fulfils certain requirements that have nothing at all to do with the technicalities of the game itself. It must impress the players and spectators alike that it is a means to an end, not an end in itself.

A football game is really two tests—the first is to prove which team is capable of playing the better game at a certain time; the second, and more important, is to prove which has been able to develop the higher degree of sportsmanship in its members and its partisans.

The Smartway long Bandeau on the figure at the right gives the straight bustline and flat-back effect so stressed this season. The DeBevoise Girdle at the left gives slim, graceful lines to the hips, lower diaphragm and thighs. Elastic inserts permit perfect fit in any position.

PARIS sponsors the Feminine Mode-DEBEVOISE gives the Approved Silhouette

THE mode moves slowly...surely...toward a new and more feminine beauty. Simplicity shows no signs of waning, but it has lost every trace of cold severity. It is a simplicity which is soft, subtle, full of imagination.

As the French would say, the mode of the moment requires quelque chose nouvelle in foundation garments. For the ideal silhouette must be slender and straight in repose, yet sway with carefree grace and lissomeness when in movement.

The House of DeBevoise, always closely in touch with the Grand Couturiers of Paris, have anticipated fashion's trend and designed special garments to mould your figure effectively into slim, jeune fille lines, at the same time permitting perfect ease and freedom of motion.

The Latest Importations

Whichever way one turns, there are indications galore of the changing mode. There is the circular flare that has crept into the skirts of so many smart models recently. There is the chic bit of fulness at the side...Milady seems to be blown forward on a breeze. At the House of Jenny one sees clinging spiral flounces which wind about the figure. Chez Patou there are curious limply falling draperies—and piquant little flounces whisked up jauntily at one side.

No matter what your individual figure requirements, there is a DeBevoise creation—brassiere, bandeau, corsette,* girdle or reducing garment of Secretex*—to give you without constraint or unwelcome pressure the graceful, flowing lines and slim silhouette that Paris sponsors.

DeBevoise foundation garments comprise dozens of timely models in all the fashionable fabrics. Every woman is assured of finding the exact garment for every occasion—from the simplest to the most formal. At the best shops you will find DeBevoise garments identified with a tiny label. The poise and assurance DeBevoise gives to clothes are priceless, yet prices are most moderate.

WOMAN suffrage, first recognized in Great Britain and the United States, is a logical development of sportsmanship. A respect and consideration for the right of the female sex was one of the impelling motives for granting it. Men saw that the condition of placing all the power of government in the hands of the men was fundamentally wrong. They realized that a very large percentage of the population was equally affected by the government without any representation in this government. Sportsmanship in affairs of State, sportsmanship in business, sportsmanship in the home!

The whole question of sportsmanship and its bearing on human relations is most admirably summarized by the English publicist, John Galsworthy, who writes:

"Sport, which still keeps the flag of idealism flying, is perhaps the most saving grace in the world at the moment, with its spirit of rules kept, and regard for the adversary, whether the fight is going for or against. When, if ever, the fair-play spirit of sport reigns over international affairs, the cat force which rules there now will slink away and human life will emerge for the first time from the jungle."

HE AND SHE

Concluded from page 12

For when he had reached the store that morning, Mr. Meddy had greeted him mournfully.

"Boy," he had said, "you saw how things are. You've offended her fierce. She's like a wet hen."

"I know. I'll—I'll go away, Mr. Meddy."

"I guess you'll have to, boy. 'Course, I could hold out—" he looked momentarily manly—"but it wouldn't be pleasant."

"No. It wouldn't be pleasant."

Rose, Violet, Violet, Rose—and Minnie. And wasn't Minnie treating him just exactly as Violet treated Mr. Meddy? Or anyhow, wasn't she making him just as miserable? Not only life but women were just the opposite of heaven.

This was what he was thinking as he polished glasses all alone, at four o'clock in the afternoon. Then the door opened, and there she was, both pale and glowing, both near and far.

She said: "Hello!"

"Hello—hello!"

"I'd like a Gum Arabic."

"Honest?"

"Why not?"

"But you'll have to help me make it!"

"Why not?"

Incomprehensible woman!

They worked together as before. And as before the sun surged through the room and the golden world flowed about them. Two casual mites, tossed up by a warm Spring afternoon.

"I'm going away," Elmer announced abruptly.

"Oh, why?"

"Well, I—I can do better for myself."

"You lost your job!"

"No—that is, I——"

"You did. You lost your job! I knew that woman had it in her!"

Elmer looked at her breathlessly.

"Look here," said Elmer. "Do you care if I lost my job?"

"Well, I made you lose it, didn't I? Of course I care."

"But do you care if I go away?"

She shrugged. "Not many good dancers at the Winter Palace."

But he looked at her, and he continued to look. So that now she drew out the metal case, and rouged the blush that was creeping.

"I'd go to any trouble to dance with a good dancer," she found a further defense.

"Listen," said Elmer. "Do you want me to stay?"

Suddenly voices—sharp, raucous, contentious. The stair door opened and Mrs. Meddy came in, tossing back words to Mr. Meddy, following:

"—about enough of this. I don't care who hears me. I'm sick of the whole business."

"Of me, Violet?"

Violet, Minnie, Minnie, Violet——

Toward Violet, Minnie suddenly swept. "Mr. Meddy," she said, "I'd like to meet your wife."

Her way was so charming that even Mrs. Meddy carried off the moment with something like ease.

And then Elmer heard:

"Mr. Meddy, I want to tell you. That was my fault last night, and I'm dead sorry. Elmer and I had only just met in the afternoon and, you see, we—yes. You know how it is."

The metal case was still in her hand. Standing there, so young and brave, Minnie made her confession and rouged her cheeks.

Vast in her henna gown, Mrs. Meddy looked at the girl. She looked in her eyes and met their amazing frankness. She looked over at Elmer, behind the soda grill, but him she disregarded utterly. Mr. Meddy was trying to say something, and him she disregarded, too. For a moment her look was locked with that of the girl. Then slowly Mrs. Meddy went down in the depths of a great bag, drew out a metal case of her own, and over her morning rouge she laid on an afternoon rouge.

"Don't say another word," said Mrs. Meddy. "Don't say another word."

Woman to woman they looked at each other. Woman to woman they admitted that love is to be believed in, whereas once one would have gibed and the other smirked and agonized. Woman before woman they touched on the rouge, though once they would have used it by stealth and then lied about it.

"And," said Minnie, "all the girls are coming in to have some of Elmer's Gum Arabics. And I've told them how he named the grill. You're going to have a frightful run!"

With all her new courage, an ancient astuteness still!

Mr. Meddy burst into the moment, with a masculine assertiveness. Somehow, he seemed to say, he and Elmer must get into this.

"I told you he was a batch o' brains," said Mr. Meddy.

Mrs. Meddy moved toward the door, as if all that there was to do had been done. Mr. Meddy followed his Violet out under the awning.

OVER Elmer swept a delicious agony which quivered to his fingers, mixing that Gum Arabic and concocting it with heaven knew what components. He called it finished, and came slowly round the marble counter. He set before her the foaming glass, without a spoon, and he spoke with all the moment trembling in his words.

"You did that to save me my job——"

She looked up as one who should say: Have I got to spell it?

"Didn't you?" he pressed it.

Some ancient wisdom kept her silent, though she looked so capable of speech.

"You want me to stay?" he cried.

Now she met his eyes as honestly as she had met the eyes of Mrs. Meddy, but her lips had lost nothing of the ways of the sphinx.

"You'll have to find that out," she said cryptically.

The store and the sun and the cherries and the sirups flowed round them. And from beyond the threshold, in the awning's shade, a voice sounded:

"—can't help what you say. You've simply got to get you a new suit of clothes."

Over Elmer swept not the tone of that voice, but only the exquisite intimacy of the words.

Rose, Violet, Violet, Rose—and if ever his Rose should tell him that!

"Oh, Rose!" he said. "Rose!"

"My name's not Rose," she said with asperity.

"Oh, yes, it is—Minnie," he answered rapturously.

FRAGRANCE OF LILACS

out to with the mind. Beyond was nothing but nothing, and that was infinity.

AND now Selina Sue was afraid. As she balanced on this last and most distant solar system, her slender arms wavering up and down as she maintained her precarious foothold there, she felt how cold and lonely the vast black void was, and she was afraid to leap into it. So near to infinity and so afraid to make this last and most necessary leap! She could feel her fingers beginning to tremble and her limbs growing cold. She could feel a tremendous agony of fear coming toward her.

And then she drew a deep breath and with it came the odor of heavy-scented lilacs, just such lilacs as grew so comfortably beside the veranda at home, and she leaped.

For a moment, or for a billion years, she floated blessedly in infinity, in an ecstasy of calmness and joy. She was lighter than a feather and more joyous than a bird that is breaking its breast with song. Infinity bathed her as she hung in it, and it was soft and gentle and warm and comforting and ecstatic and sweet with the warm odor of full-blown lilacs.

Selina Sue was not afraid, she was glad. With her eyes closed she seemed to be floating on a sea of sweetness that was over her and under her and all around her—a blessed, gentle, sweet-scented darkness that was better than any light or any solidity. And then——

"HOW delicious the lilacs are this evening," said her mother's voice. "I think you had better come in now, Selina Sue. It is getting too chilly for little girls in light dresses."

"Yes, mother," Selina Sue said obediently, and she evened her pantalets and smoothed her dress a little and drew a deep breath of the lilac-scented air and went into the house.

"I was just telling your mother," said the guest in the plum-colored dress, "that my little nephew is coming to us to stay. We hope you may be playmates together."

"Yes, thank you," said Selina Sue, pecking the sides of her wide skirt with her thumbs and forefingers and making a little courtesy. "Good night, all."

"Good night, Selina Sue," said "all," and Selina Sue went up to her bed like a good little girl, and no one knew where she had been, or ever did know, for it was not a thing to be told. Even when Edward came to live with the guest in the plum-colored dress and was her constant playmate, Selina Sue did not tell him of infinity. It was not a thing that could be told.

AND especially not to Edward. He was so entirely boy. He could give so little thought to anything that was not riding, or building something, or a game with running and, later, hunting with some killing in it.

Selina Sue was never quite sure that she understood Edward, especially when he reached the age when he was cultivating a mustache and was a man. He was a handsome fellow, but almost always he took Selina Sue's breath and frightened her for some reason she could not explain to herself. But this, she presently discovered, was not because Edward was Edward, but because he was a man. All men, she came to see, were like that. They liked hunting that had killing in it. She thought she saw that all men were cruel—all men worth anything. Where there were men, some one must suffer in some way, and often cruelly. Especially women. And Selina Sue was afraid, because she knew in her heart that she loved Edward better than she loved anything in the world. That was a thing she could not change—it was a thing nothing could change.

ONE evening she knew Edward would come, and she waited for him on the veranda. She had placed a cushion of braided straw on the top step close by one of the tall pillars, and she thought about what she would say to him. As the sky darkened she sat on the cushion and went over it all again, and was sure she was right.

He came up the walk in his new uniform—like every man he meant to do his part in this war between the States—and his stride was masterful.

"I knew you would be here," he said joyously. "You know what I'm going to say, too, Selina Sue, don't you?"

"Yes, I'm only too afraid I do know," she answered.

"Afraid? Then you don't know, or are pretending you don't, you little darling!" he laughed.

He seated himself close to her and would have put his arm around her, but she refused this gently.

"Selina Sue," he said, taking one of her hands—and she permitted that—"there's no use talking, you know how mighty much I love you. I love you more than a man ever loved a woman, I do believe! And you know it, Selina Sue. I want you to marry me."

"No," Selina Sue said. "No——"

"But 'no' has nothing to do with it," he laughed. "You're off on the wrong track this time, Selina Sue."

"No," she said again, and she was trembling. "And please don't urge me, Edward dear. Please don't make it harder for me. Because it will be no mortal use. I've made up my mind—I'm never going to marry any one. Never. Not any man in this world. I'm——"

"Hurry it out," he said, smiling. "Tell me the joke and get over with it."

"It is not a joke," she said very seriously, putting her hand on his that held her other. "I'm never going to marry. I'm going to be an—old maid. I don't believe you can understand, Edward, but there are some of us who are not meant to marry. It is too terrifying. Just the thought of it, of everything it means, is too frightening for us to bear."

It was evident he did not at all understand what she meant. He looked at her doubtfully, quizzically.

"I am afraid I can't make you understand, Edward," she said, smoothing the back of his hand with her fingers. "I'm afraid of you. I'm afraid of love—of the kind of love you want. I'm afraid of surrendering myself ——"

She knew he was not understanding in the least. She looked down at his hand and tried to think of some way to say what she meant. If he could only understand the cold fear she had felt when she had stood on the outermost universe and dreaded to make the final leap into the unknown— But that was something she could not explain. He would live his life thinking her refusal was something else. Well, he must think it then.

But Edward, in spite of her efforts, put his arm around her.

"Don't," she exclaimed, trying to push him away. "I tell you not to! Edward——"

He laughed and tightened his arm. She drew her head backward, away from him, and closed her eyes and screwed her face into a twisted sign of her distaste, but in spite of all this he kissed her again and again. She went cold with fear, and trembled, and then from the bushes by the veranda the sweet warm odor of lilacs swept over her and she saw herself again standing on that outermost universe and felt again the fear of leaping and the joy of the moments that had followed.

"I'm not afraid! I'm not afraid!" she told herself as the lilac fragrance comforted her, and she leaned toward him and kissed him, and she was not afraid.

AS LIVES go, Selina Sue's life was a happy one, and she was an old lady before she knew she had taken to her bed for the last time. This was but a few weeks ago. There was not very much of her as she lay in her bed. Her hair was scant and white and she wore a nightcap. The nightcap had a tiny frill of the softest old lace, and tied beneath her chin with ample strings, and it was made of the softest of old linen that had seen many years of use, because as she grew old Selina Sue could bear nothing rough against her skin—not even anything as rough as new silk.

"For mother did develop some peculiarities as she grew old," her daughter said, after the end had come. "She was always dear and patient and gentle, but some of the things she did we could not begin to understand."

"The flowers, for instance," said Selina Sue's other daughter.

GUESTS arriving at a supper dance, given for a New York debutante, at New York's most fashionable restaurant on Park Avenue.

Investigation shows that among New York's one hundred and sixty debutantes of the season, Woodbury's Facial Soap is more than three times as popular as any other soap.

One Hundred and Two New York and Boston Debutantes tell why they use Woodbury's

IN the social registers of the big New York newspapers one hundred and sixty debutantes were listed this season—a list unusually large, for the number of young girls presented in a season to what is authentically known as "society" in New York rarely mounts to more than a hundred. In Boston the list came to ninety-eight.

We wanted to know how these young society girls take care of their skin. What toilet soap do they use? Why do they choose it? And what are the qualities in a soap that especially appeal to them?

224 girls answer the questions

To learn the answers to these questions we submitted them to each of the 258 girls. All but 34 replied to our inquiries.

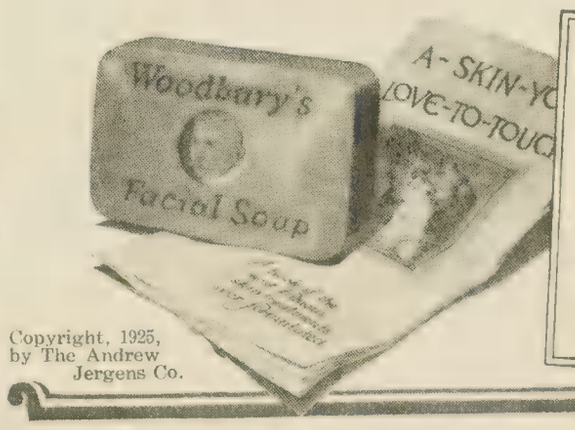
The results were extremely interesting.

Twenty-three different brands of soap were used; but whereas 122 girls scattered their choice over 22 different kinds of soap—an average of a different soap to every 5 girls—the remaining 102 girls all used Woodbury's.

Among the New York debutantes Woodbury's was more than three times as popular as any other soap. Among the Boston debutantes Woodbury's was nearly five times as popular as any other soap.

Forty-three girls said they used Woodbury's to overcome definite skin defects such as enlarged pores, blackheads, excessive oiliness, etc.

Seventy-six girls gave the purity of Woodbury's as their reason for using it, or its beneficial effect on the skin in general cleansing. Two girls used it because it had been recommended by their physicians.



Two points are noticeably brought out by the investigation: one is the constantly recurring testimony to the purity and fineness of Woodbury's Facial Soap. The other is the efficacy of the special Woodbury treatments for overcoming common skin troubles.

Why Woodbury's is unique in its effect on the skin

A skin specialist worked out the formula by which Woodbury's is made. This formula not only calls for absolutely pure ingredients. It also demands greater refinement in the manufacturing process than is commercially possible with ordinary toilet soap. In merely handling a cake of Woodbury's one notices this extreme fineness.

Around each cake of Woodbury's Facial Soap is wrapped the booklet, "A Skin You Love to Touch," containing special treatments for overcoming common skin defects. Get a cake of Woodbury's today and begin your treatment tonight. A 25-cent cake lasts a month or six weeks.

"Yes, the flowers. All that week, when we never knew whether she would live, she had the flowers on her mind every moment. Every one sent her flowers, of course, but she would not have them in the room. She begged us to take them away."

"And you remember how she asked about the lilacs?"

"Yes, that was another strange thing. The very day she was taken ill, she asked me to get her a big bunch of lilacs, and I did, of course, but when I brought them she put out her hand and said, 'Not now! Not yet! Take them away!' So, of course, I did. 'But, mother,' I said, 'you asked for them.' And she said, 'Yes, but not yet.' "

"And she simply would not have those lilacs in the room!"

"No. Every day—oh, ten times a day—she asked if we had the lilacs and we offered to bring them to her, and she would say, 'Not now!' "

"I never knew anything quite so strange."

"She was a little out of her mind, of course, poor dear. We'll never quite understand what she was thinking of, because it was probably only some hallucination—or so the doctor thought. But you remember that last——?"

"Yes, the last——"

"—how she raised her head and said, 'The lilacs! Now, please, the lilacs!' and, when we brought them, she drew a deep breath——"

"Yes."

color in late April or early May. On the porch side of the house, one may make a garden border. If you stay at home all Summer, plant larkspur, campanula, Shirley poppies and all the bulbs the border will hold. Against the background of the Japanese quince, narcissus poeticus and purple crocus are especially lovely. These may be naturalized, that is planted in the grass, and will come up year after year with no care whatever.

If you do not wish to disturb the "parked" symmetry of your street even by so friendly a garden-defense as a flowering hedge, you may still add beauty to your little dooryard by planting a single shrub or tree. A magnolia (stellata, soulangeana or conspicua) makes a delightful break in the monotony of the block. A hawthorn, a flowering apple, a Japanese cherry, a flowering dogwood, a syringa or a lilac bush—any one of these adds charm and interest. Your flowering tree should not be planted in the center of the plot, but at the side, or against the house corner, in order that the foliage may frame your porch and, in this way, give it a feeling of seclusion.

Blossoming trees, the kind that gardeners call "secondary growth," are peculiarly adapted to suburban gardening. They are more effective and more decorative than the low-growing shrubs, and if set close to the fence or boundary they take up very little ground space. Bulbs, iris and many flowering plants may be grown beneath them with charming effect. Also, without being an actual barrier, they give quite a bit of seclusion, because the heaviest foliage, instead of being two or three feet from the ground, is high enough to cut off the neighbor's view of your porch.

HOW delightfully radiant a little place would seem in March if the little grass plot underneath the magnolia were thickly starred with golden crocuses. Later on, by the other corner of the veranda, a lilac might bloom with golden daffodils or poet's narcissi for company. Then would come climbing roses, grown on a wide-meshed slender lattice with wide, window-like openings. What a joy it would be to have tea or breakfast on the porch with the roses for company.

Such a planting, once done, requires very little further care. Every year the magnolia would bloom more radiantly than ever, and every year the little crocuses would come up to bear it company. A permanent planting is a permanent joy.

In the two plans given this month the plots are the same size, but they are planned by people very differently circumstanced. One housewife-gardener has plenty of time to work in her garden, while the other, alas, has little or none at all.

The one with little time contents herself with planting low-growing trees close to the border fence, chosen so as to give a succession of bloom. Clematis and bittersweet climb over the fence, wild grape and trumpet creeper wind over the arbor at the end of the yard. Here also are a half-dozen New England asters. Under the trees are planted iris and poet's narcissi, while daffodils and crocus are naturalized in the grass. There are no flower-beds to weed in this yard, and the effect, especially in Spring, is very lovely. In Summer a trumpet creeper makes the arbor gay, and nasturtiums grown in tubs add color to the edge of the bricked terrace. Climbing roses, planted against the house on the south and west sides, cover the kitchen porch and make a bower of the porch.

In the small beds in front of the porch are planted pink Dorothy Perkins roses, a clematis vine and a lavender wisteria at the corner. On each side of the porch is a plant of arbor vitæ, andromeda and mahonia, with iris and daffodils between.

Sometimes the owner of the small yard has another problem to face—that of a difference in level. That is, the ground space extends some eight feet from the steps, then drops three feet perhaps, to the level of the sidewalk, five or six feet beyond. Often this little sloping space is grassed over, a treatment which might have been used here. But this woman, since she was indulging so slightly in gardening, decided to have here a little terrace with a low balustrade at the edge of the slope, and inside a flower-bed, a little walk running the length of it with a seat at each end. In the bed are Ghent azaleas, their brilliant orange and lavender contrasting gorgeously in May, and on the balustrade are Wichurian roses and evonymus radicans vegeta, which holds its crimson berries all Winter and thus makes an all-season decoration.

THE housewife who owns the second plot is limited as to funds and space, but she has the time to work in her garden, which she has adapted to the particular needs of her household. The little kitchen-garden yields a noble supply of vegetables. The garden path on a line with her kitchen door, with the vista down it from the kitchen, is most pleasant. The small summer-house is a rough affair, it is true, but covered with Japanese morning-glories in lavender and deep blue it is a very attractive spot. Later the housewife intends to plant the syringa and climbing roses as indicated on the plan.

The little summer-house is more than a mere decoration. It is screened and so makes a splendid place for the baby's nap. Here dad may sit and smoke in peace and solitude. Here, also, the children often have their early supper, or a tea-party with a few small friends.

The drying-yard, too, has various uses. It is screened by a grape trellis and a lattice on the garden side. There is provision for the drying of clothes, a sand-box and a swing for the little folks, and there might even be a slide to afford them further pleasure. The glimpse of the garden through the doorway makes this a pleasant place.

Against the lattice on the garden side, squash are thriftily grown. A few clumps of blue corn-flowers are planted to contrast with the gorgeous yellow flowers of this useful vegetable.

The first arch, made of foot-wide poultry-wire supported by stout posts, is covered with roses, the second supports a Japanese cucumber, which yields a crop good for salad and pickles as well as decoration.

In the long bed at the side chiefly annuals are planted, the decorative grass in the corner, zea gigantea, tobacco plant, which is very stately and effective, browallia, clarkia and old-fashioned calliopsis, annual lupins, the delicate and lovely schizanthus, gypsophila and scabiosa. And why on earth do such charming flowers have such forbidding names? Mignonette and lemon verbena add fragrance. The cost of this border, which will bloom until late frost, is very moderate, about one dollar and twenty-five cents for seed packets, thus averaging about ten cents each.

Along the edge as a border are strawberry plants, and on the little summer-house are ipomea rubro-cœrulea, which has flowers of a very lovely blue, and canary-bird vine. Other climbers could be planted here—dolichos, gourds, scarlet-runner or tall nasturtiums.

The planting about the house is as follows: on the north side: English ivy, larkspur, Turkscap lily, beebalm (monarda), platycodon, Florentine iris, astilbe japonica, forget-me-not, lily-of-the-valley. Crocuses are used as edging and a honeysuckle marks the corner.

On the same side as the front of the house: lilac, pink rugosa rosa, spirea Van Houttei, pink rugosa rosa, white rugosa rosa, pale pink and white zinnias. Dwarf phlox is used as an edging, and a climbing rose is set against the side of the house. On the south side: by the porch steps are two arbor vitæ, with a lilac bush at the corner, a wisteria and a climbing yellow rose. The gold-medal hybrid larkspur has been planted so as to look into the living-room windows, with snapdragons in front of it.

The straight path down to the foot of the yard has annual lupin and calendula on one side and corn-flowers on the other. Past the arch the row of tomatoes on stakes is bordered with sweet alyssum.

The shrubs give color from March, when the magnolia blooms, through to the Winter when the scarlet pips remain on the rugosa roses. The suggested planting about the house is permanent, and except for the few interspersed annuals will bloom year after year.

the requisite symbol of such choice, await the arrival of their affinities! Having once found and segregated your affinity by reason of this simple yet conclusive test, you will then conduct——"

"Oh, pshaw!" protested a bantering voice. "What's breakfast got to do with affinities? 'Breakfast and let breakfast' — that's my motto!"

"Personally," drawled another, "I believe in twin breakfasts."

"And having once found said affinity," proceeded Hastings quite relentlessly, "you will then conduct her at once to the sun-porch where, from the various objects and articles displayed there for your selection (and with of course such minor mutual concessions as must inevitably be made), each two will then and there proceed to build their House o' Dreams. One hour and a half will be allowed for the perfection of this task. At the end of which time the New York architects who are over at the Country Club working out the plans for the new boathouse will appear, and utterly unprejudiced by acquaintance with any of you adjudge the prize."

"Hear! Hear!" roared a chorus of hilarious voices.

"The prize," proceeded Hastings without a flicker of expression, "being the two round-trip tickets to Buenos Aires—which I have just decided not to use!"

"What? What?" shouted the delighted but incredulous crowd. "Two round-trip tickets to Buenos Aires?" In a roar of laughter the audacious information passed from mouth to mouth.

"Well of—all the cheeky things—yet," chuckled the man at Valney's side. "Whoever in the world would have guessed that Hastings had it in him?"

"He—hasn't," murmured a dry voice just beyond.

Mounting suddenly to a chair Hastings loomed high and dominant over all. Even yet Valney could hardly credit the metamorphosis—Hastings the austere, the taciturn, the terrifying, romping impudently like a boy.

"These South American tickets, you understand," persisted Hastings stentoriously, "do not—necessarily—have to be used by the couple winning them, but may, by mutual consent," he added with a faint twist of his grim thin-lipped mouth, "be raffled off at a hospital fair—or even be presented to your worthy pastor and his wife. Nevertheless," he raised his voice suddenly, "nevertheless, if anybody's real home should get broken up by this night's madness—or even warped slightly at its underpinnings—don't for Heaven's sake blame me for it! It's Helen's idea—entirely!"

Catching the eye of a stout young man near him, the question in Valney's mind slipped inadvertently from his lips.

"Who is Helen?" he asked.

With a haughtiness altogether disconcerting, the stout young man put on his glasses to stare at the interrogator.

"Why, Mrs. Hastings—naturally," he answered in a voice like ice. ("Who the devil are you?" he might just as plainly have said.)

"When I count three," lifted Hastings's dominating voice, "I advise you all to make your selection. One—two——"

With a sudden shout the crowd rushed the table.

Even in that irresistible momentum it seemed to Valney that the stout young man crowded him, jostled him, trampled him even just a little bit more than was absolutely necessary. Neck to neck—shoulder to shoulder—jostle to jostle, he found himself fighting suddenly to keep place beside him.

Certainly no one could have denied that the stout young man was a young man of indomitable purpose. Swerving neither to right nor left he dove like a steam-roller through the crowd, forced his way to the first line of hands reaching, snatching, grabbing for the bright treasure, lifted his own voice and hand high over all and, as arrogantly and assuredly as he might have given the order in a restaurant, called out, "Pompano and cream sauce for me!" and dipping his finger like a greedy child into the bright jumble lifted the little fish, his choosen trophy, triumphantly into view.

With a totally unprecedented impulse Valney leaped into the air and snatched it from him, scuffled a brief instant for its possession, and amid a dozen other wild scuffles forged his way to the very threshold of the drawing-room only to discover that in the mêlée the gay little pompano on its wave of cream sauce had been stripped utterly from its setting, leaving merely an empty plate—only too symbolical, he decided, of the empty and partnerless evening now awaiting him.

All around him, old friends and new friends, husbands, wives, playmates, flirt-mates—all crowded and jostled and jollied together. In audacious bravados and extravagant badinage the affinities sought and found each other. Rollicking compliments, rollicking taunts, rollicking familiarities bespeaking a life he had never lived, a language he had never spoken, a laughter he had never laughed, flared up at him on every turn, lashing him back—back—back just a little bit further into his sense of isolation and inexperience.

An open door to the piazza tempted him suddenly to escape. Even Hastings, he reasoned, would hardly miss him.

BUT even as he reasoned he heard the stout young man's voice almost at his elbow, he caught a glimpse of the stout young man's head and shoulders.

"So the chap put up quite a scrap," confided the stout young man chucklingly to his companion. "But of course I got the best of it!" Significantly as he boasted he pointed to the lapel of his coat where, pallidly impaled on a pearl scarf-pin, the exotic pompano stripped utterly of its silvery setting and all its fairy garnishing loomed stark and stiff against its new and billowing blue-serge wave. "You see," explained the stout man in a somewhat hectic whisper, "I had a rather special reason for selecting that particular breakfast dish. Some one else—that is—

How Famous Movie Stars Keep Their Hair Beautiful

Try this quick, simple method which thousands, WHO MAKE BEAUTY A STUDY, now use.

See the difference it makes in the appearance of YOUR HAIR.

Note how it gives new life and lustre; how it brings out all the wave and color.

See how soft and silky, bright and glossy your hair will look.

THE attractiveness of even the most beautiful women depends upon the loveliness of their hair.

The hair is a frame or setting upon which the most beautiful, as well as the plainest woman, must depend.

Fortunately, beautiful hair is no longer a matter of luck.

You, too, can have beautiful hair if you shampoo it properly.

Proper shampooing is what makes it soft and silky. It brings out all the real life and lustre, all the natural wave and color and leaves it fresh-looking, glossy and bright.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why leading motion picture stars and thousands of discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product brings out all the real beauty of the hair and cannot possibly injure. It does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method.

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then apply a little Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo, rubbing it in thoroughly all over the scalp, and all through the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather give the hair a good rinsing. Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before. After the final washing, rinse the hair and scalp in at least two changes of clear, fresh, warm water. This is very important.

Just Notice the Difference

YOU will notice the difference in your hair even before it is dry, for it will be delightfully soft and silky. The entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find your hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it really is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage.

You can get Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

Now!

Rouge and loose Powder
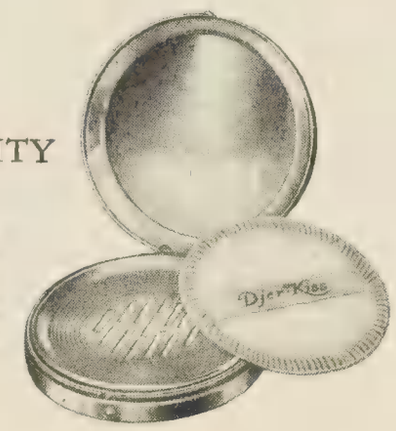
in one exquisite Vanity Case!

NOW those shops that carry, always, the newest aids to beauty and fashion are showing a novel double vanity—for both your rouge and your loose face powder.

Within its light and charmingly dainty case it combines these quite-unusual advantages:

A compartment for loose face powder, with ingenious "powder pockets" that release just enough powder on the puff each time you open the case.

A compact of Djer-Kiss Rouge.



And a double-faced mirror! On one side a detail mirror reflects, in close-up, any part of the face. On the other side a reducing mirror reflects your entire face at a glance, so that you may view the general effect achieved.

This new Djer-Kiss Rouge and Loose Powder Vanity is exquisitely fashioned of nickel silver—its cover, artistically embossed. Each vanity comes in its own silken-lined box.

well, you see it had been sort of arranged and——"

"But who in the world was the upstart who questioned it?" asked his companion. "Any one in this bunch who doesn't know that much doesn't know anything! Why you and——"

"Hush!" warned the stout young man.

"Well, at least," decided Valney quite suddenly, "I must know enough to 'make my manners' before I do get out!"

Vaguely reminiscent of his first childish parties, he felt the goose-flesh rise along his spine. Where in the world was his host? Where was his hostess? How should he find them? What in the world should he say to them when he did find them? "Thank you very much, but it doesn't look to me like a very good time, so I've decided to beat it." Hastings's icy stare. His hostess's cool surprise!

"Where in the world will I find Mrs. Hastings?" he turned and cried out quite desperately to a big blonde girl racing madly by him.

" 'Mrs. Hastings?—Mrs. Hastings?' " questioned the big blonde girl rather vaguely across her hurrying shoulder. "Oh, yes! Why of course! Mrs. Hastings! Over there by those palms! See? Helen! Helen!" she called.

Fighting his way as best he could through shoving shoulders and scurrying feet he headed for the shadowy clump of palms that screened the entrance to the hallway.

"I shall tell her that I've got a headache," he decided, "I shall tell her that—that I've just had a telegram," he grimaced. "That I have a sudden hunch that my house is on fire. That my dog is sick. Whatever I say of course she won't believe! Ghastly! But I shall see her and at least know just how—just why—Hastings——"

OUT of the veiling shadow of the palms a slender dark-haired wisp of a girl lifted a startled face suddenly from the great bunch of roses in her hand and stared at him. In another instant, demure as a schoolgirl's, but conscientiously hospitable, her slender fingers proffered to his.

"Oh!" she said. "How do you do? I'm Helen!"

"What?" gasped Valney. "What?" Oh, the incredible demureness of her! Her sudden and almost equally incredible shift from demureness to this frankly startling informality! Helen! "Oh, why yes, of course—I might have known!" he rallied himself almost instantly. "I—I—I'm Valney! Mr. Hastings is my chief at the office, you know."

"Oh, yes," said the girl, "I've heard all about you. That is——"

With a very ingratiating little frown which Valney adjudged quite mercilessly to be the gesture which most appealed to her pose of demureness at the moment, she stepped forward to scan his face. Even yet her own face was half hidden in the great bunch of roses that she held clutched in her hand. Above the petaled edge of the flowers her eyes showed vaguely twinkling.

"That is," she confided, "your chief—isn't a particularly enthusiastic talker—as perhaps you've noticed—but he did say that you were very—very faithful, I think was the word he used."

"Thanks—thanks awfully," squirmed Valney. "Very kind I'm sure and—and totally undeserved. But—but—" Helplessly he turned to the palms, to the seething crowd all around him, to the lights, to the music. "It's—it's an awfully nice party, of course," he essayed with sudden vivacity. "But I find I must be going! Some unexpected news from home—a—a——"

" 'Going?' " said the girl. "Going? Now?"

The unmistakable confession of disappointment in her voice stiffened Valney's spine even while it left his neck apparently flexible to swing around so that his eyes might probe to their own satisfaction the detailed process of such fast compounding coquetry.

But instead of the girl's bright eyes that focused his startled glance it was the little silver-paper plate dangling as stripped and empty as his own against the single frilly ruffle of her otherwise plain and almost prim little white dress.

Under suddenly lowered lashes the girl's glance followed his. A little flush quickened in her cheeks.

As definitely as one who saw his last possible door of escape blocked, Valney heard the bolt slipped.

"O-h!" said the girl. "You drew an empty plate, too, did you? So then you're my affinity!"

"Why—how—jolly!" stammered Valney. "This is a surprise!"

"Surely you won't consider going home—now?" challenged the girl. Her eyes were faintly narrowed.

"No, of course not!" insisted Valney. "Wild horses couldn't drag——"

WITH a little light hand on his arm he found himself suddenly swept along willy-nilly toward the sun-porch.

"Merciful Heavens!" he thought. "Is this the way it happened to Hastings? A mere fluke? A misunderstanding?"

As though quite conscious of his thoughts, the touch on his arm flickered a little.

He started to speak.

Behind him, instead, a great roar of jollity from a new influx of roisterers overwhelmed all speech and he found himself and his companion bumped down together upon the very threshold of the sun-porch—struggling for foothold—clinging to each other—fending as madly as any one there to hold even for one brief moment the ferny niche behind the electric fountain.

"House o' Dreams!—House o' Dreams!—House o' Dreams!" rang like a veritable war-cry all around them.

"Gad!" said Valney.

Once again he felt the little flicker on his arm.

"Don't—don't you think it's funny—at all?" demanded his companion.

"Funny?" gasped Valney.

The gasp was not so much one of protest as of astonishment at the new sight that met his eyes.

Piled a foot high, as though a toy-shop had been looted of all its bright plunder, the long porch table fairly groaned under its chaotic burden! Even Valney, grown man that he was, quickened to the color and glitter of it—the absurd Lilliputian perfections! A mimic world in absolute detail: Mimic trees! Mimic stone walls! White picket fences! Roofs! Ramparts! Railroad tracks!—Chunky gray boulders for medieval castles! Smug red bricks for city mansions! Logs for cabins! Hulls for house-boats! Potted plants! Rustic arbors! Ivory-tinted bedroom sets in absolute perfection of Parisian craftsmanship! Doughty Dutch tables and sideboards! Miniature bookcases! Pianos! Tin kitchens! Every conceivable doll-house toy of childhood, italicized suddenly by sheer grown-up impudence into absurd, not to say embarrassing, significances.

Already in gay married-life gibes the badinage had taken a distinctly more literal turn.

"Now at last, Eloise, I'm going to have just the sort of smoking-room that I've always wanted. Alice says I can!"

"Hang it all, I really believe that there is something after all in this liking-the-same-sort-of-breakfast business! Look at the yacht that Channing and I are going to build—and poor Henry, you know, can't even taste water without making a face!"

"Now at last, Roland, old thing——"

"Maybe now, Jessie, you'll be sorry about that dog kennel you've balked so long! Elizabeth loves dogs!"

LOADED with their bright plunder the big blonde girl and her partner—mated by a mutual passion for creamed sweetbreads and mushrooms — went scurrying by to commandeer the top of the grand piano for the musical salon which both swore was heretofore the one thwarted dream of their lives! A score of others, breathless, flushed, but otherwise undauntable, stampeded for the pantry in the mad June-night hope of turning the ice-chest into an Arctic igloo! Already the broad front staircase framed the outline of a terraced vineyard! In the cavernous blackness of the fireplace a rollicking man and girl aided by moleskin pelts and tiny Indian potteries were staging some sort of cave-man stuff!

Once again Valney took a glance at his companion. "Funny?" Just exactly how funny, he wondered, was it likely to prove—this building a House o' Dreams with his chief's young wife? To put the game through at all it would have to be put through in a really sporting manner. But just how "sporting" was it wise to be? Or not to be, either, for that matter? To play the game dully but circumspectly—and be reported only as "dull" to the man he wanted so much to please? Or to play the game amusingly, even just a bit cheekily perhaps, and be reported only as "cheeky?" What in the world would Hastings want? What would he expect?

Out in the far hallway somewhere he heard Hastings's voice, arrogant, impatient, just a bit raspish.

"Helen! Helen! Where's Helen? She's got the wrong partner! MacCrombers her partner! What is the——"

Valney heard the girl beside him give a funny little gasp.

"Is that true?" he ducked his head to ask.

"Yes," nodded the girl. She stood so near him when she nodded that her forehead made a faint little thump against his breast.

Bewilderment upon bewilderment jumbled themselves together in his brain.

"MacCromber?—MacCromber?" he rallied with sudden enlightenment. "Oh, was that the very stout young man with the very thin manner who was so cocksure about his partner—as well as about his darned old pompano?" The most utterly unprecedented sense of triumph and satisfaction flamed up suddenly like a match-spurt in the dry tinder of his mind. "Oh, ho!" he said. "So that was it, was it?"

In an unexpected push and surge of the immediate crowd that encompassed them his companion's lips grazed his ear.

"But you were the one that I wanted!" she whispered.

"W-what?" stammered Valney. "What?"

The sober-mouthed mask of demureness (if it was a mask), the twinkling-eyed mask of audacity (if it was a mask), slipped utterly from her face to be replaced all in an instant by a blush-pink mask of the most confounding frankness.

"I saw your scuffle with Mr. MacCromber," she confessed quite brazenly. "Saw how it came out—he with the pompano and you with the empty plate! So I just stripped the pompano from my own plate. And took a chance!"

"A chance of what?" gasped Valney.

"A chance of your finding me—before he did!" said the girl.

"W-what?" gasped Valney. "What?"

HE BENT down suddenly and tried to see her eyes. A little shiver struck across his shoulders. He gave an odd light laugh.

"Oh, very well," he said quite abruptly, "if that's really the case—let's beat it!"

In another instant he had waved her to the open window just behind them, had sensed rather than sighted her swift flight over the sill, and had jumped out into the darkness after her.

As though he landed on a scented pillow, his feet thudded softly into a whorl of violets.

A faint whistle sounded beyond.

With an airy persiflage he was very far from feeling he stopped only to blow a kiss toward the blazing windows behind him. "Good-by, South America!" he murmured, and plunged off across the dark lawn toward the whistle. His own heart thumped like drumsticks as he ran. The stars shrilled through his senses like the stab of fife notes.

Beyond the high hedge, across the velvety bowling green, around the concrete wall that guarded the orchard, scarcely a stone's throw from the house, but as hidden from it as though swallowed up in real distance, he found his companion waiting—a little white swirl of skirts on the shadowed grass.

Breathlessly he dropped down on the greensward beside her, sensed the dark sweep of pine branches over his head, the sweet June

Unlock the hidden beauty in your skin

French authority once said, "There are no ugly women—there are only those who do not know how to look beautiful."

The most important element in the beauty of the face is the condition of the skin, and every woman has complexion possibilities only waiting to be released by proper care.

The daily use of Resinol Soap gives just this care because it helps the skin to maintain its normal activity—the basis of all skin beauty. Made of the purest and gentlest cleansing ingredients to which has been added the Resinol properties, it easily rids the pores of clogging impurities, permitting them to breathe and resist germ infection.

Its distinctive fragrance and deep color come naturally from the Resinol it contains—that same quality which makes its lather so soft, soothing and refreshing. Begin today to use Resinol Soap for your toilet and bath. Within a week you will doubtless be amazed at the new beauty in your skin.

For special irritations, apply a little Resinol Ointment and see how quickly it clears them away. This healing ointment has also been used successfully for years for the relief of itching, burning skin troubles. Your druggist sells the Resinol products.

smell of crushed grass, stirring through earth and air and sky—of twig, bud, blade, leaf, wing, fur, flesh itself, waking to Summer!

"Oh, by Jove!" he blurted out impetuously. "It's too bad about MacCrombe r of course—but——"

"MacCrombe r!" scoffed the girl.

With a gesture that seemed to dismiss not only MacCrombe r himself but even the thought of MacCrombe r from the scene, she lifted her eyes for an instant toward the vague sky, and turned again with a sharp, rapturous intentness to cock her head toward the faint, trickling purl and ripple of water guzzling through leaves.

"Don't—don't tell me there's a brook—too?" stammered Valney.

The girl caught her breath.

"There is everything," she said. "And a full moon!" Impulsively she raised herself to her knees, stretched out her arms in a single decisive gesture. "This," she said, "is where I shall build my House o' Dreams!"

"You mean our House o' Dreams, don't you?" ventured Valney quite brazenly.

"Our House o' Dreams," corrected his companion without the slightest trace of self-consciousness.

WITH a half-muffled sigh like the sigh of a person who has just sighted home after a very long journey she sank back again, a little white blur on the grass.

All along the edge of his spine Valney felt the goose-flesh rise again.

"Oh, but you're quite sure it will be all right, are you?" he insisted. "Coming way off here like this, I mean? Sort of dodging the rest of the crowd? Mr. Hastings won't mind, you think?"

Even through the half-darkness he could sense the vague astonishment in his companion's eyes.

"I will manage Mr. Hastings," she said coldly.

"I can well believe it," murmured Valney.

With such nonchalance as he could best summon, he resigned himself then and there to fate. Well—the game had certainly set its own pace, he was forced to admit. Hiding from his host? And hidden with his hostess? With these questions puckering his lips so wryly that he could hardly force a smile through them, he turned to his companion.

"Well," she demanded of him instantly, "what did you bring us?" The demand was quite as matter-of-fact as if he had been the butcher.

"Oh, for the House, you mean? Nothing!" he answered with instant relief. "I just ran!"

"Ho!" scoffed his companion. "I snatched as I ran!" Triumphantly from her pocket she produced a small silver mirror heavily scrolled and filigreed in some old-fashioned Florentine sort of effect and proffered it to Valney. "There!" she exulted. "Never in my life have I ever seen anything so precious!"

Skeptically Valney took it from her and turned it over and over in his hand; thrust his young, questioning face into its murky, shadowed indifference.

"Why, it isn't even a toy!" he reproached her. "Not doll-stuff at all! But just some queer little old pawn-shop trinket that somebody brought home from abroad and then got tired of and dumped into the discard."

With a sudden genuineness and abandon that surprised himself he threw back his head and laughed.

"Some outfit we've got to go to housekeeping on," he attested. "Two empty plates!—and a tarnished mirror!"

"You forget," said his companion a trifle haughtily, "that it is at least an historic mirror—that is, lovers have looked into it—looked in it together, I mean!"

"Well, they certainly must have had to put their heads pretty close together to do it!" chuckled Valney.

"A habit not altogether unknown to lovers," murmured his companion coolly.

"Oh, I say," protested Valney with the faintest possible red across his cheek-bones. "You mustn't exactly taunt me with my inexperience, you know. Surely you understood when you selected me that I was just an innocent and totally unsophisticated bachelor. Just Mr. Hastings's private secretary, you know, just——"

"Mr. Hastings's faithful private secretary," interposed his companion. "Faithful!"

"You seem rather partial to that word 'faithful,'" murmured Valney.

"Partial?" quickened his companion. "I adore it! Of all words in the English language, it is the most beautiful—the most wonderful to me."

"To you?" gasped Valney. Quite in spite of himself the incredulous interrogation slipped from his lips. Fantastically in his mind he pictured for an instant the distracted Hastings trailing down Heaven-knows-what new indiscretion or flirtation—the deserted MacCrombe r nudging his vain search from room to room—all the legends—all the rumors!

Flickeringly by the uncertain sputter of a match his companion leaned over suddenly to take the mirror from him, and bent her head to redecipher for his enlightenment the worn inscription which she had discovered on the back:

"'F. S. to L. G.—Buda-Pesth, June 1834.
To love as two and see as one.
By this reflection only are All things solved!'"

"There! Isn't that beautiful?" she triumphed. "The darling—darling old lovers!"

A little silence fell between them suddenly.

It was the girl who broke it.

"Personally," she said, "don't you think you're just a little bit slow?"

"Slow?" winced Valney.

"About the House, I mean!" said the girl. "Surely we don't want the people inside to think that we're just out here flirting and philandering! Surely——"

"Oh, don't we?" cried Valney. He was on his feet in an instant.

"Silly!" said the girl. "We're not going back to the house!"

"Do you mind telling me, then," said Valney with some incisiveness, "just what it is that we are going to do?"

"We're going to build a House o' Dreams!" said the girl.

Almost impatiently Valney threw out his hands.

"Out of nothing?" he demanded.

In a seemingly irrelevant little gesture the girl's shadowed head turned sharply aside, tilted up a little like a wild thing sniffing the breeze.

"Oh, yes!" she cried. "And roses!"

"'Roses?'" laughed Valney. The laugh on his lips twisted suddenly into an odd, startled sort of astonishment that crinkled the length of his spine. "'Roses?'—'Roses?'" he gasped. "'Out of Nothing—and Roses?'"

AS THOUGH vaguely amused, the girl jumped to her feet and stood beside him.

"You are shyer even than I thought!" she said.

"I am all of that!" admitted Valney.

The girl stamped her foot.

"Do you—or do you not—want to play the game?" she demanded.

Vaguely shadowed by the dark pines her slender figure gleamed almost wraithlike in the gloom. Above her the great June moon swung like a silver lantern in the sky. Off in the meadow somewhere a hermit thrush called to its mate. Quickening on the lush evening breeze, the scent of roses woke sweepingly like a tide to engulf the land.

"This was the way all traps were baited," reasoned Valney. "Never with anything threatening—never with anything sinister! Cheese for mice!—moon for men, doubtless! Moon—and June—and——"

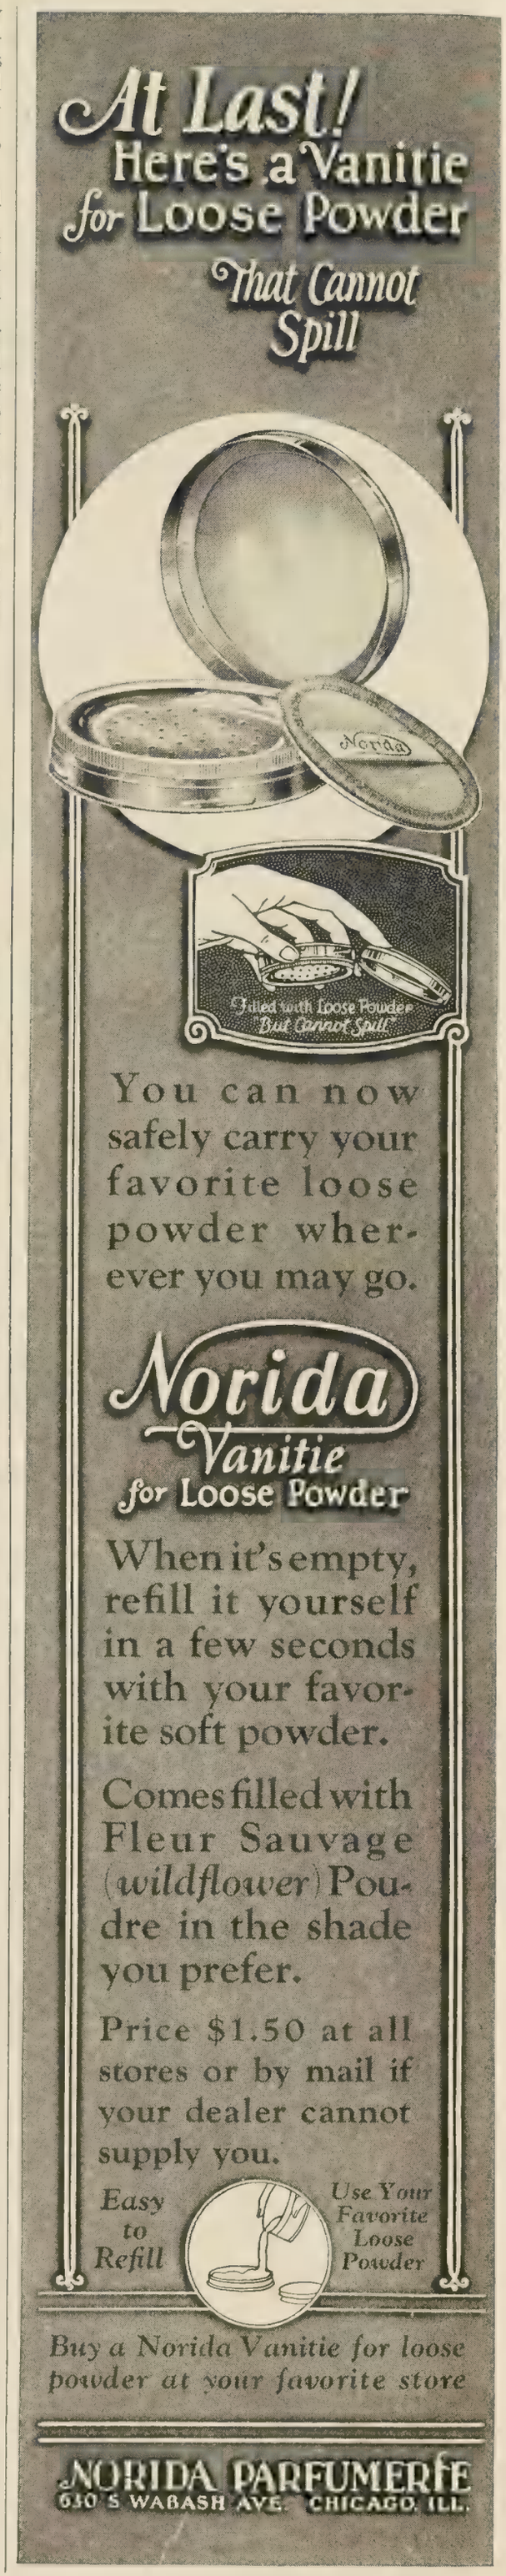
"Do you—or do you not—want to play the game?" insisted the girl's challenging voice.

Valney gave a little gasp.

Half mockingly in a gesture of defeat he threw out his hands to his companion. "Oh, go ahead!" he cried. "It's well known, I suppose, that those 'whom the gods would destroy they first make mad'?"

"Whom women would employ—they first made glad, you mean—don't you?" laughed his companion.

A most appalling sense of inconsequences swept almost jocosely over Valney.



"Just how glad do you expect to make me?" he questioned.

The girl put out her hand.

Valney didn't even stop to question just why she put it out, but he lifted it to his lips.

"Silly!" said the girl. "Have you got a very sharp knife?"

The Glory of My Hair

Let me help you gain it

By Edna Wallace Hopper

MY HAIR is the marvel of millions. It is thick, lustrous and luxuriant. Mine is a grandmother's age, yet I have never had falling hair or dandruff, never a touch of gray.

So with mother. She died at the age of 57 with hair any girl might envy. So with countless women, friends of mine, to whom I have supplied my helps.

When I was a girl, mother and I went to France to learn the best hair helps then in existence. For 40 years I have kept up with all progress in this line. My hair is my greatest glory. And I have consulted the greatest experts—always—to foster and preserve it.

Now I offer to all women the best helps that world-search developed. They are combined in Edna Wallace Hopper's Hair Youth, supplied by all druggists and toilet counters, exactly as I use it.

It is applied with an eyedropper directly to the scalp. There it combats the hardened oil and dandruff which stifle the hair roots.

The scalp is like a garden. We must eliminate the weeds. We must foster, clean and fertilize, as we do a garden. Then hair will thrive as flowers thrive under cultivation.

Every morning I apply my Hair Youth to my scalp. It takes but a moment. And my hair shows you what it means to girls and women. I would not omit it if I were offered $50,000 per year.

Let me show you what my Hair Youth means to you. How it fosters hair health. How it combats all that stifles the hair, all that ruins and whitens the hair. Send me the coupon for a trial bottle. An eyedropper will come with it. Think what it means if it shows you the way to attain such a hair as mine.

That Glint

Which makes my hair a halo

The thousands who see me daily on the stage and elsewhere know how my hair glistens. Almost every girl and woman envies its beautiful glint.

That I owe to a new-type shampoo developed by able experts. It comes from a laboratory which has devoted 50 years to the study of the hair. They have created some 250 kinds of shampoo, perfecting them step by step. This is their final creation.

A year ago they sent me this shampoo to try. It brought me amazing results. Then I asked them to supply it to a thousand women and learn the results they got. There came from everywhere, as a result, an overwhelming demand for this product.

Now, these experts make it for all women under the name of Edna Wallace Hopper's Fruity Shampoo. They combine in it 20 ingredients which benefit the hair. Two of them give glint to the hair.

I ask you to try it. Nothing I have found in 40 years adds so much of beauty to the hair. One use will convince you, as it did me, that this is the right shampoo.

I will gladly send you a sample bottle of either Hair Youth or Fruity Shampoo. Simply mail the coupon. My Beauty Book will come with the sample, telling how I gained my beauty, how I keep my youth. For your own sake, send the coupon. Clip it now.

OUT OF NOTHING—AND ROSES

"Merciful heavens!" said Valney. "Who do you want me to stick first? Mr. Hastings or MacCrombe?"

His companion ignored the question.

"Of course it's going to be awfully hard," she reflected, "with so little to work with—and very prickly!"

"My knife is very sharp," murmured Valney.

"But we'll do the very best that we can!" quickened his companion. "Do you know where the rose-garden is?"

"I can smell it," admitted Valney.

"Well, please smell your way to it just as fast as you can," ordered the girl, "and cut every rose in sight—red—white—pink—yellow—everything!"

"Mr. Hastings will kill us," confided Valney quite bluntly.

"It won't greatly matter," shrugged the girl.

"Presumably not," admitted Valney. "But what am I to do after I've cut the roses? Just stand and survey the shambles until retribution overtakes me? Or——"

"You're to bring them back here," ordered the girl. "Just as fast as you can. I, meanwhile, will be working out the general plan."

"Thanks! Thanks awfully!" conceded Valney. "But in case—that is—that you should survive me—there are one or two little things that——"

"Hush!" cried his companion. "And hurry!"

VALNEY took a single stride to the flickering line where the mischievous moonlight first began to nibble at the pine-tree's shadow, and then he stopped. Of all the astonishing things in the world it seemed to him suddenly the most astonishing that on this particular night of the world this particular girl should be waiting for him in these particular shadows. An impudent but quite irresistible question leaped suddenly to his lips.

"Oh, I say," he demanded. "Would you have brought MacCrombe to this same place?"

"Mercy, no!" came the instant answer. "Mr. MacCrombe and I had it all planned, you see, to build a real marble-floored palace on the mosaic-tiled table under the tinkly glass chandelier in the drawing-room. There were going to be gilt chairs and birds of paradise in silver cages. And——"

"Not just pine-needles?" chuckled Valney. "And hermit thrushes?"

"What?" called his companion.

"Nothing!" cried Valney. "But would you mind telling me—before I hurry any further—just how you happened to turn from all this splendor to cast in your lot with a chap who had nothing but a—an empty plate?"

"I'd tell you in a minute—if I knew!" laughed the girl in the shadows quite blithely. "But that's something—evidently—that I'm waiting for you to explain to me!"

"But MacCrombe—" puzzled Valney.

"Oh, pshaw!" cried the girl. "Anybody could build a House o' Dreams if all his material was provided for him. It's the man who can build one out of nothing——"

"And roses!" interpolated Valney quite definitely.

"That sounds like a song!" laughed the girl.

"It certainly does," said Valney.

Whistling the tune of it softly to himself he disappeared suddenly into the scented gloom.

There was no trouble whatsoever in locating the rose-garden—prim paths and geometrical flower-beds out of whose ruthlessly pruned perfection the marvelous bloom wafted itself rose-red, rose-white, rose-pink, rose-gold into one's almost incredulous senses.

"God!" muttered Valney. "What a sight!"

With his under lip twisted almost like a snarl he began his onslaught. A huge cutting basket loomed at his feet. Faster and faster he piled the fragrant treasure—leaf, bud, full-bloom beauty—heaping, brimming, scattering at his feet.

Society never winks at this weakness

What qualities must a woman have to be a social success—beauty, grace, culture, wit? Society appreciates these but it has never yet closed its doors to the woman who lacks them.

The seeker after social popularity may be utterly without distinction in a dozen ways—in features, family, personality; she may even lack discretion. Yet social success may be hers!

But there is one thing that always puts her under a tremendous social handicap—

One thing without which no woman can live up to a man's ideal of her—perfect personal cleanliness!

It is hardly an exaggeration to say that perspiration odor and moisture have kept more women from a coveted social position than any other one thing. Yet how many women fail to see when they fall short!

If girls and women—yes, and men, too—could only understand that soap and water cannot counteract this disagreeable thing! Special measures are necessary to keep the underarms always dry and odorless.

The one perfect precaution now regularly used by 3,000,000 people is the underarm toilette—Odorono!

Odorono, you know, is the original corrective of both perspiration odor and moisture. It was formulated by a physician and is now used in hospitals by physicians and nurses who know its antiseptic qualities and scientific action.

A clear, clean liquid, Odorono is as delightful to use as the daintiest toilet water. You need apply it only twice a week to enjoy absolute assurance of perfect underarm cleanliness. Never a trace of odor or moisture; never a stained garment!

Such a little thing and yet it means so much! Adopt the underarm toilette now; have for yourself the ease and comfort of mind its regular use means. Get a bottle of Odorono at any toilet counter; 35c, 60c and $1 or sent by mail postpaid.

Send for dainty sample set

I will send you 3 generous samples for the complete underarm toilette—Odorono, Creme Odorono (for odor only) and Odorono Depilatory, together with booklet of information on perspiration problems. Complete sample set, 10c; any one sample, 5c. Mail coupon now.

Skulking like a vandal he made his way back to his partner. Half agrin, half aghast he stood for an instant staring down at her. Something of the madness of the night, something of its mischief, its gay impudence, smote across him suddenly. Stripping two great wanton handfuls of petals from his plunder he showered them down in a flurry of color and fragrance upon his companion's upturned face.

"There!" he cried. "Now I warn you! Whatever happens it is on your own head!"

Laughingly he threw himself down on the grass and watched his companion extricate herself as best she might from the bright chaos.

"Now you are waking up!" she said.

"Don't wake me too fast," said Valney.

Speculatively with a half-scoffing sort of interest he watched the girl's slender hands flash white, fade gray, through the moon-tempered shadows.

"Haven't you any ideas at all about houses? Or about us?" she questioned just a bit abruptly. "This going to housekeeping—so suddenly—with somebody you've never seen before—it's pretty adventurous, don't you think? Rather a—a——"

The faintest possible hint of self-consciousness in her voice brought an odd little jump to Valney's pulses. After all, reasoned those pulses, it was she who had staged the whole audacity of the situation, practically forced her favor on him, forced the absurd flight, this more than absurd tête-à-tête! If she really wanted to play the game rashly—Impulsively he opened his mouth to meet her effrontery with effrontery, but closed his lips as impulsively instead in a narrow, tight-bitten line of self-restraint.

"Oh, of course," he rallied almost instantly with a coolly ironic literalness. "Of course I have a general idea or two on the subject. Asbestos shingles, for instance, are a shrewder buy in the long run than the ordinary kind. And there's a firm in Chicago, I understand, that is putting out a bully new heating system. Why, just the incinerator alone is worth——"

"'Incinerator!'" gasped his companion. "'Asbestos shingles?'"

LIKE a pony rearing back with astonishment, her vague white face and white shoulders lifted sharply through the moonlight.

"Why—why, this isn't going to be that kind of a house at all!" she protested. "This is just a dream-house! Fairy play!"

"No plumbing complications, you mean?" hooted Valney. "No leaky roofs? No wrangling over the butcher's bill? Or the guest-room curtains? No embarrassments whatsoever!" With his first really genuine laugh he threw back his head suddenly. "Why really, you know," he acknowledged, "I'm feeling better every minute!" Like a thread of gold through a warp of shoddy a little glint of real interest shone vaguely through his banter. "Maybe you'd better tell me more explicitly," he suggested, "just exactly what kind of a house it is that you do propose to build for us!"

"Sit closer!" said the girl.

Once again Valney opened his mouth to jest, but bit the jest back to a grim line of nothingness on his lips.

Shoulder to shoulder instead without question or comment he edged his way a little deeper into the rosy chaos.

"Of course," deprecated his companion, "it would be lots more spectacular if we had an arbor or a lattice and could weave it in a solid wall and roof of roses, but as it is——"

"Oh, indeed, I think it's infinitely better as it is!" insisted Valney gallantly.

"And of course," she continued, "I don't know exactly how much imagination you've got. It was 'faithfulness' that——"

"Oh, cut the 'faithfulness,'" said Valney. "And let's play it was 'imagination!'"

"Splendid!" cried his companion. "Then our House o' Dreams is as good as half built!"

Speculatively for a moment she picked up a rose—and another—and another—and bent her lips browsingly to them.

"Of course," she reflected, "it all comes back to the single basic question: If you had nothing in the world to express a house with except roses, just how would you express it?"

"You forget the — mirror," murmured Valney.

"Oh, dear!" cried the girl. "And the mirror, of course, is the whole focal point of the House!—'To love as two and see as one!'" Impetuously she reached out and picked up the little silver mirror and planted it firmly on the grassy sward just in front of her.

Vaguely disturbed by the unwonted stir of blade and leaf, a soggy toad hopped blinkingly into the miniature arena.

Instinctively Valney lifted a stick to eliminate him.

"Oh no, no, no!" protested his companion. "It's our first guest!" With a rather disconcerting little chuckle she lifted her face for one brief flickering instant into the light. "Once in Maine," she confided, "I found an old brass-knobbed Franklin stove sitting all alone on an aster-flowered hillside and thought I'd die then and there if I couldn't build a house all around it! But never, never," she chuckled, "did I ever dream of building a house round a mirror and a toad!"

ADROITLY as she spoke she began to gather all the yellow roses that she could reach into the compass of her arms.

"What do you say we build a golden house?" she asked.

"All my life long," swore Valney, "I have wanted to build a golden house!" Oddly out of old memories somewhere the vision woke of a mellow farmhouse sunning in a glossy green hollow. "Make it face south!" he ordered quite peremptorily.

"All my life long," swore his companion, "I have wanted to build a golden house facing south!"

Quizzically into her shadowy outstretched hand Valney fed every yellow rose that he could reach, thorn and leaf, bud and bloom. As definitely, as literally, as if it had been sketched in with little blocks or stones, the glowing outline grew.

"You see," explained the girl, "we can't of course expect to build anything more than just a plan, a sort of a bird's-eye view, as it were, but at least any old bird flying over would be forced to admit that it was a plan."

"I agree with you perfectly," said Valney.

"There can't of course be any walls," said the girl, "nor any roof——"

"Oh, pshaw!" said Valney. "Who wants roofs or walls in a House o' Dreams?"

"You mean," laughed the girl, "that you think it should always be June and moonlight for a House o' Dreams?"

"I mean," attested Valney somewhat violently, "that I wish it always was June and moonlight!"

"Have you always wished so?" questioned his companion.

"Upon my soul," swore Valney, "I never thought of it until just this minute!"

"You're—impulsive too, aren't you?" murmured his companion. "Faithful—and imaginative—and—impulsive?"

"On the contrary," insisted Valney, "I am utterly faithless and as dull as a clod!"

"Mercy!" protested the girl. "What do you think I am?"

A dozen adjectives stormed through Valney's mind, flattering ones, flirtatious, reproachful, condemnatory even. He had to decide on a compromise very quickly.

"I—I think you're very—surprising," he said.

"Really?" questioned his companion.

Beyond the single exclamation she neither denied nor affirmed the accuracy of the assertion. Something infinitely more important seemed to be engrossing her attention.

"Let's not build anything stupid like rooms!" she suggested quite abruptly. "Somehow I don't just feel like portioning off rooms."

"By all means let's not!" agreed Valney heartily.

"It will be quite enough, I'm sure," insisted his companion, "if we merely suggest with one kind of rose or another just exactly how we think a house ought to feel. The yellow-rose ground-plan of course expresses perfectly just how it ought to look from the outside! Sunny and bright and jolly and gay! But the inside?" Her hands lay quiet in her lap suddenly. Even the shadowy outline of her head seemed oddly contemplative. "What do you think a house ought to feel like?" she asked.

"Why—why, like jollity," conceded Valney. "Just jollity! Music, you know, and racket—and—and all that sort of thing!"

"Mercy!" cried his companion. "I'd have to have it feel like lots more things than that!"

"Such as what?" said Valney.

"Peacefulness," said the girl. "And lots of lovingness!"

"The last two qualities in the world," gibed Valney, "that are supposed to go together!—peacefulness and love!"

"They'll have to go together in my house!" said the girl. Very quietly she said it, almost casually even, yet with a certain deepening timbre of the voice that gave Valney the oddest sense again of goose-flesh quickening along his spine.

Was it remotely possible, he questioned himself, that she was sincere? All this idealism and everything? Sincere for the moment, that is? Even just for this one moonlit moment? Kindled by Heaven knew what latent hunger or dissatisfaction, snatching off her mask of bravado and recklessness—just for once—just for once—Heaven knew why—to show him—him—the real woman that she was?

In a ripple of soft laughter his companion's voice broke interruptingly across his mockery.

"Oh, look!" she cried. "There are tipsy honey-bees asleep in half the white roses! Poor drowsy, tired darlings! Let's put them all to bed in a white-rose room!"

"My—my mother had a white room," confided Valney with a faint sort of surprise. "No bigger than a little hall-bedroom I suppose it was, but looking back now—why, I haven't thought of it for years—looking back now, it seems as though all the wounds of the world were wrapped in cotton batting there."

So softly that it was hard to tell whether white rose-petals or white finger-tips fluttered, she began to block off her white-rose room.

"And what about the red roses?" questioned Valney.

"WE MUST scatter the red roses—everywhere!" insisted his companion. "Through the golden jollity—through the white peacefulness. Everywhere. Isn't it funny," she demanded, "that when you say 'House o' Dreams,' you'd expect to think granite and brick and plaster and mahogany and Dresden china! But I? As long as I live, the phrase 'House o' Dreams' will never conjure up anything for me except just running away—and pine-trees! Moonlight! Roses! Never anything but just that!"

"Not—not even us?" said Valney. Through a smile just a little bit wry the words slipped from him suddenly. "Won't you ever think of us in it—at all?" he demanded.

With a half-evasive laugh the girl reached out and picked up the little Florentine mirror.

"Oh, of course you've been very kind," she said.

"Kind?" cried Valney. An odd and most inexplainable bitterness woke suddenly in him. He gave a little laugh.

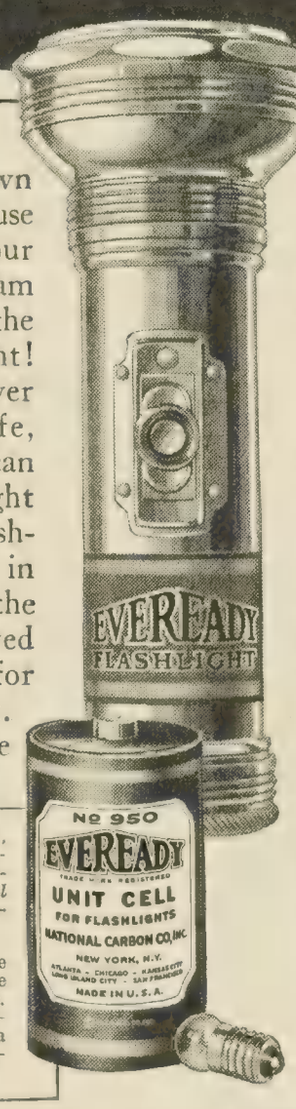
"Really, you know," he added just a bit raspishly, "I think you owe me something!"

"Why?" laughed the girl. "And what?"

A little bit reluctantly Valney joined in her laugh.

"Well—it seeming distinctly improbable to me," he said, "that I shall ever see you after to-night. And the moon now—in just about another moment—over the top of the trees?" His heart turned over suddenly like a frightened schoolboy's. "Oh, pshaw!" he said. "What do you say we take one look together at the moon in that funny little old mirror of yours?—not such a bad thing to remember, you know!—to be able to say even just to oneself: 'Well once there was some one—somewhere—who saw at least the moon just exactly as I did!"

"Oh, all right!" said the girl.



Quite simply she beckoned Valney a little closer, shifted the silver mirror from one brightening angle to another, swayed against his shoulder, grazed a shadowy wisp of hair across his ear, and then, in what seemed to Valney as the most consummate coquetry of all, picked up a pink rose suddenly and slipped it between his cheek and hers—flesh-pink, flesh-soft, flesh-sweet—an insuperable barrier.

Brazenly the big moon peeped over the top of the pines, caught the two faces floating cheek to cheek in the tiny quicksilver pool, kindled the girl's laughing eyes to stars, spangled her hair like an aura of fireflies.

An utter madness swept over Valney. He struck the mirror from her hand, and swung around with the single impulse to snatch her in his arms—kiss her—bruise her.

But even as he turned the impulse froze in his veins. He took her by the shoulders instead and held her in a grip as cool and quiet as steel. His face was very white.

"You've no right," he said, "to be so—so—wonderful. It's wicked! It's treacherous! As Hastings's wife——"

LIKE a wraith the girl slipped from his hands and faced him.

"'Hastings's wife'?" she gasped. "Why, I'm not Hastings's wife! I'm Hastings's daughter! I'm just home from school—I came unexpectedly—they didn't know what to do with me—they——"

"What?" gasped Valney. He bent his head to stare at her and stared again and again. "What—why—why, you said your name was Helen! When I asked for Mrs. Hastings they called 'Helen, Helen!' "

"My stepmother's name is Helen, too," said the girl. "But she isn't here to-night." A little laugh, half amused, half embarrassed, crept suddenly into the assertion. "She's like that sometimes, you know. After everybody comes, she decides to go off and do something else. It was roller skating to-night, I believe. But she'll be back for supper, I suppose." It was her turn now to stare at Valney. "Why—why I never dreamed," she protested. "Not for a moment! Why, how could you—why——"

"But how in the world—" stammered Valney.

The girl looked a little troubled.

"Oh, about Mr. MacCrombe r, you mean?" she queried. "Why, he and my stepmother seemed to have had it all arranged beforehand to play the game together. And then they had a little tiff or something. So I——"

"So you?" quizzed Valney.

"So I couldn't come to the party. Father said it would be too racketty—that I didn't know enough. But Mr. MacCrombe r begged him so hard——"

"O-h!" said Valney. "So he took the shift of partners reasonably well, did he?"

"Rather astonishingly well," confided the girl. "Only——"

"Only what?" said Valney.

As plainly as he might have sighted the flush rising in her cheeks he sensed the little shiver that shot suddenly through her pulses. All the shy reticencies of girlhood spoke in the shiver.

"Only—when the time actually came," she confessed, "I just couldn't! Couldn't play house, I mean—tables and chairs and dishes and all that sort of thing—not with Mr. MacCrombe r!"

"But—I?" asked Valney. As he asked the question, it suddenly became momentous to him.

"Oh—you?" said the girl. "I—I liked your looks! And what father said about your faithfulness."

"Th-thanks!" stammered Valney.

He gave a little start.

The moon that had waked this girl's mirrored eyes for one brief instant to laughter and shot a shower of sparks across her shadowed hair, stripped her whole face and figure suddenly to its young, literal beauty, more luring even than the glinted hair, the unfretted, milk-white forehead—the eager, sensitive mouth, the resolute, steadfast chin, the lovely flush quickening at her throat!

Knee-deep in June she loomed! Prescient! Prophetic!

Valney gave a little gasp.

As there—
As there for my dazzled eyes' beholding
Like—all the roses of the world unfolding——

"By Jove!" he cried out precipitously. "I know now what rhymes with 'sweetness!' 'Completeness,' of course!" And held out his arms to her.

But elusive as the girl in the mirror, she slipped away from him again.

"Oh, I know of course it's awfully sudden," he admitted. "You'll think of course it can't possibly be true and all that—but—" Impulsively he caught her again and lifted her hands to his lips. "All this—this House o' Dreams nonsense?" he stammered. "You think you 'blurred it with roses,' do you? Blurred it? By Jove! It's the clearest idea of a home that I ever got! Love? And hospitality? And peacefulness? Oh, darn wall-paper!" he faltered. "And furniture! And pictures! And all such complications! Any place is home enough for me that has your face in it!"

OVER the top of the orchard wall bobbing heads loomed suddenly, half a dozen vague figures slid thuddingly to the earth, Hastings himself, some laughing roisterers, the two architects.

"We are the architectural committee of inspection!" giggled the roisterers.

The architects' eyes emptied suddenly of statistics and specifications and filled instead with just moonlight.

"U-m-m. What in the world have we here?" they questioned. Squintingly as they spoke they began at once with long slender garden stakes to prod the golden circuit of roses that encompassed the two startled figures.

"That," said the girl, with the faintest possible crisping of dignity, "is the ground-plan of a happy house!"

"What?" gasped the architects. "Made of roses? Yellow roses?"

"One must work with such materials as one has," murmured the girl quite simply.

"Oh, yes! Why, of course!" conceded the first architect. Yellow is always so—so jolly!"

"And—and hospitable," conceded the second architect.

"Yes—isn't it?" murmured Valney. His voice was distinctly strained.

Almost as though by a preconcerted action both architects stopped prodding the yellow roses and stared at Valney's face instead.

"U-m-m," they reflected. "U-m-m."

Quite impulsively again they began to wield their prodding sticks. It was to the girl only now that they addressed their remarks.

"But your ground-plan doesn't seem to be all yellow—and jolly," they affirmed. "Now—now that white place there, for instance—the white roses, that is—just what are they supposed to represent?"

"Peacefulness," said the girl.

"U-m-m," reflected the architects. "Personally we have never been asked to include that particular convenience in our specifications. But of course—" They both gave a little jump suddenly. "Ugh!" they cried. "A horrid toad!"

"Our first guest!" said the girl. "Kindly don't hurt his feelings!"

More cautiously this time they began to prod into the muddled rose leaves.

Quite in spite of himself Valney gave a little laugh.

"Better go a bit slow," he advised them. "There are a number of drowsy bumble bees parked there, I believe."

"Oh!"

"But oh, I say," interrupted a chortling roisterer, "do you mind telling us just what you were both trying to see at the same time in such a narrow mirror?"

"Well I'll be—hanged!" protested Valney. "Of all the nerve—the——"

"We were trying to see the moon." confessed the girl quite frankly. Altogether unexpectedly her own little laugh rang out through the mock solemnity and pompousness. "We were trying to decide," she chuckled, "if by really putting their heads together it was or was not humanly possible for two people to see anything from exactly the same point of view."

"And was it?" asked the first architect dryly.

"It was!" snapped Valney.

Quite precipitously the architects withdrew into the shrubbery. In an accent almost of

CHOCOLATE SPONGE

½ envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
¼ cup cold water — ⅓ cup of sugar
¼ cup boiling water — 3 eggs
1 teaspoonful vanilla — Few grains salt
2 squares chocolate or 6 tablespoonfuls cocoa

Directions: Soak gelatine in cold water until soft, then dissolve in boiling water. Add cocoa or melted chocolate. Beat egg whites until stiff and add well-beaten egg yolks gradually, to the whites. Add sugar, then the dissolved gelatine, which has been beaten well. Beat and add flavoring. Pour into wet mold, chill and serve plain or with milk, whipped cream or whipped evaporated milk.

severity they summoned the girl to them and whispered a question in her ear.

"Also—we noticed," they whispered, "that there were red—red rose-petals scattered everywhere. Just what were they supposed to symbolize?"

"Why, love, of course, you sillies!" said the girl. "Whoever heard of a real House o' Dreams that didn't have love in it?"

"U-m-m," reflected the architects.

Rather soberly they came back into the moonlight.

They looked at Hastings, they looked at Valney, they looked at the giggling roisterers. But most of all they looked at the rose-petaled ground-plan of the Happy House—a golden circuit like a gigantic wedding-ring.

"U-m-m," they mused. "Cheerfulness—and peace—and love. Cheerfulness and——"

"The symbolism of course is rather crudely expressed," mused the first architect.

"Nevertheless——"

Like a single conviction the word slipped from their lips.

Very suddenly they straightened up and announced their decision.

"U-m-m," they said. "We have seen of course to-night a considerable number of infinitely more finished and elaborated constructions. The musical salon topping the grand piano, for instance; or the crystal palace in the butler's pantry. Actual works of art, some of them, clever and ingenious almost beyond belief! But when it comes right down to actual foundations—the essential qualities that make a real House o' Dreams, honor as well as professional acumen demands that we vote the prize to—these two young runaways here!"

"What?" stammered Valney.

"What?" gasped the girl.

Altogether a-twinkle with moonlight and laughter the architects stepped forward to present the two South-American tickets to Valney.

Stalking out of the shadows, Hastings himself fairly trampled down to the roses to reach the group.

"Hi there! Stop that! What the devil?" he protested.

A little hand slipped into Valney's hand. He thought it was a rose—until he squeezed it.

Smiling just a bit jerkily he pushed aside the proffered tickets and turned round to Hastings.

"Oh, thanks—thanks awfully!" he said. "But when I go to South America I'll—I'll make my—our—own way, I guess."

"Gad!" gasped Hastings, "I believe you will!"

earth, he wondered, was calling at that hour? His wonder was not lessened by finding Lettice Booker standing on the step. She was matter of fact and businesslike.

"Let me in," she said briskly. "Quick. No. No. Don't stop to talk now. Let me in—and shut the door and pull down those curtains as soon as ever you can."

She was closing the door herself even while uttering the last sentence. She drew the curtains down to the sill before she spoke again. Then, with a sigh of relief and a smile, she turned to him.

"Surprised to see me, aren't you, Farley?" she observed. "I don't wonder. To tell you the truth, I am surprised myself. I

NOW—a new salt to save children from

Goiter

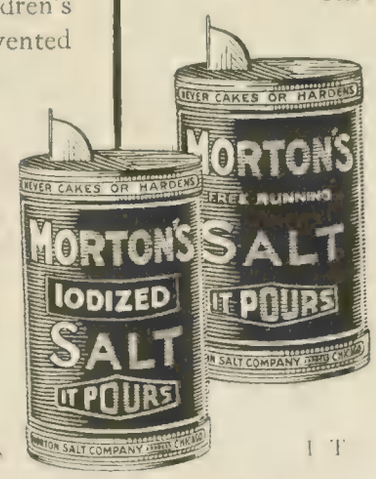
Only Nature's iodine restored—yet tastes no different

GOITER attacks thousands. It weakens mind, saps strength, undermines health, disfigures the body.

In one section 71% of all school girls and 54% of boys were victims. Adults also suffer. In one city 200,000 were thus ailing.

Yet 90% could have been spared, physicians say, if a tiny amount of iodine had been administered in childhood.

Take no chances with children's health. Goiter is easily prevented with this new salt called Morton's Iodized Salt.



In taste, looks, price and the way it is used, it is like the famous Morton's Salt you have always used. Grocers carry both.

Only Nature's iodine is restored—a tiny tasteless trace. It supplies the mysterious little throat gland called the thyroid with the proper stimulation. Goiter cannot develop.

Begin using this new salt daily whether children show any symptoms of goiter or not. Doctors advise it. Remember, it is not a drug, but a food that is saving the health of thousands.

And send for this wonderfully informative free booklet. Just clip coupon. Every mother should read it.

hadn't the least idea of stopping here tonight, but I've been up to Sophronia Haskins's—she is doing a cross-stitch table-set for one of my city customers and I wanted to see how she was getting on with it—and your curtains were up and I could see you sitting in here. And you did look so all alone and tired out that I couldn't help coming in. What a day you must have had! And—those dishes. You don't mean to say you have only just had your supper?"

He was still suffering from the surprise and shock of her sudden appearance and his reply was not very coherent.

"Why—why, yes—that is—I mean, no," he stammered. "I had supper an hour ago, but I haven't cleared away yet, because—well, because—here, what are you doing? Never mind those things. Don't touch them. Sit down.'

She had begun picking up the dishes from the table. Her hands were full of them and now she moved toward the sink.

"No," she declared. "I can't stay long enough to sit down and these dishes must be washed. Yes, of course I am going to wash them. And I don't need any help to wash two plates and a cup and a knife and fork and spoon, I hope. We can talk while I do them. Oh," impatiently, "won't you please do as I tell you? Can't you see that this will probably be the only chance we may ever have to talk—alone? And I must go in ten minutes. If you don't sit down and sit still, I shall go now."

THIS threat was the card which took the trick. He leaned his crutch against the arm of a chair and subsided into the chair itself.

"Oh, well," he groaned resignedly, "I suppose you will have your own way, and I can't stop you. But of all the ridiculous——"

"Sshh! It isn't ridiculous. You're too tired to do these dishes and I'm not tired at all. As to having my own way—well, that is a habit of the Peels, isn't it? Now, Farley, I'm going to ask you a question and I want you to answer it. Why have you kept away from me so carefully since you came back here?"

It was not at all the question he had expected and it caught him unprepared. He hesitated.

"Why—why," he stammered, "I don't know what you mean by keeping away from you. I haven't——"

"Oh, yes you have! I have seen you go by the store a half-dozen times, but you have never come in. You call on other people. Why have you never called on me?"

He moved uneasily in the chair. "I thought probably—" he began. "I thought—well, I didn't know that you cared to see me. I didn't suppose you would."

"Why not? We used to be—friends. Why shouldn't I care to see you?"

He moved again, frowned, and shook his head.

"I don't know why you should," he declared. "After—well, after the way I treated you. I shouldn't blame you if you never spoke to me. I didn't expect you to."

"Nonsense. That is all over and done with years ago. That belongs to the days when we were young, and we're not young any more."

"I'm not, certainly. I look fifty and I feel a hundred. Oh, Lettice, what is the use? I came back here because there didn't seem to be anywhere else for me to go. The people here have been mighty decent to me, a lot more so than I had any right to expect, but I'm not fool enough to count on their friendship—no, nor to presume on it, either. Everybody in Wapatomac knows that before I went away you and I were—well, they know the whole story and what a mess I have made of my life. Do you suppose I intend to set them talking again? If I haven't any respect for myself, I intend to have a little for you. The less you see of me, the better—for you, I mean."

She was busy with the dishes, but she turned to look at him over her shoulder.

"I thought so," she said. "I guessed that was the reason. You were afraid of what people might say. I wonder if you've ever thought that they will talk all the more if you keep on as you have been doing? You never stop in at the store. Well, perhaps I don't blame you much for that. But when I am in some one else's store, or the post-office, or the bank—wherever I happen to be—and you are there, do you think it is any less noticeable to have you slip out of the door or slide down behind your newspaper and pretend not to see me? Don't you know that others notice that as much as I do? Talk? Of course they'll talk. They're bound to do that, anyway. But the surest way to set them talking is to avoid me as you've been doing. Of course, if there is any other reason—if you don't want to have anything to do with me—on your own account, I mean——"

"Don't say such things. They are silly, and you know it. It isn't what I want. It is what you want—or ought to want. And you ought to want never to set eyes on me again."

"Why? You and I were friends once. Is there any good reason why we shouldn't be friends now?"

He stirred so violently that his crutch fell to the floor with a clatter. Before he could recover it she had picked it up and handed it to him.

"Well, tell me, is there any reason?" she repeated.

"Of course there is. How can you and I be friends? I had my chance and I threw it away. I was a pig-headed, conceited jackass. Oh, Lettice, let's not talk about it. You can't be a friend to me. You mustn't."

She gave the plate she was wiping a final polish and set it down.

"But I am," she said. "Or I should like to be, if you will let me. I should like to be just that—a friend. Not, of course," she added hastily, "in the way we used to be—that is over and done with for you and me—but the other way, the grown-up, common-sense way. I should like to be your friend and help you, if I can. When I saw you sitting here alone, I had to come in and tell you so. That is why I did come. That is the real reason."

"But you shouldn't. Good Lord! Suppose one of the neighbors saw you come into this house, at this time of night."

"If it had been any other time of night, I shouldn't have come. But it is nearly eleven and—unless the neighbors are sick, and I know they are not—they have been in bed for an hour. Farley, tell me all about it, please. All about yourself, what you have been doing since you went away from Wapatomac. Not the war part, I know that, but the rest—what came before. Why did you give up trying to be an artist?"

HE SMILED faintly, and the smile conveyed almost as much as the words which followed it.

"I gave up because I had to," he said. "I stuck to it for years, long after I knew it wasn't going to be the least use. I studied and drew and painted until—oh, well, until I had to see what every teacher I ever had told me, that I was no good—no real good, I mean. I could paint a little, but it would always be just a little. There are, maybe, three or four hundred really good painters in this country and ten thousand putterers who just putter out a living. I couldn't even do that, not in the regular way. At last I had used up all the money I had and a little I borrowed from Aunt Sylvia. Then I managed to get a job with a Boston firm who made Christmas cards and things like that. They kept me a while. Then I went to New York and did the same things—all sorts of hack work. Sometimes I earned a fairly decent salary, sometimes I was flat broke. Then came the war and my chance with the camouflage corps. That did give me a kick for a time, I own up. It was—oh, well, adventure, you know—and creative, in its way—and somehow it made me feel almost respectable and worth-while again. Then that bomb blew me and my worth-whileness sky high, and Aunt Sylvia died, and I crawled out of the hospital with no place to go—and here I am. There's all there is to it. Pretty much of a fool yarn about a fool, if you ask me."

She did not speak for a moment. The dishes were finished, and she was putting them away upon the shelves. Her next remark was made as she stood facing those shelves, and he could not see the expression upon her face.

"And now?" she asked. "Are you—do

FIRST PRIZE $500.00

ADELE EDWARDS, 23 Winant Avenue, Port Richmond, S. I., N. Y.

FIRST PRIZE RECIPE

G. Washington's Coffee Apple Cream Cake ½ cup of butter, 1 cup sugar, 2 eggs, 1¾ cups flour, 2 teaspoons baking powder, ¼ teaspoon salt, ½ cup milk, 1 teaspoon G. Washington's Coffee. Cream butter, add sugar gradually, then eggs well beaten. Next sift and add flour, baking powder and salt, alternately with the milk in which the G. Washington's Coffee has been dissolved. Beat thoroughly and bake in moderately hot oven in two greased square layer cake pans.

G. Washington's Coffee Apple Filling 1 pound apples, pared and grated, 1 pound powdered sugar, rind and juice 3 lemons, ¼ pound sweet butter, 2 well-beaten eggs, 1 tablespoon G. Washington's Coffee, 1 cup finely chopped pecans, (optional). Put apples, sugar, rind and juice of lemons with butter into upper vessel of double boiler, place over hot water over moderate fire, and when butter is melted add well beaten eggs and cook until thick—about 15 minutes—stirring frequently. When cooked add the G. Washington's Coffee, dissolved in 1 tablespoon hot water, and the pecans if used. When cold spread between layers of cake.

G. Washington's Coffee Frosting ¾ teaspoon G. Washington's Coffee, dissolved in ¾ cup boiling water, grated rind 1 orange, 1 tablespoon orange juice, 1½ cups brown sugar, ½ cup butter, ¾ cup thin cream, 1 egg yolk. Cook together all ingredients except egg yolk until a little tested in cold water forms soft ball. Cool slightly, add beaten egg yolk and beat until thick enough to spread.

you think you can earn a living here in Wapatomac?"

"I don't know. I am going to give it a try. I've got to live somewhere, I suppose, and this is as cheap a place as I'm likely to find. Your father lets me have this house at a very low rent. I suppose he pities me—that's what I am these days—something to be pitied. But that's all right. It is mighty good of him to do it."

She turned then and her eyes were snapping.

"It is the very least he could do," she declared. "If he gave you the whole property, it wouldn't be enough to make up for—oh, but there, that doesn't matter. And don't ask me what I mean, either."

"Maybe I know what you mean. You think it was Cap'n Eliphalet who was principally responsible for my not accepting the Jones & Corcoran offer. Well, in a way it was, and I could never understand why he felt so strongly about it. I always thought he had no use for art or artists. Yet he told my aunt and Mr. Duncan that——"

"Don't. Don't. I know what he told them."

"Well, in a way, it was kind of him to take so much interest. He meant well. And, after all, it was my own stubbornness that made me lose that offer and—and you. I've paid for it, I guess, and serves me right. Now, that's enough about me. Tell me about yourself. You have had a hard time, too, I'm afraid."

She did not answer the implied question. "Oh, I am getting on, after a fashion," she said. "I am well and I am making a living, so I shouldn't complain— Now I must go. Thank you for telling me about—about everything. And, Farley, I want you to promise me that you will treat me just the way you do your other friends in town. Drop in at the store once in a while, and don't hide or run away when we meet. That will be the easiest and surest way to stop gossip and make people forget the things that used to be. Don't you see that it will?"

He consented reluctantly. To treat her as he treated other friends was not likely to be easy.

"I suppose you are right," he admitted. "It is the common-sense way."

She winced a little at the term, but she nodded.

"That's it exactly," she said. "There isn't any foolishness or sentiment, or anything like that, between us now. It is just friendship and common sense. Shut the door after me as quickly as you can. You may need some one to wash your dishes again some time, and so I must get away without being seen. Good night."

THEY met the next noon at the post-office, and those who witnessed the meeting were again surprised at the casual manner in which they greeted each other. Subsequent meetings were quite as every-day and matter-of-fact. Occasionally, when he limped down-town on an errand, he dropped in at the notion shop, but his calls there were short ones and listeners to the conversations found them disappointingly free from reference to the past or anything savoring of sentiment or sensation. Solon Pepper and his fellow boarders summed it up at the Salt dinner-table. Solon said:

"When I first see him hoppin' in there on his crutch, I made it my business to foller along in myself. Made believe I wanted to buy a pocket handkerchief, you understand. Course I didn't, for I've got as much as four good as new handkerchiefs up-stairs in my bureau drawer. But, thinks I, ' 'Twill be kind of interestin' to hear what them two have to say to each other after all these years.' But they didn't say nothin' except talk about the weather and what a lot of fog we're havin' and the like of that. And I've followed him in there two or three times since, and it's always just the same. She don't take any more interest in him than she would in a young one comin' to buy a cent's worth of

ACROBAT DOUBLE WELT SHOES

Keep children's feet as nature made them

Straight Little Toes!

—our first consideration in making children's shoes

ACROBATS have proper room for little toes to grow straight and strong. The perfect, natural fit and flexibility of Acrobats prevent all the foot injury and discomfort frequently caused by stiff, ill-fitting shoes. Flexible, springy soles support and strengthen the arches.

The Acrobat patented "Double Welt" construction gives great advantages in wear and fit. It makes them rip-proof—for uppers and soles are interlocked with hidden triple stitching. It keeps insoles flat and smooth. So, besides perfect comfort for growing feet, Acrobats give unusually long service!—the ideal shoe for active youngsters. Made in attractive styles for babies, boys, girls and young women.

Each pair of Acrobats (sizes 5 to 8) comes in a carton with extra parts to make this attractive little playhouse for the children.

Women especially may well be thankful for it

EVERY enlightened woman is aware that the use of powerful poisons in feminine hygiene is fraught with many dangers. Prominent physicians everywhere are discouraging the employment of bichloride of mercury as well as compounds of carbolic acid.

These and other powerful chemicals are actually a menace to house and home. Their regular use for feminine hygiene can't help being injurious to delicate membranes and tissues. The pity of it is that science has been in the past unable to offer other means of securing real protection against germ life.

But now, women may well be thankful that this old order of things has passed. No longer is the "skull and crossbones" danger necessary in the home. Zonite, the extraordinary non-poisonous germicide, at last opens the way to a new and safe era of feminine hygiene.

This remarkable antiseptic, though more powerful than any dilution of carbolic acid that can be safely applied to the human body, is absolutely non-poisonous. It does not burn the tissues nor toughen them. It has no hardening effect—leaves no scars. Zonite has been investigated and endorsed by prominent authorities. It is used by hundreds of hospitals, and by specialists. Its results are most satisfactory. It gives real protection against germs and, in addition, its action upon sensitive tissues is mildly stimulating and healthful.

As a woman, you will be interested in reading the booklet offered below—written expressly for women. Thousands have sent for it and have been grateful for the helpful information which it contains. Simply fill out the coupon and address it—Woman's Div., Zonite Products Co., Postum Bldg., 250 Park Ave., New York, N. Y.

Zonite, despite its great germicidal power, is absolutely non-poisonous. This form of antiseptic can be used freely in the mouth, nose and throat to kill the germs that cause sore throat, colds and other respiratory diseases.

In bottles at all druggists 50c and $1.00

THE PEEL TRAIT

candy. Not so much, I guess, for the young one would have the cent to spend, and Farley Crowell is right down on his uppers."

Mrs. Salt poured herself a second cup of tea.

"I went into the shop yesterday afternoon," she observed, "and he was there talkin' to her. They were up at the back counter and didn't see me come in, so I had a good chance to hear what they was sayin'. And what do you suppose they was talkin' about? About travelin', goin' to see mountains and waterfalls and sights—those two, of all folks on earth. She said she had always wished she might go to the Grand Canyon. And he agreed with her that it must be an elegant place and he didn't wonder she wanted to go there. Humph! A fine chance either of 'em will ever have to go travelin'. He a cripple and a pauper, and she hardly makin' money enough to keep that little bit of a store open and runnin'. But I suppose they had to talk about somethin' and it might as well be that."

Miss Hercelia Ginn, a comparatively new boarder, leaned forward.

"You don't think they were talkin' about goin' to see that canyon together, do you?" she asked eagerly.

Before Mrs. Salt could reply Captain Ziba Bangs burst into a loud laugh.

"Goin' together would be harder than goin' single, I should say," he declared. "Lettice might walk, but Crowell couldn't do that. You folks are just wastin' your breath. No matter what used to be between those two, there ain't anything now—and never will be."

"What makes you so sure, Cap'n Bangs?" demanded Miss Hercelia. "Sometimes middle-aged people do get married," she added hopefully.

Captain Ziba chuckled.

"I'm sure because I know Lettice," he proclaimed. "She's a Peel and she's got common sense. There would be precious little common sense in her marryin' Farley Crowell—now."

Mr. Pepper wagged a knowing head.

"She married Dave Booker," he said. "There wasn't much common sense about that."

"She thought there was when she married him. And so did Cap'n Eliphalet. That's all the more reason why she'll never marry Crowell. A Peel's foot may slip once, but not twice in the same place."

THAT Summer was the most prosperous Wapatomac had known. New cottages were built, new shops were opened, the number of sojourners from the cities was greater than ever before. The crush of motor-cars in front of the post-office at mail times was so tangled that the selectmen appointed a traffic policeman to handle it. All this rush of prosperity revived anew the project to buy the B house from its owner and bring about the junction of Cross and Water streets. Town Clerk Didlow called again upon Captain Eliphalet Peel and diplomatically renewed the offer of purchase, even raising the figure to nineteen hundred dollars. But the captain would not listen.

"No—no—no, I tell you," he roared. "I don't want to sell and I won't sell as long as I live. I told you so before and now I tell you again. And you can tell the board and be darned to 'em."

"But—but, Cap'n Peel," persisted Noah, "I can't see why you won't. It's a good high price I'm offerin' you, considerin' the state the property's in. I was talkin' with Amarias yesterday, and he's in favor of your sellin'—he says he's told you so. And Abner Crusit says he and his wife think the same."

The testimony concerning the opinions of his son and daughter did not have the effect Mr. Didlow had hoped. Captain Eliphalet pulled at his beard.

"Is that so?" he observed, with surprising cheerfulness. "Well, that's all right. When Amarias and Susanna own the property they can sell if they want to—I sha'n't be here to stop 'em. But," with a chuckle, "they don't own it yet."

Noah reported his failure to the board and added his confirmation of what had been Wapatomac's opinion for some time—that Captain Peel was breaking up. "He is getting childish," declared Didlow. "Sits and laughs, when there's nothin' to laugh at."

There were other evidences of this breaking up all through the Summer. The captain's health was now obviously failing. He stubbornly declared that he was as fit as ever, and was savage in his replies to solicitous inquiries concerning his physical well-being. But he was growing thinner and his stride was shorter and the hand which carried the match to his pipe-bowl shook. Lettice once suggested that he see the doctor, but he scornfully refused. He never called at the notion shop, but every Thursday evening Lettice went up to the B house to sit with him, and he did not appear to resent her visits.

Amarias Peel and Emeline and Susanna Crusit and Abner visited him much oftener.

There had been a time—particularly after David Booker's death and their half-sister had, in their opinion, disgraced the family by going into business—when they and Captain Eliphalet saw but little of each other. He should, so they considered, have then and there refused to have anything more to do with her. They told him so and he again told them to mind their own business. The interview ended in something very like a quarrel and, for months thereafter, the coldness continued. But now it was—outwardly at least—quite forgotten and of late they had been touchingly considerate and attentive to their enfeebled parent. They watched each other closely. If on Tuesday Emeline Peel called at the B house with a gift of "nice new green peas, right fresh from our garden," on Wednesday Susanna Crusit was certain to drop in bearing "a lovely muskmelon I saw down at the fruit store, and I know how you like muskmelon, father." Like Lettice, they recommended the captain's consulting a physician, but, since Amarias's family doctor was of the old school and Susanna's a homeopath, there was a difference of opinion as to which should be employed. And, since Eliphalet refused to employ either, the recommendations came to nothing.

ON A Friday morning in October Lettice, alone at the rear of her little store, heard the outer door open and, coming out from behind the counter, was amazed to see the captain standing at the threshold. It was the first time his foot had ever crossed that threshold.

"Why, father!" she exclaimed, and then added: "You're out early, seems to me."

Captain Eliphalet's answer was a feeble wave of the hand. He was breathing very heavily.

"Shut that door," he gasped. "And—and fetch me a chair. I want to sit down."

She closed the door and brought an armchair from her living-room behind the shop. He sank into it. His appearance shocked her.

"Why, father!" she cried. "How pale you look! What is it? Are you sick?"

He drew a hand across his forehead, knocking his hat to the floor as he did so. She would have picked it up, but he pushed her aside.

"Leave it alone," he commanded. "And get another chair and come to anchor alongside. I want to—I want to talk to you afore anybody comes in. Hurry up, girl! Lively. I—I haven't got much time to waste."

She hurried out once more and returned with the other chair.

"That's it, that's it," he panted. "Now—now you listen to me. I've got some things to say—soon as—soon as I can get this consarned breath of mine back."

She had scarcely taken her gaze from his face. His pallor and the lines beneath his eyes alarmed her.

"Father," she cried again, "what is it? You look sick. You frighten me. I am going to get the doctor."

He seized her arm. "Stay where you are," he ordered. "I don't want any doctor. He couldn't do anything but tell me I was ready for the scrap-pile, and I know that already. I had a mean night, that's all. I've had a lot of 'em lately, but last night was the worst. Well," doggedly, "I was bound I'd keep afloat till to-day, anyhow, and, by godfreys, I've done it. That's me—that's Eliphalet Peel. It takes more than a three-reef gale to run a Peel under. We're oak-ribbed and copper-fastened, I tell you. I—I— Eh?—What was I talkin' about? You're there, ain't you, Lettice? That's you, moored alongside, ain't it?"

She was thoroughly frightened now. She tried to soothe him.

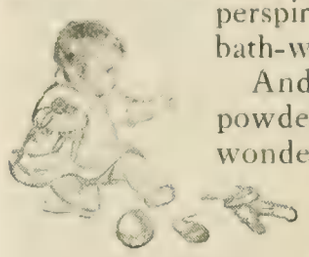
No more pitiful wails



TONIGHT... wouldn't it be wonderful if baby should drowse off into deep, restful sleep... no more pitiful wails of pain... no fretfulness... no getting up in the dead hours of night to soothe the poor little sufferer?

Baby cries because his flower-like skin is miserable — all chafed, or inflamed, or rubbed raw.

Mennen Borated Talcum forms a silky, cooling film over tender infant flesh, protecting it from the agony of friction—from the continual rubbing of damp clothes and bedding and the chafing of baby's own chubby skin-folds.

Because each downy fleck of Mennen's is as porous as a little fairy sponge, it dries all hidden, irritating moisture from the skin. Every last particle of harmful perspiration, urine and bath-water is absorbed.

And in this soft, pure powder are blended five wonderfully mild, healing preparations which help to prevent infection by keeping baby's skin in healthy condition.

Sprinkle Mennen Borated Talcum into the chubby skin-folds frequently. Shower it liberally all over the lovely dimpled body. For it brings relief and comfort to baby and enables mother, too, to protect her health—to get her proper rest and leisure.

Mothers call the Mennen Baby Book the simplest, most helpful work on infants ever published. While the new edition lasts we will send a copy in plain package for only 25c. Write today.

THE PEEL TRAIT

"Yes, of course it is, father," she said gently. "Who else did you think it could be?"

He nodded vaguely. "Eh?" he queried. "Yes—yes, it's you, sure thing. Tut, tut! Pshaw! For half a minute I thought you was that Delia. Yes, I did. Pshaw! That's funny."

Mrs. Delia Berry had been his housekeeper for the past two years. She confided to gossips that hers was no easy berth.

"She's a fool, that woman," he went on. "Kept cruisin' into my room every ten minutes all night wantin' to know if she couldn't do somethin' to make me easier. Huh! I told her to go to the devil, that would make me easier than anything else. She's a numbskull, like two-thirds of this town. Well, I did get down here, didn't I? 'Twas a hard old voyage, but I made it. Yes sir, by godfreys, I made it! I wanted to have a talk with you, Lettice. Eh? You're there, listenin', aren't you?"

"I'm here, father," she told him. "And I am going to listen. But first I want you to let me run out for a minute or two. You sit still and wait for me. I'm coming right back, father."

Once more he caught her arm. "I know where you're cal'latin' to go," he declared impatiently. "You're goin' for that plaguey doctor. Well, you shan't. I haven't got any time to fool away with him. It's you I want to see. Do you suppose I'd have come into this place if I hadn't had to see you? I've never come afore, have I? Sit still, I tell you. If you go for that doctor, I'll head for home—I will! And—and—sit still! Who's cap'n of this ship, tell me, is it you or me?"

HIS voice had risen almost to a shout. Lettice sank reluctantly back into her chair. He nodded approval.

"That's the idea," he panted. "That's a good girl. Now you listen. This has been on my mind for a long spell. I've wanted to say it to you, but 'twasn't so easy to say. Not for me, 'twasn't. I'm a Peel, and humble pie doesn't taste good to a Peel. Lettice, I—I haven't treated you right."

"Now, father, don't! Sit still and rest. Don't try to talk."

"Talk! That's what I came here for—to talk. And I'm goin' to talk. Yes, I am. I am, I tell you! No, Lettice, I haven't treated you right. I wanted to have my own way, and I had it. I cal'lated 'twas the right way then, but it wasn't. It was a fool way. You wanted to marry Farley Crowell."

"Hush, father, please! And what is the use of digging all that up again? I've forgotten it—or, at least, I——"

"No, you haven't forgot it. You've had a grudge against me ever since. And I've had a grudge against myself. Not because you didn't marry Crowell. He's a good-hearted young fellow, but he'll never amount to much, and I knew it. But 'twas the way I maneuvered to get him in wrong with you that bothers me. You never forgave me for it, and I don't blame you. 'Twas a mean trick, I know it now; I've known it for a long time, and I wanted to tell you so while I had the chance. That's part of what I came down here for this mornin'. I'm sorry I did that, Lettice."

"That's all right, father. I knew you were sorry. Now, please——"

"Huh! You did know, eh? Well, maybe you did. You always was smart. You're like your mother—yes, you are. Amarias and Susanna they're smart, too, but it's a different kind of smart. They're like their mother, partly—and partly like me. But you—you're Margaret all over— Here! Where you goin' now?"

"I'm going out on that errand. I am. You mustn't stop me, father."

"Shut up! Heave to there! I will stop you. I ain't through talkin' yet. There's somethin' else I came to say. Lettice, I—I didn't treat you square about Farley. He wasn't the man for you to marry, but—but

Mother Nature—as Health's Guardian

THIS IS the day of the athletic girl, the girl of fair complexion, bright eyes, rose-tinted cheeks. This is the day of HEALTH, and women who allow their systems to become clogged by impurities must pay the piper. Facial blemishes, sallow skins, headaches, constipation, biliousness—a thousand and one joy-destroying ailments follow in the wake of a neglected physical duty. Nature very properly resents such neglect.

Nature's Remedy is really Mother Nature in a pleasant, helpful form—all vegetable and a skillful blend of her own plan of insuring health.

The use of NR Tablets means no less than that an all-wise Mother Nature is ever present, doing those things for you which you may not be doing for yourself—and doing them naturally, normally, and with infinite understanding.

I'm sorry I was the means of your marryin' that Dave Booker. Lettice," he leaned over and touched her arm, "I'm sorry about the way I tricked you, and I'm sorry you feel hard as you do toward me——"

"But I don't—any more."

"Be still! You do, too. And you'd ought to. But here's the other part I came to tell you. Lettice," he added, lowering his voice to a husky whisper, "I've done a little somethin' to make it up to you—yes, I have."

THE tone of almost childishly eager significance in the last sentence would at any other time have aroused her curiosity. But just then she was too greatly alarmed at his condition to heed.

"Yes, yes, of course, father," she said soothingly. "That is all right. And I am all right. You mustn't worry about me."

"Humph! You're the only one I am worried about. Lettice, if I ask you to do somethin'—somethin' that won't hurt you any and will make me die a whole lot easier—will you do it? Eh? Will you?"

"Father—hush! You mustn't talk about dying."

"Humph! All right. I won't talk about it. I need what health I've got left to talk about somethin' more worth while. Lettice, you're a Peel. You're like your mother, but you're part Peel just the same. And, when it comes to the pinch, the Peels steer by common sense. You know that, don't you, Lettice?"

In spite of her anxiety she could not help smiling.

"I ought to know it by this time, father," she replied.

"Humph! You mean you've heard me say it? Well, I have said it and I've tried to live up to it, even though I have made mistakes. But this thing I'm tellin' you now isn't any mistake. I've used my common sense and after they've towed me to the graveyard I want you to use yours. You're goin' to be surprised, Lettice. Yes, you are, and so are some other folks—after a spell. But don't you let your bein' surprised interfere with your good Peel common sense. And don't you let anybody—anybody—talk you out of anythin' that's yours. Promise me you won't."

"Why, father, I——"

"Promise me! You promise me now. D'you hear?"

She had not the least idea what he meant, but his agitation was increasing and she did not dare oppose him.

"Very well. I promise, father," she said. "I will try and be as sensible as I can."

"That's right. Now you're talkin'! And just remember what I've done wasn't done in a hurry. Humph! The others'll try to work on your feelin's. They'll try to get around you and soft-soap you, but don't you let 'em. They'll be mad, but don't you care. They've always looked out for themselves, and all their palaverin' and backbitin' and soft-soapin' and borrowin' money on the quiet haven't helped 'em any. Ah-h!" in scornful impatience, "the pesky fools! Did they suppose, just because I'd come to be a hulk with my bow pointed for the undertaker's, that I couldn't see what they was up to? — Sshh! Somebody's comin'. You go wait on 'em. I'll sit where I be. Yes, do as I tell you!"

It was Miss Octavia Hendricks who was coming up the steps of the notion shop. She wished to buy some tape and ribbon and two or three other items involving careful selection and small expenditure. Reluctantly—very reluctantly—Lettice went to wait upon her, leaving her father seated in the armchair. Once, during Octavia's protracted inspection of the rolls of ribbon and the accompanying matching from samples, Lettice thought she heard him speak.

"What is it, father?" she called, from behind the counter.

He was at the door and she understood him to say that he was just going to get a mouthful of air. When Miss Hendricks had departed, Lettice hurried out to the platform, but he was nowhere in sight. Other customers came and she was detained in the store. At a quarter to eleven Solon Pepper came running in to tell her that her father was very ill He had been down-town early that morning, Solon said, and had returned about nine-thirty and told his housekeeper that he was tired and was going to lie down upon the sofa in the sitting-room. When, an hour or so later, she had gone into the room and spoken to him, he did not reply. He had been unconscious ever since and the doctor said his condition was critical. The Amarias Peels and the Crusits had been summoned and were at the B house already. Lettice must come at once.

That evening Wapatomac had another news item to discuss. Captain Eliphalet Peel was dead.

THE funeral was one of the largest the village had known. The line of automobiles and carriages was like a regular Fourth of July parade, so Mr. Pepper declared. People came from Denboro and Ostable, even from as far away as Bayport, to bid farewell to the man who in his day had been so influential in politics and the affairs of his town and county. In the first carriage were the Amarias Peels, draped in black from head to foot. In the second were the Crusits, and Susanna's crêpe veil was so long that it fluttered in the breeze from the window of the vehicle. Lettice Booker and Lawyer Barnes occupied the third, and when she alighted people noticed and commented upon the fact that, although she wore a black gown, it was not a new one and she did not wear a veil. Amarias and Emeline and Susanna and Abner wept into black-bordered handkerchiefs. Lettice's eyes were moist, but no one heard her sob, and her handkerchief was plain white.

Mrs. Salt, from behind the teapot at the boarding-house table that evening, expressed the opinion of many when she proclaimed:

"Savin' money and lookin' out for the dollars is all right enough, but there is such a thing as carryin' it too far. I don't suppose Lettice Booker was ashamed of herself for wearing that old dress at her father's funeral—if she had been she wouldn't have done it—but when she stood up alongside her half brother and sister and everybody could see how much pains they'd been to, to get rigged right, I was ashamed for her—I was so."

Noah Didlow shook his head. "Maybe she don't believe in goin' into mournin'," he observed. "Some folks don't. Captain Eliphalet didn't, far as that goes. He used to say that a gang of relatives at a funeral all togged out in black doodads and streamers always reminded him of a parcel of turkey-buzzards—them birds he'd seen in the West Indies—roostin' round a sick dog. Both sets, he used to say, was just there waitin' for what was comin' to 'em."

Miss Hercelia Ginn shuddered. "Oh, horrible!" she exclaimed.

Captain Ziba Bangs chuckled. "There's consider'ble common sense to it, though," he declared. "And the captain was strong on common sense, provided 'twas his sense and nobody else's. Lettice, she's pretty sensible, too. Maybe she figgered there wasn't much use in her spendin' money for mournin' when there was precious little chance of any pickin's comin' her way. Amarias and Susanna now—well, I cal'late they expect to get the price of their outfits back when the will's read."

Solon Pepper passed his plate for a second helping of baked beans.

"Don't you cal'late he'll leave Lettice anything?" he asked. "She's his child, after all, just as much as Amarias or Susanna. She used to be his favorite, they tell me."

Mr. Didlow nodded knowingly. In his official capacity as town clerk Noah came to know many things.

"We-ll," he drawled, "I don't suppose I ought to tell this, but bein' as it will all come out pretty soon, maybe there ain't much harm in tellin'. Course I don't know what's happened lately, but a few years ago it came to me pretty straight, from somebody that had seen the old man's will, that he had left all he owned to be divided between Amarias and Susanna."

"And not a thing to Lettice?" gasped Mrs. Salt.

"Say, Noah," Captain Ziba put in, "looks as if the town might have a chance to buy the B house now, don't it?"

Mr. Didlow coughed importantly. "That's town business, Ziba," he said, "and I ain't supposed to talk town business outside of board meetin'."

THAT particular phase of town business was being talked about just then, however, and in places other than the Salt boarding-house. Emeline Peel and her husband had already discussed it and the latter had issued his orders.

"If anybody tries to find out what's goin' to be done with the A B C houses," he commanded, "you tell 'em you don't know. If Susanna or Abner come hintin' around, turn 'em over to me. Don't you say a word."

"Yes, Amarias," meekly agreed his wife. "I will do just as you say. But you are goin' to let the town have the B house, aren't you?"

Amarias winked. "If the town will pay a price for the B house, the town can have it, I guess," he observed. "Susanna and I have agreed on that much. As for the other two houses—well, I don't know. One of 'em, of course, will be mine anyway. But if I could buy the other one from Susanna and get it cheap enough—well, I might buy it, maybe."

Emeline stared. "Buy it?" she repeated. "Buy another one of those old, ramshackle, tumble-down things? What for?"

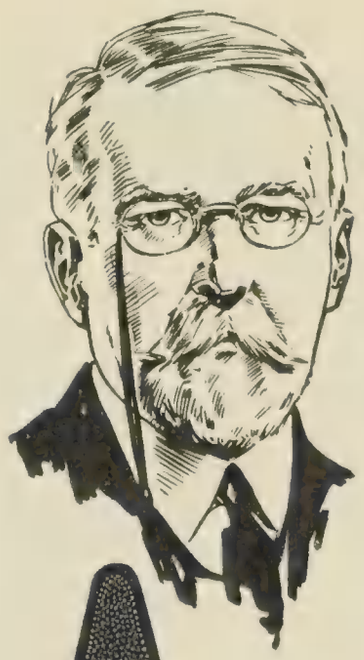
Her husband winked again. "The minute the B house is sold to the town," he said, "the town will tear it down and run Cross Street through to Water Street. That's what the selectmen have been wantin' to do for years. And the minute those two streets come together property on the two corners is goin' to be worth three or four times what it was before. Eh? You didn't think of that, did you? No, I suppose likely not. Well, I've thought of it for a long while."

Mrs. Peel gazed at Amarias in meek admiration.

"My, you're smart," she exclaimed. "I wonder if anybody else has thought of it. Oh, Amarias, do you suppose Susanna has ever thought of it?"

Amarias frowned. The fear that his shrewd sister might have thought that very thing was the fly in the cream-jug of his serenity.

"I don't know," he growled. "If she has, she's never spoken to me about it."



"And—and of course you've never spoken to her?"

"Don't be a fool. Is it likely I would? If I buy that other house of Susanna, I've got to buy it before the town buys the B house. If I don't, she'll want as much for it as I would if it was mine. My chance is to get it before she wakes up to what it's worth. Look here. Don't you mention a word of this to anybody. If you do, you'll hear from me. You keep still."

Emeline promised to keep still. She had no desire to hear from her husband.

CAPTAIN ELIPHALET was buried on a Tuesday, but he and his affairs were talked about all that and the following week. The probable size of his estate became the leading topic of conversation. He was a rich man, all Wapatomac agreed on that point, but just how rich no one as yet knew—no one save, perhaps, Lawyer Norris Barnes, and he would not tell. The Amarias Peels and the Abner Crusits, always important personages in the community, became more important still. Noah Didlow had cautioned his fellow boarders at Mrs. Salt's not to breathe a word of his inside information as to the disposition of the captain's wealth, but, nevertheless, the whole town seemed to know that Amarias and his sister were to inherit that wealth, and that Lettice Booker was to get nothing, or what amounted to nothing. People asked Amarias if he was going to keep on in business, or intended to retire. He sadly shook his head and stated that his grief at his father's death was so keen as to prevent his having given a thought to anything else. At the Shakespeare Reading Society they asked Mrs. Crusit when she was going to take that trip to Europe she had talked of so long. Susanna said she did not know, all she could think about just then was "poor dear father." One or two daring souls dropped in at the notion shop to offer condolences and learn how Lettice was

A Pure Breath

is simply good manners

Millions have turned to this NEW way—scientific protection that you carry with you, always

THERE is no question any more about bad breath. Years ago, it may have been unavoidable. Today, it's judged unpardonable.

Now millions are avoiding this offense in an amazing simple, new way.

What it is

May Breath is an antiseptic mouth wash in tablet form; dainty little tablets that you carry with you.

Dissolve one in your mouth, that is all. Instantly your breath is purified, given the freshness of Maytime.

Not a mere perfume; for that simply cries out your effort at concealment. Not a liquid purifier that can only be used at home. May Breath supplies constant protection in the most convenient way.

* * *

Bad breath comes from so many causes that scarcely one person in fifty escapes it at one time or another.

Stomach disorders may cause it, or food fermenting between the teeth. Certain foods and drinks are peculiarly apt to cause it. Smoking is a chief offender.

* * *

Carry May Breath with you. It's in flat metal boxes that fit into your purse, or a pocket.

Never risk close contact with others, never go to a dance or theatre without taking the precaution of a May Breath tablet.

Send the coupon and we will gladly send you a box free. Then you will know the good it brings.

feeling. But, whatever her feelings may have been, she said nothing and they departed unsatisfied.

ON MONDAY afternoon of the third week Lawyer Norris Barnes walked down Main Street, and those who saw him pass leaned forward to look. The lawyer's expression was grave and his manner, so it seemed to the majority, even more heavily freighted with dignified importance than usual. He was a center of interest to the town just then, and it was quite likely that he knew it. That morning, in his office, an important ceremony had taken place, namely, the reading of Captain Eliphalet Peel's will. Witnesses of that ceremony were few in number, although (had a general invitation been issued) all Wapatomac would have declared holiday and attended. As a matter of fact, the group in the lawyer's office was even smaller than was expected. Amarias Peel and his wife were there—twenty citizens had witnessed their arrival; and Susanna Crusit and Abner were there also. But Lettice Booker, although she had been notified, had remained the entire forenoon in her notion shop. There was speculation and wonder concerning her absence.

As the lawyer moved majestically along Main Street that afternoon, the guess was that bad news was on its way to her. When the loiterers on the post-office steps saw him open the door of the notion shop and enter, the conviction was general that it had arrived. All wished that they, too, might be present in that shop to see how Lettice took it.

There was, as it happened, a third person present during the beginning of that important interview. Farley Crowell was seated in a chair by the ribbon counter, his crutch against his knee, when the lawyer entered the shop. Lettice was behind the candy counter, assisting a small boy in the judicious expenditure of some birthday pennies. The youngster was choosing with a deliberation befitting the importance of the occasion. Birthdays, like Christmas and the Fourth, came but once a year.

Mr. Barnes, solemn and dignified, acknowledged the Crowell greeting with a curt nod. Then, moving over to the candy counter, he raised his hat and cleared his throat.

"Ahem! Mrs. Booker," he said "may I see you for a few moments? On—er—on a matter of business."

Lettice glanced at him. The "Mrs. Booker" was unusually ceremonious, for he had known her since she was a baby.

"I guess you can, Mr. Barnes," she said cheerfully. "I'll be with you in just a minute. Sit down. You and Farley can talk while I'm attending to Eddie here. He has some business of his own and it can't wait." Then turning to her small customer, she asked, "what was it, Eddie? Two of the chocolate sticks, did you say?"

Barnes did not sit. He cleared his throat once more.

"Mrs. Booker," he began again, "I have some news for you."

"Just a minute, Mr. Barnes. There you are, Eddie, and many happy returns of the day."

"Mrs. Booker, the news is—er—very important."

"Coming, Mr. Barnes. Here, Eddie! The candy you bought was six cents and you've left seven on the counter. You'll need the other one before your birthday is over. There, that's all right— Oh, Farley, where are you going?"

Farley was limping to the door.

"I must be getting back home," he said.

But Lettice begged him not to go. There were times when the lawyer's officious pomposity annoyed her and she took a mischievous delight in upsetting it.

"I want you to stay," she again repeated to Farley. "Well, Mr. Barnes, what is this news of yours? Is it bad news?"

"No-o. No, it is not. But it is rather confidential."

"Nonsense! Nothing is confidential in Wapatomac. Never mind Farley. He can keep a secret, if it is necessary. What is it you have come to tell me?"

BARNES was losing his temper. If this woman cared to have her personal affairs trumpeted abroad to the community, it was, after all, no part of his business to interfere.

"It is concerning your father's will," he said bruskly. "Now perhaps you will understand why I speak of it as confidential."

She paid no attention to the last sentence.

"I supposed it must be something like that," she observed. "Well?"

"You will remember, Mrs. Booker, that I urged you to come to my office this morning to listen to the reading of the will—you and the other near relatives. You did not come."

"I couldn't very well, Mr. Barnes. I hadn't anybody to leave here in the store."

"If you had come, you might have found the proceedings—er—interesting. Mrs. Booker——"

"Oh, for mercy's sake, stop calling me 'Mrs. Booker'! You have called me 'Lettice' for thirty-four years. Now what is it? You've come to tell me that Amarias and Susanna are to have the property, of course. That isn't exactly news, Mr. Barnes. I expected it, and so did every one else. Those people over there on the post-office steps who saw you come in here know that you have come to tell me that, and are talking about it this very minute. I am glad that some one else is here to hear the real truth, just as it is. Now go on. I am listening."

Mr. Barnes drew himself erect. "I have not come to tell you anything of the kind," he declared severely. "Your half brother and sister inherit the bulk of your father's estate—yes. But he has left you a very substantial legacy. Ten thousand dollars in gilt-edged securities and the three houses on Water and Cross streets. All that is yours, Mrs.—er—Lettice."

The color which had risen to Lettice's cheeks when she referred to the group at the post-office slowly faded. She caught her breath.

"What!" she cried. "What did you say? Mr. Barnes—Farley——"

But Farley Crowell was already at the door. A moment later they heard the thump of his crutch upon the sidewalk. The lawyer stepped forward, the affront to his dignity quite forgotten.

"Sit down, Lettice," he said kindly. "No, there is no mistake. It is true. Sit down and I will tell you all about it—all I know, which is only what I read in the will."

LETTICE was pale. Her hand, as it sought the chair-back, trembled. Barnes, he should have known better, feared she might be going to faint.

"Let me get you a glass of water," he urged. "I——"

She waved the suggestion aside. "No, no! I am all right," she protested hastily. "I am just—well, upset a little. What was it you said? Ten thousand dollars—to—to me?"

"Yes. And the A B C houses also."

"To me—and not to them? I can't believe it. I didn't suppose—I have always thought—But there! You say it is so and it must be, mustn't it? Why did father do it?"

"I don't know. Of course there was no reason why he shouldn't have done it except——"

"Except every possible reason. Mr. Barnes, didn't he tell you why he did this? He must have. You drew the will."

"Not this will. Some years ago, a year or so after your marriage, I did draw up a will for your father and in that, I may as well tell you, he left everything to your half brother and sister. I supposed, when I opened the envelope in my office this morning, that I should find in it that will, the one I drew. But I didn't. I found another, a much more recent one, drawn by Judge Snow of Ostable and witnessed by his clerks. It was brief enough. It stated that you were to have the three houses and the ten thousand dollars in securities. The rest of the estate was to be divided equally between Amarias and Susanna. It was as much of a surprise to me as it was to—ahem—to them."

The tone of the last sentence caused her to look at him. She smiled faintly.

"They were surprised, I guess," she said.

"They said a good deal," he admitted, smiling too, "but the will is perfectly legal and after all they get the bulk of the estate, so they have no real reason for complaint. Oddly enough, your receiving the ten thousand

The Art of Dusting

By Mrs. Mary Ellen Lang

Every particle of dust sticks to my home-made 3-in-One Dustless Dust Cloth until I shake it out doors. Not a bit is stirred into the air to settle again on furniture and drapes.

My 3-in-One Dustless Dust Cloths are made in a jiffy out of a yard of cheese cloth by sprinkling it lightly with

3-in-One Oil

Then I roll it tight and lay it down for half an hour while I do something else. The oil has now permeated all through the cloth and my wonder worker is ready for use.

3-in-One Dustless Polish Mops are economically made by cutting off the strands of an ordinary twine mop about eight inches from the handle and permeating with 3-in-One.

3-in-One is sold at all good stores in 1-oz., 3-oz. and 8-oz. bottles; also 3-oz. Handy Oil Cans. The 8-oz. bottle is the economical Household size. Contains most for the money.

FREE—Generous sample and illustrated Dictionary explaining 79 uses for 3-in-One in the home. Make your request on a postal.

did not seem to disturb them as much as your coming into possession of the three houses. Amarias, in particular, seemed very resentful on that point."

Lettice shook her head. "That is odd," she mused. "It seems to me that, considering the state those houses are in, they are likely to be more trouble than they are worth."

"Yes, so I should have said. But probably you can sell them for something. The selectmen were at one time thinking of buying the middle one. Perhaps they will do it now. If I can help in any way, you will call on me, of course."

She thanked him. He rose to go.

"I congratulate you heartily," he said. "I am very glad for you. Why your father, who had always entrusted his business to me, as he had to my father before me, should have seen fit to employ an out-of-town attorney to draw that will I confess I can't understand. But doubtless he had his reasons and—I believe I did not mention it—he did appoint me as his executor. Eh? Why, I must be growing old and forgetful. Finding that other will in the envelope in place of the one I had drawn was—er—well, it was rather a shock. I very nearly neglected to give you this. It was in the envelope with the will. As you see, it is addressed to you."

It was another envelope, a small one, and upon it, in Captain Eliphalet's angular handwriting, was inscribed:

"For my daughter, Lettice Booker. Personal and Private. To be opened when she is alone by herself."

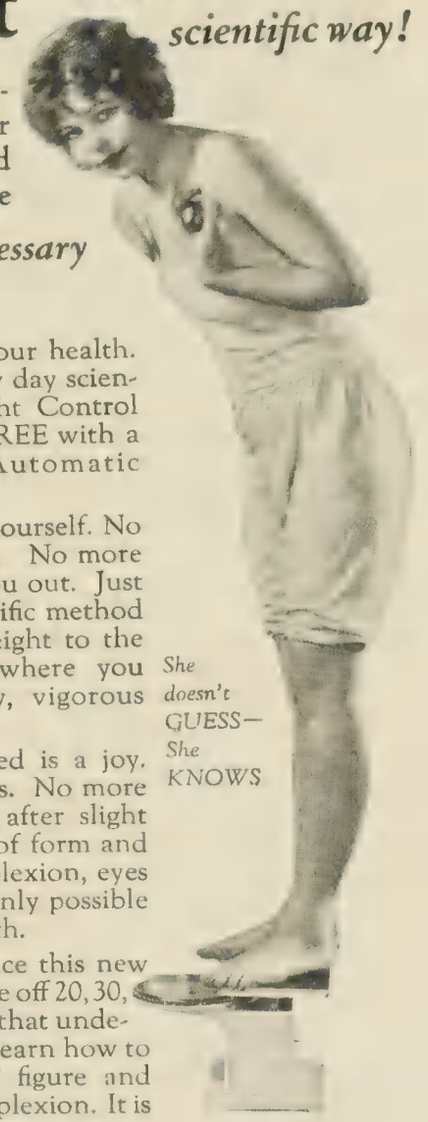
Lettice read the inscription and looked from it to Mr. Barnes.

"What is it?" she asked.

He shook his head. "I don't know," he said, somewhat testily. "Another matter which Captain Peel must have considered too confidential for his executor to see."

HE WENT away then and Lettice, sitting in the chair, looked from the letter in her hand to the rows of boxes upon the shelves behind the counter, seeing neither clearly and trying to realize a little of her changed condition. Ten thousand dollars! Ten thousand! Why, for her it meant safety—a sheet anchor to windward when the storms came. With the income from that and the earnings of the little shop she could get on without the worry which had been hers every night and every day. Ten thousand dollars! And the A B C houses! She gave scarcely a thought to them, until she happened to remember that one of them was the old home, the house in which she was born. And in another Farley Crowell lived. Why, Farley would be her tenant now! How strange that was! She knew he would be glad to hear of her good fortune. Poor Farley! How different their lives had been from the dreams they had dreamed together in the old days!

She sat there, thinking, until a customer came into the shop. Then, tucking her father's letter inside her waist, she rose to wait upon that customer. Before this one's wants had been satisfied, another came. Lettice had a busy afternoon. It was not until she closed the shop at supper time that she found leisure, "alone by herself," to read that letter.



THE will and its contents gave Wapatomac fuel to keep its gossip fires burning for another ten days. Captain Eliphalet's generous legacy to the daughter with whom, as every one knew, he had been on the outs for years had upset many prophecies. Town Clerk Noah Didlow found his position as oracle at the Salt table a good deal shaken. His confidential revelation concerning the disposition of the Peel inheritance had been accepted as conclusive and final and, because it was confidential, about every one present had whispered it—also in strict confidence—to some one else. Now that it had been proven false, the receivers of these confidences were laughing and making irritating remarks. These remarks were transmitted, with accrued interest, to Mr. Didlow, and he did not enjoy hearing them. He endeavored to cover his chagrin by shrugs and veiled hints at further knowledge still unrevealed.

"If the cap'n'd really set out to be so terrible nice to Lettice all at once," he said darkly, "why did he leave her those ramshackle old A B C houses to look out for? There's a nigger in that woodpile—you wait and see if there ain't."

Captain Ziba Bangs sniffed. "Maybe there is and maybe there ain't," he observed, "but old Cap'n 'Liph knew what he was about when he did leave 'em to her. Whatever he did it for, there was sense in it—yes, and good smart shrewdness, or he would'nt have done it. And, anyhow, Noah, if you and that fool Democratic Board of Selectmen buy the B house of her, she'll get somethin' out of one of the three. Eh? Ain't that so?"

Mr. Didlow frowned. "That's the board's business," he declared with dignity. "And, whatever else I may do, I don't talk board matters out in public."

Mrs. Salt now spoke her mind. "Amarias and Susanna realize their father wasn't himself when he changed his will," she said. "Susanna as much as owned up that to me when I spoke to her at League meetin'. But she said they felt 'twas their duty to carry out his wishes and so they will abide by the terms of the will. She was more charitable and resigned than I should have been, considerin' how lovely she and her brother had always been to the cap'n, and how Lettice had treated him, keepin' that pitiful little store—and she a Peel—and hardly goin' nigh him all the time he was breakin' down and dyin', so to speak."

Captain Ziba's chuckle was irritating.

"She went nigh him often as she always did, and no more," he declared. "And I must say I like her better for it. Resigned!" he repeated scornfully. "Amarias Peel and Susanna Crusit resigned when anybody they hate the way they do Lettice gets somethin' they had cal'lated on havin'! Yes, they're about as resigned as a cat is to a pourin'-down rain-storm. They have to set and take it the way the cat does the wettin', 'cause they can't do anythin' else. Abide by the terms of the will? Sartin they will! It's accordin' to law and they can't break it. But they ain't resigned, and if I know 'em, they won't give up tryin' to get Lettice's share away from her. And they'll have a job cut out for 'em! She's a Peel, same as they are. And the best and smartest one of the three, if you ask me."

THIS outburst was received with marked disapproval. Opinion in general sided with Amarias and Susanna. For one reason, they seemed willing to talk when approached by acquaintances, and the charity and resignation mentioned by Mrs. Salt made a favorable impression. Lettice, however, would not talk at all concerning her good fortune. The host of new friends who proved their friendship by visiting the notion shop to congratulate her and ask questions were pleasantly received, but, when they gushed and exclaimed, she was cool and reserved. No one could find out what her plans for the future might be.

"Bah!" exclaimed Solon Pepper, one of the disappointed callers, "you can't warm her up any more than you can an ice-bag. She's as close-mouthed and short-talked as her dad ever was, and that's sayin' consider'ble. And everybody in town'll tell you the same thing. They've all been in to see her."

This was not precisely true. Neither the Amarias Peels nor the Crusits had as yet been in to see her. Nor had Farley Crowell.

But the latter did come. He came early one stormy evening, after Lettice had closed the notion shop and was in her tiny sitting-room at the rear. She had just finished with the supper dishes and was reading, but she heard his halting step upon the walk and recognized it. She opened the door before he knocked.

"Come in, Farley," she said. "Come in and sit down. I knew it was you."

"How did you know?" he asked. Then, guessing the reason, he smiled.

"You heard my crutch, of course," he said. "I usually hit it against something or other. Yes, thank you, I will sit down, though I mustn't stay long. It is beginning to rain. Well, Lettice, I suppose you have been wondering why I haven't been in before."

She nodded. "I have wondered a little," she said. "You are almost the only one who hasn't been in to congratulate me. It is surprising how many friends I have nowadays."

He shook his head. "I imagine so," he told her. "Well, perhaps that was my reason for not coming. I didn't want you to think I was that kind of friend."

"I never did think so."

"I'm glad of that. But I do congratulate you, Lettice. No one can be gladder than I am. I wish it had been a hundred thousand, instead of ten. You deserve all the good luck that can come your way."

"Much obliged. But tell me truly, why didn't you come before? Surely you didn't really believe I would think you were like Solon Pepper—and some of the others. I expected you, and I was disappointed when you stayed away."

He hesitated. "Well, I'll tell you," he said. "I have been thinking and it seemed to me that the less you saw of me the better. You are well off now——"

She laughed and interrupted. "Ten thousand dollars isn't a Vanderbilt fortune exactly," she said.

"No, but it is a good deal, compared to—well, it is a good deal more than nothing. And there is another thing—something every one is bound to talk about. I am your tenant now. Have you thought of that?"

"Of course I have. What of it?"

"Why, just this. You own the A B C houses. They are all wondering what you will do with them."

"I suppose they are. Well, I have wondered a little myself."

"Naturally. And that brings me to what I wanted to say. Lettice, if you have a chance to sell those houses—yes, or to rent the one I am in to better advantage, I want you to promise me you will do it. You mustn't let any thought of me interfere at all. Will you promise that?"

She did not answer for a moment. Then she said: "You seem to think there is some likelihood of my selling. Who would want to buy those old tumble-down places?"

"Somebody might. Lettice, I suppose you know that the town tried very hard to buy one of them—the B house—at one time? Your father would not sell."

She nodded. "Yes," she admitted, "I know that. In fact—" She paused and did not finish the sentence, adding instead, "The B house was my old home. I was born there and—and I was happier in that house than I have ever been since. I don't know that I want to sell it."

"You mean that you may go there to live again?"

"I might—some day—perhaps."

"I thought of that. And that makes me feel all the more certain that my living in the C house—a next-door neighbor—would not be the best thing for you. I believe that I had better look for other quarters. I'm going to do that very thing."

"I don't see why."

"Oh, yes, you do! Now here—this is possible—suppose I couldn't earn enough to keep going? Suppose I got behind with my rent? You wouldn't put me out, of course."

She smiled. "I might," she said again. "You don't know how hard-hearted a landlady I might be."

"I know you wouldn't. And, if I left—as of course I should do under those circumstances—there would be more talk, and you would feel badly and think you hadn't treated me right. The whole business is going to be embarrassing for both of us. I'm going to move as soon as I can find another place."

SHE leaned her chin upon her hand and regarded him steadily.

"You are a queer kind of friend, it seems to me," she said. "You were quite willing to be father's tenant and live next door to him. But you want to run away from me."

He stirred uneasily. "Don't speak like that," he said. "You know why I want to run away—or ought to want to. As to friendship—well, ours means so much to me that I just can't take chances with it. So I'm giving you formal notice, Lettice. As soon as I find a place that is vacant—and cheap—

Sure Way to Get Rid of Dandruff

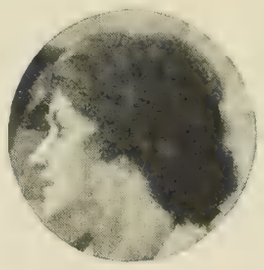
There is one sure way that never fails to remove dandruff completely, and that is to dissolve it. Then you destroy it entirely. To do this, just apply a little Liquid Arvon at night before retiring; use enough to moisten the scalp and rub it in gently with the finger tips.

By morning, most, if not all, of your dandruff will be gone, and two or three more applications will completely dissolve and entirely destroy every single sign and trace of it, no matter how much dandruff you may have.

You will find, too, that all itching of the scalp will stop instantly, and your hair will be lustrous, glossy, silky and soft, and look and feel a hundred times better.

You can get Liquid Arvon at any drug store, and a four ounce bottle is all you will need.

This simple remedy has never been known to fail.



LIQUID ARVON

Corns

Lift Off – No Pain!

Doesn't hurt one bit! Drop a little "Freezone" on an aching corn, instantly that corn stops hurting, then shortly you lift it right off with fingers. Your druggist sells a tiny bottle of "Freezone" for a few cents, sufficient to remove every hard corn, soft corn, or corn between the toes, and the foot calluses, without soreness or irritation.

I'm going to move into it. And we'll keep on being friends just the same."

She was still looking at him intently. Apparently she had paid little attention to what he had just said.

"Farley," she asked, "will you answer a very personal question? One about your own private affairs?"

"Yes. Of course I will."

"How much do you make, from your sign painting and the windmills and the rest in, say, a year?"

He was surprised, but his reply was prompt.

"Last year," he said with a smile, "I figure that I cleared about eight hundred dollars. Not a tremendous salary for a man of my age, but I keep hoping I may do better, and even that is as much as I ever made from what I used to call my art."

He naturally expected her to make some comment on the statement, but she did not. She said nothing.

"That is the size of my net income," he went on. "Why did you ask about it?"

"Because—oh, because I was interested. So you are going to move out of the C house?"

"Yes. As soon as I can find somewhere else to go. And remember your promise to put me out sooner, if you have a chance to sell or get a higher rent."

"I didn't make any promise, but I will think the matter over. And you must promise not to make any decision—about moving, I mean—without letting me know first. Will you do that?"

"Yes, if you want me to."

"All right. Now we'll talk of something pleasanter."

They did. He asked if she had made any definite plans concerning her own future. Would she keep on with the notion shop?"

"I shall have to," she said. "The income from ten thousand dollars doesn't make me independent. And what else is there?"

"Well, you might sell the A B C houses—or rent them."

"Only one of them is rented at present, and that tenant has given me notice."

At the door, as he was saying good night, she gave him another bit of information.

"There is one thing I haven't told you," she said. "I was asked not to tell, so you must keep it to yourself. Mr. Didlow was in the shop this afternoon. He was sent by the selectmen to see if I would consider selling the B house to the town. He offered me two thousand dollars for it."

"Oh, did he? Well, I'm not surprised. What did you tell him?"

"Just what I told you, that I wasn't sure I wanted to sell. I'm not sure. Besides," with a twinkle which was reminiscent of many that he had seen in the eyes of Captain Eliphalet Peel when a trade was in question, "I may think that it will pay to wait. I doubt if Mr. Didlow has made his final offer yet."

FARLEY limped back to his lonely quarters in the C house in a low state of mind. He had been absolutely sincere in his determination not to remain in that house as Lettice Booker's tenant. The complications which might arise would certainly be embarrassing for them both, and his statement to her was the result of careful deliberation and honestly made.

But her reception of it was something of a shock. If she had refused to listen to his ultimatum, he would of course have persisted in it, for his mind was made up on the point. But he had not expected her to accept it in quite such a businesslike fashion and with, it seemed to him, little more than a perfunctory protest. He tried to be philosophical. After all, it was a business matter and there should be no sentiment in it. But he was hurt and disappointed, nevertheless.

By morning he had made up his mind not only to move from the C house as soon as he could, but, if possible, to move from Wapatomac. It made little difference where.

Now! You can darken Gray Hair

GRAY HAIR may become some few people but in all cases gray hair denotes age and, oh, how we dislike to be called old! After all a person is only as old as he or she looks and we all want to look as young as possible.

For those to whom youth is dear and precious and necessary, we now make it possible to hide those tell-tale gray hairs; to darken the hair so no one will know—not even your most intimate friends and associates unless you choose to tell them.

Even Your Friends Won't Know!

A frank discussion of the subject will interest you. Many people who are gray have been trying everything, only to find that most of the rapid hair "dyes" give a metallic, dull and lifeless cast that is far from natural in appearance. Besides, the change in color is so abrupt that everyone notices it.

Perhaps, you are confused by the claims made for the countless gray hair preparations. You are entitled to know the facts so that you can choose the kind you wish to use without experimenting. There are many preparations that will change the color of your hair "overnight" or in "fifteen minutes." No doubt they do so but they are dyes and work the same way that you dye a piece of cloth, except that hair dyes do not do the job so well. We hardly think you want to use that method—it simply advertises the fact that you are using something on your hair. Now there is a better way—

The Q-ban Way

Now Q-ban Hair Color Restorer works differently. It has certain chemical components that, when applied to the hair according to simple and easy directions, cause a slow darkening of color—a change so gradual that it takes place unnoticed by your friends and the dark color has a natural appearance. Although slow, the action of Q-ban Hair Color Restorer is positive and seldom fails. It is safe to use and is not messy—a clean, daintily scented liquid used in the privacy of your home without fuss or trouble. You will like Q-ban, and you will not be experimenting, for millions of bottles have been used by hundreds of thousands of gray haired people during the last twenty-five years.

Just do this: Purchase a 75-cent bottle of Q-ban Hair Color Restorer of your druggist. See that the hair and scalp are thoroughly clean and free of any other preparation that you may have been using. Apply Q-ban liberally to each lock of hair. Allow hair to dry, preferably in bright sunlight, in daylight if possible, but do not rub off. Apply Q-ban Hair Color Restorer each day for a week, putting nothing else on the hair meanwhile.

First cleanse hair and scalp

Apply Q-ban to each lock

After seven or eight applications you will see a gradual change. Make two applications the second week and only occasionally thereafter. A slow and sure darkening of the hair will take place and your associates will not have noticed it. Sometimes the process requires several weeks, sometimes one bottle and then again several bottles. But you use only the one preparation to darken the hair—Q-ban Hair Color Restorer, 75 cents the bottle, under money-back guarantee to please you.

An ELIZABETH ARDEN Treatment

Says Elizabeth Arden

THE first step in every treatment of the skin is a thorough cleansing. This should be done by applying Venetian Cleansing Cream with upward lifting strokes. With just the warmth of the skin this pure light cream melts into the pores, where it dissolves and dislodges all the impurities which clog them, leaving the skin fresh, soft and supple. Then pat with Ardena Skin Tonic to tone, firm and whiten the skin.

Remove Cold Cream

this new way stage stars know

IF you have been using towels to remove make-up, you will be glad to know of this new way that practically all actresses employ today.

They know the importance of a clear, charming complexion. They know that clean towels and rags often carry germs, bits of free soap caustic. And that these cause pimples, blackheads, skin eruptions.

This new way is Kleenex, a velvety soft absorbent made of Cellucotton. Today it is being used universally by women who want to have lovely skins. It is the scientific way to remove cold cream and cosmetics. It is sanitary, nice—and inexpensive.

Kleenex is so economical that after using it, you discard it—simply, without bother—just like a piece of tissue. Today, get Kleenex at all drug and department stores. A 25c box contains about 200 sheets (size 6 by 7 inches)—enough for about a month.

Deaf Can Hear Says Science

New Invention Aids Thousands

Here's good news for all who suffer from deafness. The Dictograph Products Corporation announces the perfection of a remarkable device which has enabled thousands of deaf persons to hear as well as ever. The makers of this wonderful device say it is too much to expect you to believe this so they are going to give you a chance to try it at home. They offer to send it by prepaid parcel post on a ten-day free trial. They do not send it C. O. D.—they require no deposit—there is no obligation.

They send it entirely at their own expense and risk. They are making this extraordinary offer well knowing that the magic of this little instrument will so amaze and delight the user that the chances of its being returned are very slight. Thousands have already accepted this offer and report most gratifying results. There's no longer any need that you should endure the mental and physical strain which comes from a constant effort to hear. Now you can mingle with your friends without that feeling of sensitiveness from which all deaf persons suffer. Now you can take your place in the social and business world to which your talents entitle you and from which your affliction has, in a measure, excluded you. Just send your name and address to The Dictograph Products Corporation, Suite 1302-K, Candler Building, New York, for descriptive literature and request blank.

Keep young by FACE MOLDING

INTELLIGENT women know that mere surface treatment cannot preserve a youthful contour or the charm of a lovely skin. To do this it is necessary to stimulate and nourish the underlying muscles.

That is just what Face Molding, the scientific treatment originated by Primrose House, New York's smartest beauty salon, actually does. Sagging and wrinkles quickly yield to its influence and the use of the famous Primrose House Preparations, which have been also scientifically developed to accomplish definite results.

Face Molding can be easily applied in your own home. Even one treatment will convince you how effective it is. Ask about it and the Primrose House Preparations at any leading department store or smart shop.

A visit to Primrose House, if you happen to be in New York, will prove a delightful revelation.

Primrose House Bleach Cream

A remarkably effective cream for toning and clearing the skin. Removes discolorations, freckles and brown spots on face, neck and hands. At leading stores or mailed direct on receipt of price, $3.50.

Send for "Here Dwells Youth," a helpful book which tells about the best ways to develop beauty and charm. Mailed free.

Behind the Scenes with Hutchinson

For the benefit of readers who will be "discovering" A. S. M. Hutchinson for the first time next month—and how we envy them!—we briefly review a few facts about his life that may lend added interest to the reading of his newest serial novel, "The Increasing Purpose." Arthur Stuart Menteth Hutchinson was born in 1879 in India, where his father, General H. A. Hutchinson, of the British Army, was stationed at the time. Young Arthur grew up with the expectation of following the profession of his father and two brothers, but defective eyesight made that an impossibility. His alternative choice, the profession of medicine, was abandoned after two years of study at St. Thomas's Hospital in London, an experience that provided the delightful character of the young medical student in Mr. Hutchinson's first novel, "Once Aboard the Lugger," published in 1908. Four years later came "The Happy Warrior," with its theme based on Wordsworth's poem. This was the story that began to make a reputation for its author among discerning fiction readers on both sides of the Atlantic. It was followed in 1914 by his third novel, "The Clean Heart"—and then came the War. Mr. Hutchinson promptly enlisted as a private, saw service in several important campaigns and was eventually promoted to the rank of captain. After his enlistment, he resolved never to return to literature, but a story took hold of his imagination, grew as if by magic, and was a full-grown novel ready to be put on paper after the signing of the Armistice. Such was the origin of "If Winter Comes"—a book that at once became a best-seller and firmly secured its author's reputation. In 1922 his next work, "This Freedom," appeared serially in THE DELINEATOR. Echoes are still heard of the controversy it stirred up among readers who took sides for or against the author's implied contention that the woman who tries to have both a career and a home pays heavily for her freedom. In "The Increasing Purpose" Mr. Hutchinson has written a love story with a deep spiritual significance. Readers of his other novels will need no further description of it. As for the newcomers—we can only repeat that we envy them the thrill of discovery.

Glands and Health

Modern medicine has made conspicuous progress in recent years in exploring the functions of the internal secretions and their effect on health. Some of the discoveries about the parts played by the ductless glands were sensational enough to be quickly seized upon by the uninformed and widely published in such a way as to give misleading impressions. It is now definitely known that our growth and physical development, our thoughts, our feelings and our behavior are influenced by the secretions of our glands. There remains much to be learned, however, about controlling these secretions and remedying glandular defects. All that the lay reader need know to be abreast of current medical progress in this field is contained in an article by Dr. Lwellys Franklin Barker in next month's DELINEATOR. Doctor Barker is emeritus professor of medicine at Johns Hopkins University and visiting physician to the Johns Hopkins Hospital. As ex-president of the Association for Study of Internal Secretions he ranks high as an authority on a subject that provides the key to the sources of many hitherto mysterious ailments.

Gardening Made Easy

First aid to the amateur gardener has never been so adequately assembled in so compact and thorough a way as in the Gold Medal Garden chart now available to DELINEATOR readers. On a heavy sheet of tough-fibered paper, twenty-nine by twenty-three inches, is a picture plan of the back-yard garden that won THE DELINEATOR prize at the International Flower Show in 1924. Along with the plan for the arrangement of flowers and vegetables is a step-by-step garden calendar for every month from February to December, with directions for marking out beds, fertilizing, planting and cultivating. Specifications and descriptions of all the seeds and plants required are listed in minute detail, with estimated costs. The very moderate charge made for the chart will be more than offset by the satisfaction of developing a garden with the assistance of the most expert advice obtainable. Under the heading "Ask THE DELINEATOR," on another page, are directions for ordering.

IF — ? ? ASK — ! !

IF YOU HAVE A QUESTION ABOUT HOME-MAKING—about new equipment for your kitchen, or properly balanced diet for your family, or making a budget for more economical living—
Ask Miss Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of THE DELINEATOR'S Home-Making Department.

IF THE QUESTION CONCERNS HOUSE DECORATION—the color of your window drapes, the arrangement of furniture in your living-room, the finishing of your walls—
Ask Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, Head of THE DELINEATOR'S House-Decoration Department.

IF YOU WANT ADVICE ABOUT YOUR CHILD—a correct health program for Winter weather, a report on epidemics to be guarded against—
Ask Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw, Director of THE DELINEATOR'S Happy Child Department.

IF IT'S "GOOD LOOKS" THAT INTERESTS YOU—personal problems of complexion and appearance, new creams and perfumes—
Ask Celia Caroline Cole, THE DELINEATOR'S Beauty Consultant.

OR IF IT'S A QUERY ABOUT DINING YOUR GUESTS about customs at weddings or manners in company—
There's Mrs. John Cabot Kimberley to ask—THE DELINEATOR'S Adviser in matters of Entertainment and Etiquette.

When you think of THE DELINEATOR, think of these people. They are your friends—experts whose advice is yours to command. Turn back through the pages of this book and see what special services they offer you this month.

MIX and SERVE

Edited with Willing Hands and a Mean Pencil by a Mere Man

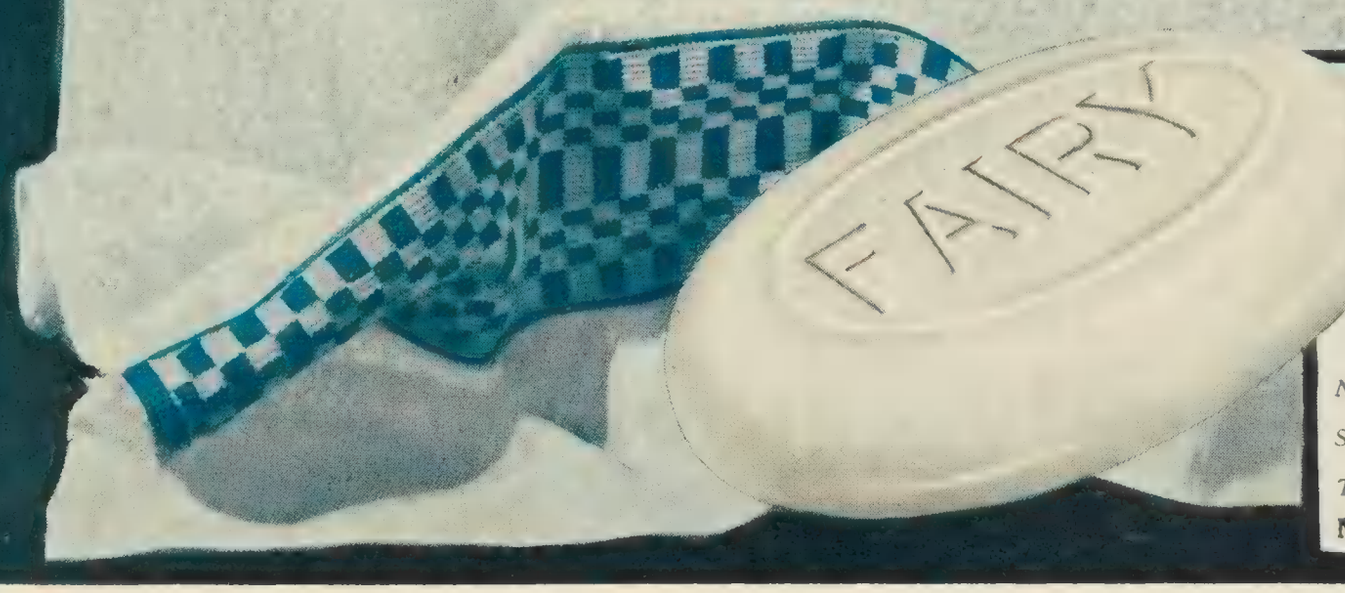
FROM Concordia, Kansas, comes the story of an old-fashioned mother who nearly broke up a woman's club meeting when asked to tell how she brought up children. We spared no expense to get a transcript of her brief and pointed speech, which was as follows: "I feed 'em good, old-fashioned food like bread and milk, mashed potatoes, fried steak, mush, vegetable soups, pancakes and pie. When they want to wade in the mud, I let 'em. If they don't get up when I call 'em or try sassing me or doing something I've warned 'em not to do, I cut off a peach sprout and give 'em a good tanning. I get out and romp with 'em every day, if I have time. When they get a stomach ache, I dose 'em myself. That's about all I do to keep 'em in line, except that if they get in bad with the teacher at school I usually find out why; and if the teacher's licked 'em, and they needed it, I give 'em another, so's they'll remember it. And they really do pretty well" ◈◈◈ Our reading of the Happy Child series in this great family paper has inspired an invention of our own which we expect will give many a weary mother more time for the movies and her bridge club. It is nothing less than a device for washing the baby and is patterned after a dish-mop, but instead of a wad of yarn on the end there will be a gob of shredded coconut dyed with harmless vegetable colors, blue for boys and pink for girls. Then if the little dear puts it in his mouth (which he probably will) there will be no harm done ◈◈◈ The courts of Newark, New Jersey, have been called upon to determine if bouillon is soup and an apple tart a pie. The proprietors of a restaurant sought a restraining order to prevent a druggist, tenant in the same building, from selling pie and soup. The druggist contended that tarts and bouillon, which were sold at his soda fountain, were quite different from pies and soups and that therefore he was not violating the terms of his lease prohibiting him from competing with the restaurant ◈◈◈ Another savory food item we found in a copy of the News Letter, published by the faculty and students of Iowa College, at Grinnell, in 1880. One of the business locals reads: "To students who are boarding themselves we would call attention to the fact that there is more nourishment in one quart of Thayer's hot peanuts than in a pound of beefsteak" ◈◈◈ In the same issue appears an ad. reading: "Students wanting cow pasturage can obtain it on reasonable terms. Careful provision made for calves. Special prices given to the botany class" ◈◈◈ Those of our fair pewholders who have been won over to the cause of equal rights for both sexes, so consistently favored in this column, will readily see the significance of a deplorable condition of things that exists in the enlightened state where our favorite woman's magazine is published. The quotation is from a much longer summary by a legal bigwig: "When a married woman resides with her husband in a house which they occupy as a home, she does not thereby render herself liable for the rent of the house or the value of its use and occupation. Even if the lease for the house be made out in the wife's name, the fact is not considered proof that she authorized the leasing, and she is not liable for the rent, even though she lives under such a lease. If the husband leases a house in his own name, and leaves it during the term, and the wife thereupon offers to pay the rent, she is not even then liable" ◈◈◈ We might add, from our own observations, that if the wife were brought into court she would be promptly acquitted, presented with a floral horseshoe, and deferentially bowed out on her way to be photographed in her sheerest chiffon stocking for the rotogravure section of the Sunday papers ◈◈◈ A novel millinery ornament that recently stopped traffic in Atlantic City, New Jersey, was a gilded turkey-claw pompon worn on a velvet hat of the cloche variety. We see no reason why one of our fair pewholders couldn't cut quite a figure on Main Street by appropriating the idea ◈◈◈ The first cross-word puzzle widow we have heard of is a Chicago lady who asked for a divorce because her husband spent so much time on puzzles that he had no time to work for her support. The judge reconciled the couple after exacting the husband's promise to refrain from doing more than three puzzles a day ◈◈◈ Other puzzle fans are now invited to read the following sentence to see what four-letter word is wrong: "I seen your advertisement in THE DELINEATOR." ◈◈◈

The BATH SOAP

FAIRY SOAP

Dispel Your Morning Drowsiness!

DR. EDMUND C. GRAY, noted authority on natural hygiene says:



". . . . . Start the machinery of the body working at full force by two minutes under the warm shower and one minute under the cold—or have four inches of warm water in the tub and quickly splash the entire body with the hand, sponge or cloth and follow with a cold splash, then dry the body by hand friction"

This bath will enable you to start the day with a "bang" and "carry on" till dusk.

To be rid of that morning heaviness you must re-awaken the nerves, open the skin pores and let out the "fatigue poisons".

Fairy Soap helps to eliminate all waste matter by awakening healthful skin activity. It helps Nature to regulate the pores and aids them to function properly.

Fairy Soap is an absolutely pure soap, made especially for the bath.

MONEY REFUNDED IF NOT SATISFACTORY

Today—all your clothes deserve the care you give to fine fabrics—

FOR years and years your darling blouses, your exquisite hosiery in its myriad shades, your filmy lingeries—have been like new again after each washing!

Silk sweaters, fresh and unstretched, at the end of the season—costly little sports suits with their flannel soft and unshrunken—Lux took care of them all!

Today that same good Lux works its magic with all your laundry. For nowadays every single thing of yours that's washable is so nice it simply cannot be trusted to ordinary soap!

Today your gay little house dresses, your sweet muslin underclothes, the children's darling little ginghams, bright as Easter eggs, your nice sheets and fine, monogrammed towels—all must go into plentiful, softly cleansing Lux suds! These sparkling suds keep the colored pieces so fresh and unfaded, the sheets and towels so snowy white! Everything is like new again.

And with even everyday things so expensive nowadays, they just have to be taken care of. And how faithfully they wear when you use Lux! Each fibre is so tenderly cleansed by Lux—cottons and linens respond to this just as much as woolens and silks.

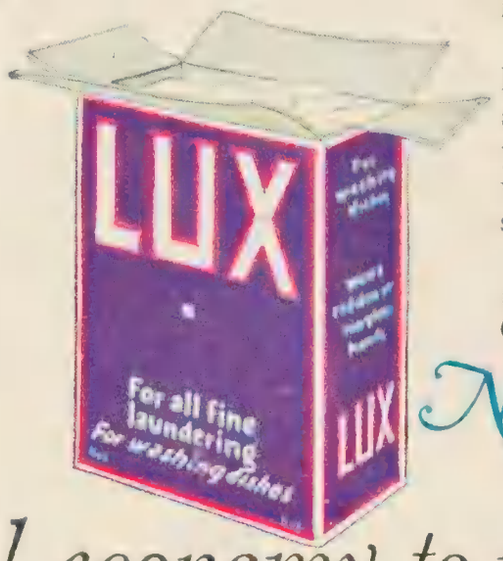
So little Lux will do your biggest wash —do you realize?

A whole tub brimming with swirling, cleansing suds—plentiful, thorough Lux suds that foam softly through each fibre of the garment you dip lightly in and out—all from that little bit of Lux you use!

You know what amazing suds even a speck of Lux has always given you! That's why Lux is so economical for your laundry—you really need so little. When you look at that great pile of snowy clothes—it seems like magic that it took so little Lux

And your hands—everyone who uses Lux knows how blessed its velvet suds are after stinging kitchen soap! Whether you're washing just a bit of finery or the whole laundry Lux leaves your hands sweet and soft.

Lux won't harm anything pure water alone won't harm. Lever Bros. Co., Cambridge, Mass.



Sports Clothes of Silks and fine Woolens

Whisk one tablespoonful of Lux into thick lather in half a washbowl of hot water. Cool to lukewarm. Press suds repeatedly through soiled spots. Rinse in three lukewarm waters. Squeeze water out—do not wring. Roll in towel—when nearly dry press with warm—never hot—iron.

To wash blankets, 2 tablespoonfuls of Lux to every gallon of water for rich, live suds, necessary. Dissolve Lux thoroughly, whisk thick lather, cool to lukewarm. Press suds through soiled spots—never rub. Rinse in three or more lukewarm waters. If possible let blankets drip dry—it makes them fluffier. Never twist them. To avoid stretching, hang blanket double, lengthwise, pinning at regular intervals.

Important Uses for Lux

In addition to the well-known uses—washing silks, woolens, fine cottons and linens—use Lux for dishes, the family laundry, shampoo, babies' milk bottles, paint, porcelain, woodwork, rugs and linoleum.

Now the Big New Package too

A little Lux goes so far it's a real economy to use it

There is only one "Congoleum." It is manufactured by Congoleum-Nairn Inc., and identified by a Gold Seal pasted on the surface of every pattern. All "Seconds" are identified by a Red Label.

As the sale or representation of any other make of floor-covering as "Congoleum" is a violation of the law, we will pay $100 to any person who will secure evidence that will lead to the conviction of anyone guilty of this practice.

If you want the genuine ask for it by the registered trade-mark name "Congoleum" and look for the Gold Seal.

For the summer porch, too— Congoleum Rugs are just the thing!

INDOORS and out, seashore or mountains, nothing provides such an all-round satisfactory covering for floors as these popular, inexpensive rugs.

On the porch—sunshine and driving rain, the accidents of many porch parties mean little to the Congoleum Gold-Seal Rug. For the rich colors are fadeless, the material itself sturdy and long-wearing. No fastening is ever required to keep them in place. They hug the floor; never curl at the corners or ruffle up, even in the stiffest breeze.

Congoleum Gold-Seal Rugs have many advantages not found in fibre or fabric rugs. No tiresome back-breaking sweeping is ever needed. Dirt, tracked-in mud and spilled things cannot stain or penetrate the smooth, sanitary surface. A few whisks of a damp mop leave the lovely colors of your Congoleum Rugs as bright as new.

Then, such a wide choice of artistic designs! Dainty floral patterns in gay chintz or soft pastel tones, sumptuous Oriental motifs and neat tile and wood-block effects—to suit any room in the house.

A WOMAN'S VICTORY FOR WOMEN

IN ITHACA, New York, the other day a bloodless revolution was ended by a capitulation so glorious that those who come after us may pause to tell the tale of how a humble home laid siege to a great university, seeking a way in every crevice, peering through every loophole, until after twenty-five years of knocking at the gate the portals fell apart. And, behold, the little home was no longer outside but within, one and incorporate with the great university; the humble suppliant for knowledge had become the acclaimed teacher.

The modern miracle, for miracle it was which converted the School of Home Economics of Cornell into the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University, centers about Martha Van Rensselaer, whose work supplied the vital spark. But when Governor Smith signed the bill which made the metamorphosis a fact—on the very day, too, which celebrated Miss Van Rensselaer's silver anniversary at Cornell—he did more than crown a woman, and through her exalt the sex. He killed a superstition which, while not listed as cruelty under the penal code, perhaps has done much to condemn women to invalidism.

In the minds of most men a legend has long existed that connects continuous and back-breaking housework with health and translates drudgery into beneficial exercise. The fantastic notion has obtained that a woman, standing constantly through long hours in an overheated kitchen, washing at tubs below her normal reach, lifting heavy utensils, churning, cooking and patrolling her prison in a never-ending routine, was thereby acquiring strength. This is the indictment that stands against an army of otherwise good husbands down the ages. But for the alertness of one woman it might still be claiming its victims among the housewives of the rural districts who knew life only as work unrelieved by rest or joy.

The New York State College of Home Economics signalizes the victory of Martha Van Rensselaer over a prejudice as old as the race itself. For a quarter of a century she has labored to establish the kitchen as a definite factor in education. She has been coupled with that other American, John Howard Payne in the interpretation of "Home, Sweet Home," for while his are the beautiful words that have fired the heart through the years with the promise of love unchanged and unchanging, it is Martha Van Rensselaer who has lifted that home, be it ever so humble, to new effectiveness as a vital factor in the nation's making.

Everybody knows the story, and above all THE DELINEATOR'S readers, who claim her as their own, of how as a young school-teacher and school supervisor in Cattaraugus County, New York, Miss Van Rensselaer, herself of country stock, saw the suffering and needs of the women of the farms, and for the first time made articulate their cry for the real home. At the instance of the school authorities and the invitation of Cornell she set to work on a plan to teach farm women kitchen lore, as their husbands had been instructed in better farming. But instead of compiling recipes and talking chemistry and giving harangues on baby-tending, this practical woman blew up her problem with a practical solution. She put a pedometer on an untrained housekeeper in an average sort of home up in Ithaca, and discovered to her dismay that in three days the housekeeper walked twenty miles in doing her work, an average of nearly seven miles a day.

So this ordinary home became for a while Miss Van Rensselaer's laboratory. She studied every step a woman takes in her household tasks. By serious thought and experiment she then found means of eliminating hours of toil and back-breaking, needless labor. At the end of a few months, without spending any money for equipment, but by intelligent arrangement of that household, she had reduced the weary three-day round from twenty miles to fourteen.

Then by the purchase of a few small pieces of equipment, such as an extra broom, mop and dust-cloth for the second floor to save dragging this equipment up and down stairs, she further reduced it from fourteen miles to eleven.

She discovered that a double drain-board cut dishwashing in two, and, working with the Government and other State college specialists, she finally helped to develop a scientific standard for the height of the kitchen sink and the ironing-board. These are just a few of the many practical, unromantic, but gloriously useful accomplishments of Martha Van Rensselaer. It is significant that, having undertaken to simplify housework, she at once concerned herself with the rightful use of the hours or minutes saved to the houseworker. Almost immediately she began a program for recreation in the family and suggested plans for cultural reading, house decoration and better living.

It was in a bare little office, with two chairs and a table, made possible by the sympathetic understanding of Liberty Hyde Bailey, Dean of the State Agricultural College, that Miss Van Rensselaer began her work at Cornell. In the quarter century that has passed those surroundings have changed to a million-dollar plant. Boys and girls, men and women, are now among the pupils; there are nurses, dietitians, hotel-managers, teachers, farm folk and city students in all departments of home study. A practise house, which is a model home, and a baby (a fortunate infant adopted each year, for the training of the students under proper supervision) are part of the equipment. The School of Home Economics has been an integral part of the University since 1907, when Miss Van Rensselaer, now with a degree of Bachelor of Science, was given the chair—the first woman in the university faculty. From the beginning she has had the able assistance of Miss Flora Rose. Back in Martha Van Rensselaer's childhood even the name of Home Economics was unknown. That title was coined by Dean Bailey after this pioneer had begun her work at Cornell.

Martha Van Rensselaer not only helped to found the College of Home Economics at Cornell, but she helped Mr. Hoover to organize the food-conservation campaign during the war. In 1920 she had a Sabbatical year and THE DELINEATOR asked her to organize a home-making department with the highest possible standard of service for American women. In doing this work for six months Miss Van Rensselaer became so interested in the enormous responsive army of women out over America that with the consent of Cornell University she continued as the permanent home-making editor of the department. She has given her personal attention to the needs of thousands of women. There is not a home-maker in the land whose problem is so small or so difficult that she does not gladly bring to it the wealth of her knowledge and wisdom, for, looking out beyond her own State to the farthest outposts of the land, she sees the need of women and finds her reward in life in serving them.

PURPOSE

By ANGELO PATRI

[Among the lucky ones to have read in manuscript A. S. M. Hutchinson's new DELINEATOR novel, "The Increasing Purpose," is Angelo Patri, beloved teacher and leader in American education. The underlying theme of this story so fired his imagination that he has been moved to make the following prophetic comment.]

A recent snapshot of Mr. Patri

Youth is rebelling, protesting, struggling against life. The old ways are flouted—the new ways are without landmarks. And the elders wring their hands and beat their breasts and prophesy evil. What, they ask, is this generation coming to? All's wrong with the world, they say.

When man first discovered himself a lonely thinking being in a world of unthinking creatures, he asked, "Why?" And the answer came from within himself, "Search and find." When Hutchinson's appealing hero, Simon Paris, discovers himself alone and in trouble, he too cries out in anguish, "Why?" So, you. So, I.

Ours is an eternal quest. Forever we search and wonder—who are we and where are we bound? Why are we set here questioning an infinite silence, mocked by mighty and invisible forces, ever driven on by the relentless craving to know, to understand, to fulfil a despairing hunger scarce defined?

No one who has studied the growth of a flower or the development of a child need doubt the existence of a transcendent Purpose behind life on this earth. How shall we know the Purpose to be our own? I can not know for you. The answer is always within oneself. St. Francis laid down all that he had and went out a beggar with his bowl and his shining Purpose. Washington went apart and prayed until the still small voice answered him. So did Lincoln. You and I must, also.

I can not prove this to you. I can only tell you of the miracle. Again and again I have seen youth struggle and fight and fume and fail and at last go and stand waiting, listening for the word that comes and sends him out inspired by a burning Purpose.

I believe that the protest and rebellion of Simon Paris, of the whole of the war-scarred world to-day, are but an indication of a mighty hidden Purpose, deeply seeking expression.

SUGGESTION TO TEACHERS OF ENGLISH

IN THE February issue of THE DELINEATOR we published a little essay by Sir James M. Barrie entitled "A New Day for Girls." To illustrate that article we had Paul Roche, one of the best of American artists, make a dry-point etching of this great author. It was copied from Barrie's favorite portrait.

These etchings, signed by the artist, which are valuable for their art as well as for their likeness of one of the world's greatest writers, are to be given free by THE DELINEATOR to the first five hundred teachers who will agree to offer them as prizes in their English departments. There are only five hundred of these pictures and there will never be any more of them made. For this reason we feel that they should be given to those students found worthy in the art which has been so splendidly led by Sir James M. Barrie.

Better Health Clubs for Women

Why there should be one in your community

HAVE YOU A BOYISH FIGURE?
OR HAVE YOU LOST SOME OF YOUR CLEAN CUT LINES?

Modern fashions make it much easier for the slender woman to dress well than for her sister who is a bit too plump in ankle, hips or chin. The easiest way to take off those inconvenient extra pounds is by exercise. But it must be just the right exercise, especially planned to reduce you where reducing is necessary. To help you THE DELINEATOR has printed a booklet, called "Reducing in Spots," written by a woman specialist, Doctor Lillian E. Shaw. You can get it by sending twenty-five cents—merely a charge to cover printing and postage—to the Health Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

WITHIN the last hundred years machinery has so far superseded man-power that earning one's bread by the "sweat of the brow" has become merely a figurative expression. Within the next hundred years we may see science make such strides that all manual labor will be practically abolished. Meanwhile advances in medicine, surgery and sanitation have lengthened and doubtless will continue to lengthen the span of life by removing many of its hazards.

But science has not yet been able to work any fundamental changes in the structure or functions of the human body. Man is still, as he was in the Garden of Eden, an animal dependent on food, exercise, fresh air and sleep. Our greater expectancy to-day of long life comes in spite of the fact that exercise in one's daily occupation has been reduced; not because of it. Had our forefathers of the rail-splitting days been blessed with modern knowledge of sanitation and surgery, they probably with the amount of wholesome exercise they received would have lived to be veritable Methuselahs.

But little by little machinery has displaced human sweat, until the man or woman of to-day has practically no need of physical exertion. Transportation, work and recreation are largely mechanical. The industrial revolution has completely overturned the scheme of human existence. Where formerly man needed rest during his limited hours of leisure, in order that he might build up again the strength expended during his working hours, to-day he must have exercise in his leisure to compensate for the fact that he gets little or none in his work.

There was also no "recreation problem" in America a century ago; that is, there was none where the male of the species was concerned. When he could find a few minutes in which some work did not claim him, he could hunt or fish. Just plain loafing was a luxury, for that matter. Nor did his wife have to worry about getting exercise. Her problem was to find something that would give her an intellectual stimulant and get her mind off the drudgery that was so often her portion.

To-day, with leisure hours extended and the necessity for bodily energy in industry reduced, our cities are spending millions to provide places where the public may exercise. We are becoming a nation of city dwellers, and unless this provision for exercise is thorough, we shall inevitably become a nation of physical weaklings.

THE problem of filling our leisure hours is twofold. We must find a way of amusing and entertaining people, so that their minds will remain in a healthy condition; and we must find a means of making people exercise, so that their bodies will be strong and vigorous.

I believe that the best solution for the twofold problem is found in an exercise program. By this I do not mean that every one should spend every moment in sport. There should be a proper proportion of intellectual and frivolous diversion. But I believe the exercising, which might otherwise be classed as a necessary evil, can be made the pleasantest part of the recreation.

The best way to insure pleasure in the hours devoted to keeping the body fit is to arrange for some kind of group work. For want of a better word, I will call such organizations "health clubs," though the word "health" somehow suggests an exchange of symptoms and a determination to suffer jointly, rather than an assemblage for pleasure.

The greatest need for these clubs to-day is found among women from seventeen to thirty-five years of age. As a class, such women are paying less attention to exercise than any other, though obviously, with the responsibility for perpetuating a healthy race resting on their shoulders, they need it more than any other class.

Almost every woman belongs to a club of some kind, but unfortunately the program of her club is usually a secondary one. I suggest therefore that some of this club energy be expended in the direction of organizing groups for exercise, or in altering the programs of clubs already formed so that they will include a provision for exercise. Many women will plead that they haven't time for any additional club life. Many also will say that they are "all tired out" now and do not need anything more to do. It is true that doing the housework and bringing up a family of children are fatiguing, yet this program, strenuous as it may be, does not supply the kind of exercise that is required. Furthermore, it is done entirely, or largely, indoors, while the ideal exercise is in the open air.

"That tired feeling" does not mean that you are working your muscles properly. Brain work is intensely fatiguing: one can become exhausted just sitting in a chair. Often the fatigue of which women complain is due to lack of exercise and not excess of it. Monotony is always tiring, and the daily tasks are apt to become decidedly monotonous, whether in the home, the factory or the office.

ANY game or exercise is more fun when numbers are participating. The fellowship and good cheer that accompany group play are in themselves large contributors to good health; for exercise accompanied by happiness is certainly more beneficial than exercise regarded merely as a duty. The particular activity engaged in by a health club is not important. It can be governed by the climate, the season of the year, and the facilities at hand. Regular gymnasium drills have some merit, but they are most effective when accompanied by some form of competitive sport. The ideal program will include hiking, skating, swimming, golf, tennis and riding, or as many of these activities as conditions will permit.

The program of the health club should accomplish three things, exercise, fresh air and pleasure. The first thing to do in the direction of promoting a health program is to appoint a competent committee. There are in every club certain energetic individuals who "take hold of things." If these dynamic personalities can be interested in exercise, the battle is half won. This committee must make a study of the needs of the club and of its facilities for meeting them and then cut the garment to fit the cloth.

The committee must bear in mind at all times that the health program must be interesting. Almost any group might be talked into trying any program once, but the whole idea will wither on the vine if it lacks real merit.

What we seek is an ideal exercise for a club that is made up of the housewife and the business or employed woman who may never have had a chance to become proficient in any particular branch of athletic activity, some form of exercise enjoyable as well as profitable, and in which all can compete on an equal footing as regards both skill and finance. To my mind walking comes closest to satisfying all these requirements. It has practically no physical, financial, climatic, or geographical limitations. Every woman can walk—or can learn to walk—and there are very few days even in the most severe climate when walking can not be enjoyed.

Every walk should have an objective and, if possible, a definite purpose. Photography, flower-gathering, nature study, or the contemplation of some particularly fine bit of scenery should furnish an additional incentive. A great deal of pleasure is to be had in amateur photography and interest may be stimulated by contests among the members.

To be beneficial, walking should be done with proper carriage. When you walk with ease, grace and rhythm of movement, the exercise is recuperative, beneficial and a wholesome tonic to the entire nervous system.

Too rapid walking is not recommended. It is tiring and is never graceful, because it changes the natural rhythmical swing into rigid, forcible movements. Neither is slow walking that degenerates into mere meandering the most beneficial. A gait averaging between three and four miles an hour is suitable for most women.

If you find that walking leaves you weary and enervated, with sore muscles, a lame back and tired feet, you are not well poised and are not using your muscles properly. When walking do not allow the head, chest or shoulders to droop. Keep the upper part of the body lifted up out of the waistline, and avoid any inclination to allow

Your white teeth—keep them safe with Pebeco

ORDINARY BRUSHING fails to remove the acids from your teeth for more than a few brief minutes. Five minutes after the usual gritty scouring (which also endangers the enamel and often damages the gums) the acids of decay begin to form again.

The only way to protect your teeth permanently is with the tooth paste that gently stimulates the natural alkaline fluids of your mouth glands.

Teeth stay white and safe when the mouth glands flow normally

By a simple natural method you can now prevent Dry Mouth that causes tooth decay

"I WENT to the dentist yesterday. He says my teeth and gums are in fine condition"—

A few years ago you rarely heard anyone say that. But today thousands can truthfully claim it. More and more men and women are learning how to keep their teeth safe by correcting the dangerous mouth condition that is the underlying cause of most decay.

How dry mouth inevitably leads to tooth decay

Modern, cooked foods—soft and quickly swallowed—give the mouth glands almost no work. From sheer lack of exercise they gradually stop flowing. And in your dry mouth, your teeth, unprotected by the alkaline fluids of the glands, are defenseless against the acids of decay.

It is only recently that dentists and physicians have recognized that there is a way to stimulate the glands and combat the acids of decay successfully and naturally.

Pebeco keeps your mouth glands active

Pebeco acts directly on the salivary glands. As soon as it enters your mouth it starts a full, normal flow of alkaline saliva.

With constant daily use Pebeco completely restores the natural, protective action of your mouth glands. Their alkaline fluids again bathe your teeth day and night. The acids of decay are neutralized as fast as they form. And the deadly mucin and tartar deposits are gently softened and removed.

Pebeco leaves your gums clean and soothed —your whole mouth, normal and healthy. And in this healthy mouth your teeth are kept not only white and shining but safe.

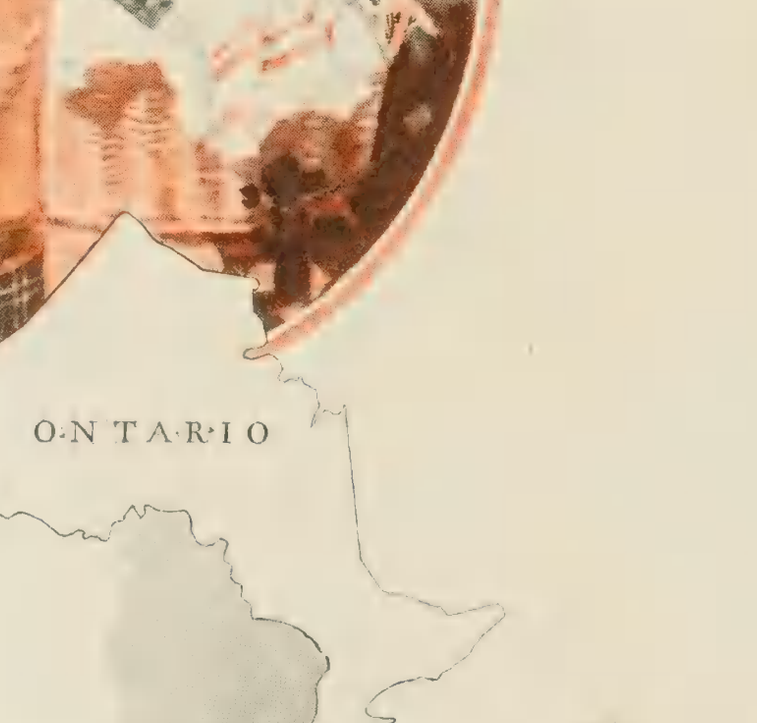
America's favorite laundry soap also takes first place across the border



"P and G The White Naphtha Soap is almost as much of a necessity in my home as bread. It is wonderful. I have used it for all purposes for the past sixteen years."

—Mrs. R. E. B.,
Detroit, Mich.

"When I began using P and G, my soap troubles ended. My clothes come out clean and white, now, with no soapy odor. P and G can be used equally well in cold, lukewarm or hot water. It makes the water lovely and soft, and produces a fine suds. I find, too, that it is not hard on the hands, which means much to a housewife who is continually using soap and water. My best colored fabrics are regularly washed with P and G and they come out just as nice as when new."

—Mrs. W. B., Toronto, Ont.

THIS remarkable soap continues to pile up its triumphs. P and G has long been the largest selling laundry soap in America. The women of Michigan gave it first place many months ago. And now come the progressive housewives of Ontario.

Wherever there are especially difficult laundry problems, P and G The White Naphtha Soap meets each need better than any other soap made. This is not merely our opinion—women everywhere have said so in letter after letter.

Truly, no other laundry soap combines so many remarkable qualities. Just read this list:

P and G is white, and keeps white clothes white.

It makes rich suds in any water, hard or soft, hot or cold.

It is safe for colored clothes.

It dissolves dirt with amazing speed, and thus reduces rubbing and boiling to the very minimum—only the very dirty things need rubbing at all.

It rinses out promptly and thoroughly, leaving no hint of grayness or soapy odor.

By sudsing readily in lukewarm water, it helps you to keep your hands in good condition.

You'll be surprised at its small cost—less than that of your present soap.

What do all these qualities mean to you? Less work, less worry, more time, more energy, finer washing results, longer wear from clothes, greater economy.

Yes, even though your work be done by a laundress, you will find it profitable to provide her with P and G. You will quickly prove that there is no mystery about the national supremacy of P and G—it is simply a better soap.

At last, after three years, his greatest novel —

THE INCREASING PURPOSE

By A. S. M. HUTCHINSON

Famous author of "If Winter Comes"

A man's stirring adventures with life and love

THERE were three brothers Paris—Andrew, Charles, Simon. Andrew was confidential secretary and chief of staff to Lord Staverton, the financial magnate; Charles was at present the entire firm of Still and Paris, of Queen Victoria Street, City, Business Advisers; Simon, shortly after the conclusion of the Great War, had retired from the regular army, betaken himself into the country, found a cottage and bought a horse.

"What's he want a horse for?" was Charles's comment.

Charles, thirty-eight years of age, was the middle of the three brothers, but he somehow looked the oldest. Andrew, forty, was noticeably dark; Simon, thirty-four, though deeply tanned, was very fair. Seen with his brothers, Charles in coloring was nondescript. He had been much freckled in his youth; he now was grayish, lined, worn. Both his brothers held themselves very erect; Charles stooped. Andrew had a reserved, an austere, an aloof air; Simon an alert, a lissom air; the air of Charles was fidgety.

Andrew, Lord Staverton's right-hand man, was dark not so much in complexion as, in a curious way, by the intense blackness of his hair. Tall; firm-mouthed; of few words and those, whatever the subject, always direct; smiling seldom, laughing (whole-heartedly) never. He sometimes (behind his back) was called Duke.

Simon, the youngest, was his elder brother's precise opposite. His hair, the color of bleached corn, looked somehow rather hide than hair; and the suggestion set up by the word hide, the lion's or the mastiff's hide, was furthered by the limber build he had. His alert look had in it something quizzical, the look of one humorously touched by what he saw; of one eager to take a part in what he watched, yet nervously diffident of seeking invitation. His look, however, in recent years had somehow changed. "There's something up with Simon," had been the comment of Charles, noting it.

Here, then, have been presented the brothers, each primarily in terms of his coloring; and each, thus seen, may be touched off in terms of a single word expressive not of hue only, but of characteristic also. Thus Andrew, a black Paris; Charles, a grizzled Paris; Simon, a tawny Paris.

EVEN in boyhood these characteristics were so strongly stamped that the rude ready labels wherewith the schoolboy gums his fellows and wherewith those three at school were gummed would have enabled them years after to be picked out at sight. All three went to the same public school. Andrew, the first to be placed there, was immediately Niggs—Niggs Paris, a jolly diminutive of Nigger. He rose in the school, collecting caps and honors. His cold austerity of manner revealed itself. Small boys, even in speaking of him among themselves, instinctively felt "Niggs" to be altogether too familiar. They invented for him and dubbed him with another and it traveled up to senior circles and by them laughingly was approved and adopted.

"Niggs," said a fellow prefect to him one day in the Sixth Form Room, "Niggs, do you know what the lower horde are calling you these days? Down there, my black but comely friend, you're Duke—Duke Paris."

There was a general laugh, a general acclamation Andrew became Duke Paris from that day forward

Drawings by Joseph Simont.

ALICE AVERTED HER FACE. "SIM, PLEASE DON'T! IT'S LIKE BEING SPIED ON"

Only one person from that day of Andrew's elevation to dukedom ever again called him Niggs, and that was Simon. Simon had heard it long before he joined his brothers at their public school and to this day of their manhood always uses it. "Niggs, old man," he says. It always—nearly always—softens Andrew's face to hear that said by Simon. He loves—well, there is only one person in the world whom Andrew really loves and that with a passion that eats him up like a fox inside him gnawing him, and that is his wife Linda, so that it scarcely perhaps can be said that he loves Simon; but he is wonderfully tender toward his younger brother. "Niggs, old man, how goes it?"—he likes that greeting. "Oh, pretty good, Sim," he says and smiles; that rare smile, gleamed and gone as a lamp flashed and shuttered on a dark ship, stern and purposeful, passed by night.

Charles came up to the school. Charles always hated going to school and that hate expressed itself in the unwilling, rather sullen countenance he presented on his arrival.

It instantly was seized upon.

"Hullo, are you Niggs Paris's brother?"

"I suppose so," assented Charles moodily.

"Well, you look jolly sick about it. I say," and the speaker shouted genially to friends, "I say, here's another Paris—a sick one."

Charles was Sick Paris from that hour.

CAME Simon. Here, at twelve years old, was an eager, yellow-haired little chap, who hopped about on the fringes of groups with an odd, nervous eagerness, longing to join, shy to venture. But, before a nickname could be selected and pasted on Simon forever, there happened an incident almost unheard of at a public school—the use by a brother of his home name before others. No one but Niggs, then risen high and approaching dukedom, would have dared break the tradition. On Simon's second day the great Niggs passed him where he joyed, an eager figure hopping about revered new acquaintances who debated his stamp album.

"Hullo, Sim. How goes it?"

"Fine, old man, thanks. Ripping."

"That's right, Sim."

Sim! The kid's home name! It never had been done before. The great Niggs not only did it, but, as the term went on, further flouted tradition by openly and frequently showing affection for his small, happy, already popular young brother. "Sim" was picked up, became general, stuck, remained with Simon all through school, went with him out into life—Sim Paris at Sandhurst, Sim in his regiment, Sim to all who knew him everywhere.

It suited him. It had an airy, easy sound and he was such. Boy and man, the thing he most enjoyed, the engagements wherein he was most truly the Sim his fellows knew, was any form of competition, in which he would make a tremendous and always a sporting effort to succeed. He had in the little crises of such events a gesture peculiarly his own. The gesture, if words can explain such, was one of mingled doubt and hope. Illustrations may show it: Taking the place-kick when at school or Sandhurst in a football match, the angle dreadful, the wind against him—that characteristic little toss of the hand before he takes his run: "Can I?" it seems to say. "By Jove, I will!" Giving his company the lead going over the top in France—that characteristic little hesitation his men know so well just as he poises to spring: "Can we? By gad, we will!"

That was Sim Paris as men, recounting old times, affectionately spoke of him. Meeting him to-day they noted in him that alteration voiced by Charles as "something up with Sim," and by Charles further elaborated into "Sim hasn't half the spirits he used to have, he's changed in some mysterious way."

HE HAD; and what was changed was that, as the war drew into its last years, and very pronouncedly when after its close he retired, something very familiar was gone out of his expression. If formerly was to be observed the suggestion of being humorously touched by what he saw, now, somehow, was presented the suggestion that fun strangely had gone out of his world and that he brooded as to where fun now had gone, and, a little troubled, sought it.

His brother officers, as all his friends, had expressed astonishment when, the war over, Simon abruptly had sent in his papers and resigned his commission.

Why he had done it he did not know—exactly. He knew vaguely. But what thus vaguely he knew was a thing that he felt he could not possibly tell to any one, though he often longed enormously to share it.

"If only I could find some one to tell!" his thoughts on these occasions would go. There was one he felt he could have told, but her he could not find. He could have told Elizabeth. During the war he had utterly lost sight of Elizabeth. He tried everywhere for trace of her; there was no trace.

Sometimes to others, once in particular to Andrew, he had been on the brink of confiding. But each time, at the brink, had checked himself; had relapsed into that pondering and rather wistful look which was so new and strange in him.

"I wish to goodness I could find some one," and he would try again for trace of Elizabeth and again meet bafflement; and he would look into the faces of perfect strangers seeking some quality ("and I don't even know what quality," was his reflection) that might make him feel he there could outpour himself. Here were all these men and women, precisely as himself in the sense of sharing the same general conditions of existence, and yet as inaccessible to one another as those old pillars of that church he now was passing. Strange——

He stopped in his walk—he was in the City; he had been calling on Charles in his office—and turned and went into the church and sat down. A church on a week day would have been an odd place in which to find the Sim Paris of before the war; but he had not then, as he had now, thoughts which attracted him to seek retreat in any quiet place in which to ponder them.

He was alone in the church.

He leaned forward in his pew, his arms upon the book-rest. The motion caused his knees to touch a hassock, and without intending to he knelt upon it.

Immediately he began to think about his mother.

It was the suggestion of the hassock against his knees that caused him to kneel; and it was by direct suggestion of his kneeling pose that his thoughts immediately were with his mother.

His mother had died ten years before. He had been passionately devoted to her. When he had been at home during her lifetime, and ever since he had been of an age to go to bed as late as she, it had been his custom to go in to her the last thing immediately before he retired to his room. He never missed. However late the hour, wherever he had been spending the evening—always he went gently in to see her and to kiss her where she lay.

It was a matter of absolute and unfailing regularity. She died. He was at home at the time, on leave from India. While she lay on her bed, shrouded, he still went in to her the last thing, and he was the last of the household to do so.

He left home, returning to his duties. On his first night away his action immediately before putting out his light was, as he told her, "To come to you the last thing, beloved." And through the ten years that separated those events from this present time he never missed the practise. He always knelt for his nightly talk. In the war, in the trenches and back in the rest-camps, billeted with other men, it had not been possible to kneel. It was not a thing you could do before others—they would think you were saying your prayers. But when alone it always was on his knees that nightly he talked with his mother. And this was the cause, by direct suggestion of the kneeling posture, bringing him now immediately to think about her.

He had also been thinking about the reasons which had led him, suddenly and surprisingly, to leave the army. His mother was intimately concerned with those reasons.

He now, in communion with her, rehearsed them.

He had been all through the war, from its start with the first expeditionary force to its very close. And he had come through it absolutely unscathed.

He had been a regimental officer all his time—no "soft" jobs; always in the line. He had been through some desperate fighting. He had been in places where it seemed incredible that he could come out alive. He had been in corners, more than he could count on his ten fingers, out of which he had been the only one to survive.

And he had come through it unscathed.

He had never been wounded, never captured, never sick. In roll not to be numbered comrades had fallen, had been horribly mutilated, gone "missing," gone captive. Of the officers who first came out with him with his battalion he was, at the end of two years, the only one alive. Of the scores of men he was with at Sandhurst or had met in the service the barest remnant remained. He unscathed. Why?

IT WAS that interrogation which was the root of those "vague reasons" which so profoundly had influenced his career. "Why?"

Why when men of qualities infinitely better than his own; why when men of lives infinitely more valuable to their country, to their homes, to knowledge, to science, to art than ever his; why when boys fresh from school, not a day old in the field; why when veterans of battles fought while he was in the nursery; why when these fell in their scores daily along the frontiers of this world-wide war; why went he unscathed?

Why?

It was in the third year of the war that this interrogation first came to him. His battalion had been in an advance, and the carnage, even within his own grim and terrible experience, had been unprecedented. They had held the position gained and some one coming up with the supports had brought the rumpled sheet of a recent copy of the Times and, his mind still occupied with the appalling losses of the day, he had smoothed out the page and seen the shocking list that it contained of mortalities on all the fronts. The two rolls, that which himself had seen or heard of and this which now he saw, joined their battalions and smote him, for the first time, with the question, "Why am I spared?"

From that day of its first asking the question began frequently to recur. It began so much to get on his nerves—and these were the days in which men might first have noticed the growing change in his air, the deepening of his look, the falling away of the old lightheartedness—so much on his nerves that it took him through two phases, both singularly disagreeable to him. In the first phase he caught himself funking. It never was apparent. He never avoided, nor so much as thought of avoiding, danger. It simply was that, whereas formerly he never thought of his chances, he now thought of them and was frightened. "I have been spared all this time. To-day, the next one that comes, I am bound to catch it." Would it be now, or now, or now? It frightened him.

The phase passed and the second phase came in its place. The first went because he threw it violently from him. He now wanted to catch it. "Why am I spared?" Exasperated, he turned upon the dogging question and savagely cast it into this form: "Why should I be spared? When all these are falling every day, why the devil should I be spared?" and he began to want to catch it, to seek to catch it, to hope that now, or now, or now, the thing would come at him at last and that he would catch it and be done with it.

He never did catch it.

The oppression of this phase was in its full force upon him when, one night, alone in a dug-out (two who had shared it with him had been killed by a shell which had left him untouched) he had for the first time for very many nights the opportunity of talking, on his knees, with his mother before he tried to sleep. And there was much to tell her, and he went on and told her much. And then he began to talk to her of, as he expressed it, "this frightful 'Why I am spared?' business."

HE HAD had communications from his mother. The manner of them was very strange. He never pretended to himself that he heard her voice. But what he knew absolutely to be communication from her was the sudden possession within him, when he was thinking of her, of some "absolute knowledge."

There had been in all but six of these communications and all need not be told. One, received when he talked with her on the night following her death, was the sudden, exquisitely comforting knowledge that she, though in person absent, was as much with him as of old, nay, able now to be with him at all places and at all times, with him much more. Another was the knowledge—sudden, unsought, absolute—that he and she would meet again. A third, equally spontaneous, equal in certainty, equal in the joy inexpressible which it gave, that the time of their separation would be very brief. Whether in this his mother meant as she, now elevated to the eternal plane, was able to see time, or whether the moment of their reuniting was to be brief as he knew years, he never debated. He never debated any of her communications. That he now, alone in that dark and airless dugout with his cry, "Mother, why am I spared?" seemed for a first time to be asking for such knowledge was in fact no asking. It was not a question—it was a cry. But amazingly it was answered.

Immediately with his cry to her he had within him the absolute knowledge that, through those perilous years and among those thousands more gifted and more worthy who had fallen and who yet would fall, he had been spared, and would be spared, because he had been selected, set apart, for a special purpose.

Sim was inexpressibly comforted. He remained for a long time on his knees, his face in his hands and in his mind only a sense of enormous relief. The question "Why should I be spared?" now was answered, the torment gone, the nerves assuaged. There on his knees; presently risen and peacefully sleeping; anon out and about his duties; thereafter for many days pursuing his part in the warfare of the trenches—that was all he felt. He had been spared for a reason, and he now knew that it was for a reason, and he was completely comforted.

He went, at first, no deeper than that. A mind of any introspection would have pursued its natural sequence. "For what purpose?" The Simon Paris of those days was far too virile to be of introspective habit. "It is true then—I am being brought safely through this for some special purpose." There would follow the briefest moment's thought and then his comment: "Well, that's funny—for me!"

The war ended. He was for a year with the army of occupation in Germany. Then his battalion came home and he was for a year with it in the cathedral city that

THE GARDENER

The Gardener, God, plants flowers by the way,
Mandrake and the wild rose and meadow rue,
Marsh marigolds in swamps, a brave display,
And little flowers of violet and blue.

The Gardener, God, has many a quaint device,
Of tree and vine and shrub—and, now and then,
He drops a gentian flower from the skies
For the great wonder and delight of men.

He plants arbutus in a lonely place,
And linden trees that have a yellow flower;
He spreads His dogwood like a veil of lace
Over the azalea's rosy shower.

The Gardener, God, has gardens everywhere,
By roadside, on the hill, and in the wood,
And sometimes we can find Him walking there,
Watching His flowers as a gardener should.

was its depot. The regiment was made much of by the wealthy residential sets of the neighborhood. Simon, good looking, athletic, unattached, was particularly in much demand. In the old days he would have been in his element. He found now that he cared for none of these things.

What had happened to him was that which happened to many of the young men that had served through the war. They had been living, not only from day to day, taking no thought for the morrow because, always, there might be no to-morrow; more narrowly than they had been living from hour to hour. Their lives had been under rule. They neither thought for themselves nor acted for themselves. They thought and acted as it was laid down for them to think and act. They came back in peace and they found that their horizons, which so long had been within the length of their arms' reach, now were stretched far away to encompass a prospect new and exceedingly grave—the future. They had been tethered, as it were, to a blank wall, as boats are tethered to a quayside. The painters now were cut, the wall gone, the quay astern, and they beheld themselves adrift. "The future? What am I going to do? What of my future?"

This was disturbing.

Simon Paris with these others similarly was disturbed. But there worked in his disturbance, additionally, an increasing reflection upon this very strange thing that had happened to him—his feeling that he had been reserved for some special purpose. He began to think: "There is something I have got to do. There is some purpose waiting for me somewhere. Can it be here, in the army, leading this army peace life, these junketings, this regimental routine? I do not think it can."

And then on a day his thoughts went a plunge that was a great plunge deeper. He suddenly thought: "But these junketings—I used to revel in them. This regimental routine—I used to love it. Why don't I now? I believe there is something in me that is changing me. I believe I shall never settle to this again. I believe I have got to get out of this."

ALICE GASPED, "OH, THIS IS TERRIBLE." BUT CONRAD BRYNE CAUGHT HER TO HIM, HIS VOICE IMPASSIONED: "TERRIBLE ONLY IN THE IMMENSITY OF MY LOVE"

THERE was another thing that happened to many of the young men who had served through the war. There was noticeable in them a change, very marked, to social conditions and to social relations which formerly they accepted and enjoyed. In some this was manifested in a profound contempt for law and for order, for place and for privilege, for love and for human affections; in others it was manifested in a dissatisfaction as profound. For each attitude the reason was the same and was unconscious. It lay in long and deeply intimate familarity with death.

Death levels all people and all things; and these men for long had grown accustomed to look at all things and all people through death's eyes. They had seen habitations, great edifices, mighty works, stagger before the callous rush of death, spring in the air, burst asunder, and go to dust. In one moment they had seen men of power, of pride, of possession, and in the next, before death's callous leveling, men grossly disfigured, horribly disclosed to be but flesh and blood.

But soldiers returned to find property considered so sacred, men and women scorning equality, hedged about by laws, customs, conventions to prevent equality, ignorant as beasts that one equality, alike for highest and for least, was theirs and would in time be paid.

This also was disturbing.

Again with these others Simon similarly was disturbed. But again and again, arising out of the very strange thing that had happened to him, there worked in this disturbance also a leaven private to himself. When, fresh from the society of the Leveler, he looked upon the artificiality, the arrogance, the self-interest which on all sides denied a common level, it was with a certain sadness, a wistfulness, that he looked upon it. Others of his kind it filled with contempt; others with dissatisfaction. To Simon, hungering for a sharer of his secret, it gave rise to a feeling that if the world were not like this, if it were different, if it did admit and act upon a common level, then might he very easily—yes, at any street corner—find one, find a dozen, find a hundred, to whom he could unfold his heart.

Here were thoughts, rapidly now developing into a habit of mind. Here was a conviction (that he had been brought through the war for some purpose) rapidly now growing into an obsession. They militated against his free participation in the life of a regimental officer.

And he desired to entertain them. More and more they became the subject of his reflection. Deeper and deeper, as he explored them, they developed his interest.

His restlessness increased.

He left the army.

Retired, Sim's first move was on London, to his brothers; first to Charles.

Charles, who was married, lived with his wife at Blackheath, going up daily to his office in the City, where he was "Still and Paris, Business Advisers." The Blackheath house which had been the family home of the brothers ever since their parents, both now dead, had moved there nearly thirty years ago, was much too big for Charles and his wife, who were childless. Charles, however, as good as owned it. He lived there rent free and the conventional phrase would have it that he was therefore content to stay there.

THE conventional phrase did not, however, apply. Charles hated the house.

When Simon arrived for his visit, something came up of some inconvenience attaching to the place and Simon commented brightly: "Well, anyway you get it rent free, so I suppose you're content to stay in it, old man."

Immediately Charles flamed.

"Content! That's just what Andrew says. Content! Would you be content to stay in it, or would he, do you suppose, much less that Linda of his? Why doesn't he, then? Why doesn't he come over and take a share of my burdens for a bit sometimes? Content! Infernal great antiquated barrack of a place! Falling to pieces! Never out of some bungling workman's hands! Rent free! I'd like you just to have a look at my bill for repairs. Content! Not a room that doesn't reek of damp. Not a room—look at the size of them, look at the height of them—that isn't cold as a living tomb. Content! Before you and Andrew talk about content perhaps you'll give a thought to the fact that this—this barrack—was built for conditions of fifty years ago and hasn't had a modern thing done to it since. Not a thing! Great infernal kitchen range like a battle-ship that eats up coal by the solid ton and never gives a drop of hot water—wait till you try your bath in the morning, if you're fool enough to have one while you're here."

"That's all right, old man," Sim interjected. "I take a cold one."

Charles took no notice. "Miles and mountains of stairs. Not a servant that ever will stay a month. Every door with about two inches of draft under it. Every window about the size of a conservatory that breaks your back to open or shut. And passages everywhere—and empty, useless rooms everywhere—echo, echo, echo, wherever you go. I read a lot of this magazine and newspaper stuff about the Home Beautiful and labor-saving dodges and things like that and I scheme out for myself jolly little houses, jolly little cottages where I could be happy, happy——"

He stopped. It shocked Sim to see that actually he was wiping his eyes. He went on:

"And then I look around at this infernal, hateful place that I'm chained to like a dog to its kennel, and

RUGGED EDINBURGH CASTLE ON ITS HIGH ROCK

Come to

By E. V. LUCAS

Whose books "A Wanderer in Paris" and "A Wanderer in London" and others, are conceded to be the greatest travel books in the English language

I WONDER if you have any idea of how extraordinarily fortunate you are? Not only to be visiting Europe, but to be visiting it for the first time!

I am not pretending that if this were to be your second or third or fifteenth visit, there would be any call to pity you. But there is no real comparison between the emotions consequent upon first impressions and those that one gathers later. The first impression must involve a shock, whether of pleasure or frustration, which those coming after can not produce; and shocks are rare. That is why I think you are so eminently to be envied.

I wonder how you are coming to England. Direct to Southampton? If so, and you are not in a hurry, you could make a little road tour—the first day in a car would suffice, if you started early; you would still be in London by the evening—which would give you a preliminary glimpse of our historic island; just enough to steady you! For it could be made to embrace the New Forest, Salisbury Cathedral, Salisbury plain, Stonehenge, and some of our most exquisite domestic scenery, in Hampshire and Surrey, on your way to town. I hope you will forgive my affectation of erudition when I remind you that the New Forest was the great hunting pleasaunce laid out by William the Conqueror and it is still Crown property. Salisbury (Trollope's Barchester) is considered by many good judges to have the most lovely of all our cathedrals; it certainly has the loveliest spire and the comeliest and serenest cathedral close, although you may be in favor of a loftier site, such as Lincoln, which is firmly planted on the ridge that runs through the county, or Durham on its precipice above the river Wear. As for Stonehenge, the antiquaries are still undecided as to its origin and full purpose, but they are agreed that it was a temple of paganism with a magnificent ritual centuries before British history begins.

All this, and the drive to London thrown in, in one day!

Or you may disembark at Liverpool. This will enable you to see one of the most perfect old English towns, Chester, with its walk along its city walls and its richly ornamented timbered houses; and possibly you may decide to go to London by road and spend a night at Stratford-on-Avon on your way, in one of the bedrooms named after Shakespeare's plays. I don't know at what time of year you propose to sail, but if it be the Spring, you will see the Warwickshire lanes at their best. I need not say what at Stratford-on-Avon awaits you. Being a good American, you know the Shakespeare story probably far better than I. But perhaps you may not know that Shakespeare is not all; the town itself is one of our most distinguished, full of fine domestic architecture; the river is one of our quietest and greenest; and Warwick Castle and Kenilworth are not distant.

The mention of Kenilworth reminds me of our second imaginative writer and humanist, Sir Walter Scott, and the circumstance that some transatlantic liners come to Glasgow. In this case you would probably see something of Scotland before you went south to London. Here again how enviable you are! Love of Scott will take you to the banks of the Tweed, perhaps the most exquisite of all rivers in the British Isles, and never so beautiful as at twilight. You will see Melrose Abbey and Dryburgh Abbey, and at Abbotsford meditate on the noble life and life-work of that very great man, its first owner. In Edinburgh you will see the Heart of Midlothian and the Scott Memorial. As to the memorial let me tell you of a discovery that I made when not long ago I was in the Scottish capital. I found that from a certain spot to the west of the Memorial (you must take two forbidden steps on the grass!) the head of the seated figure can be brought into the circle of the clock of the North British Hotel, so that, fittingly, and as it should be, the Wizard of the North has a halo.

And while in Edinburgh do not neglect the Scottish National Gallery, where Scott's friend, Raeburn, who painted with much of the charm and dignity and sympathy with which Scott wrote, has many portraits.

Edinburgh brings to my mind one of the risks that all visitors to Europe for the first time can not avoid running. You may be anticipating too much; and if you do, you will often be disappointed. Edinburgh gives us a vivid example. No doubt you have seen reproductions of pictures of the death of Rizzio. I forget the name of the historical painter, it may have been Wilkie, whose famous representation of Mary Queen of Scots being thundered at in the old church on the castle hill by John Knox, belongs to the same epoch. It may be Maclise. But at any rate, probably you have seen it. A spacious apartment with room both for sword play and for guilty intrigues. Well, when you go to Holyrood Palace you will be shocked, for the room in which Rizzio was assassinated is hardly more than a cupboard.

Holyrood may fail you, but certain things can not. Edinburgh Castle, for instance, dominating its rock high up there in the mist: that could not in your dreams be more impressive than in reality. Nor, when you go south, could Windsor Castle seen from the meadows by the Thames, or from the road a few miles out of Slough as you motor from London. Windsor Castle, indeed, fills almost every requirement of the romantic child brought up on tales of chivalry. Perhaps Carcassonne in the south of France is, from without, the perfect fortress of romance, with its four-and-fifty towers springing from the battlemented walls; but Carcassonne is distant, whereas Windsor Castle is inevitably in your itinerary. And when you are at Windsor you will be sure to go into St. George's Chapel, won't you? for it has extraordinary beauty; and you should walk down the hill and cross the river to Eton and see something of the school on whose playing fields the battle of Waterloo was won.

But I have not yet exhausted the possibilities of your landing at Liverpool; from which city how simple to see the Lake Country, which in Spring is more lovely than at any other season! You remember how Wordsworth's heart danced with the daffodils? Well, you can see those daffodils every April among the grass of Rydal Mount.

BUT your interests may lie more among history than books. If so, you are perhaps to be envied more than any other pilgrim, because so much awaits you. Indeed, I don't see how you can ever return to your home! Where will you begin? If you land at Cherbourg it is a simple matter to visit the little seaport of Dives-sur-mer in Normandy, where William the Conqueror set sail for England in September 1066. Later when you reach England you will go to Sussex and see where he landed, and where he fought; and to Westminister to see where he was crowned.

If you extend your travels to Belgium you will walk over the battlefield of Waterloo, and in St. Paul's in London you will see the tomb of Wellington, and in the Invalides in Paris the tomb of Napoleon. If the career of Napoleon and the personality of Napoleon fascinate you, as surely they must, you will go also to Fontainebleau and see his rooms as he furnished them with such care and taste, and stand on the very steps on which he stood when he bade farewell to his Old Guard. You will go to Malmaison and see where poor Josephine languished.

If you are under the spell of the French Revolution, you will go to Versailles and endeavor to reconstruct the grandeur and folly of the Court of Louis XVI; you will see the Petit Trianon, where Marie-Antoinette and her ladies played at being shepherdesses and dairymaids, you will see in one of the great salons Vigée le Brun's portrait of the queen in her happiness surrounded by her children. Then, at the Conciergerie in Paris, you will shudder in the cell where the poor foolish lady was imprisoned before her execution. You will go to the Place de la Bastille and trace out, in the roadway, the inlaid stones which record the position of the walls of the old prison. But be careful how you do this, because in France it is not the driver who runs over any one who is punished, but (if they survive) the persons who are so naughty as to be run over.

Your interest in history may be less modern. In this case you will hasten to Athens or Rome. At Athens you will climb the hill of the Acropolis and meditate in the Parthenon; in Rome you will spend storied days in the Forum, and descending to the Catacombs see where the Christians hiding from Nero held their services, and in the Colosseum reconstruct a sacrifice to the lions.

Perhaps ancient and lovely architecture is your lure? Again, how fortunate you are! In England we have cathedrals and castles, abbeys and churches, palaces such as Hampton Court, country mansions such as Compton Wynyates, Tudor villages, and timbered cottages in such profusion that you need not leave our tiny island at all. And then what has France—with Notre-Dame, Ste. Chapelle, Chartres, Amiens, Carcassonne and the châteaux of Touraine! What has Spain, with the Alhambra, the Escorial, the Giralda and the bridge of Toledo! What has Germany, with Cologne and Nuremberg and the castles of the Rhine! What has Italy, from Venice's palaces rising from the lagoon, to Giotto's campanile at Florence, springing from the ground; from Milan's cathedral of white marble to Pompeii's ruins of volcanic stone and all the secrets of Roman civilization before the days of Christ!

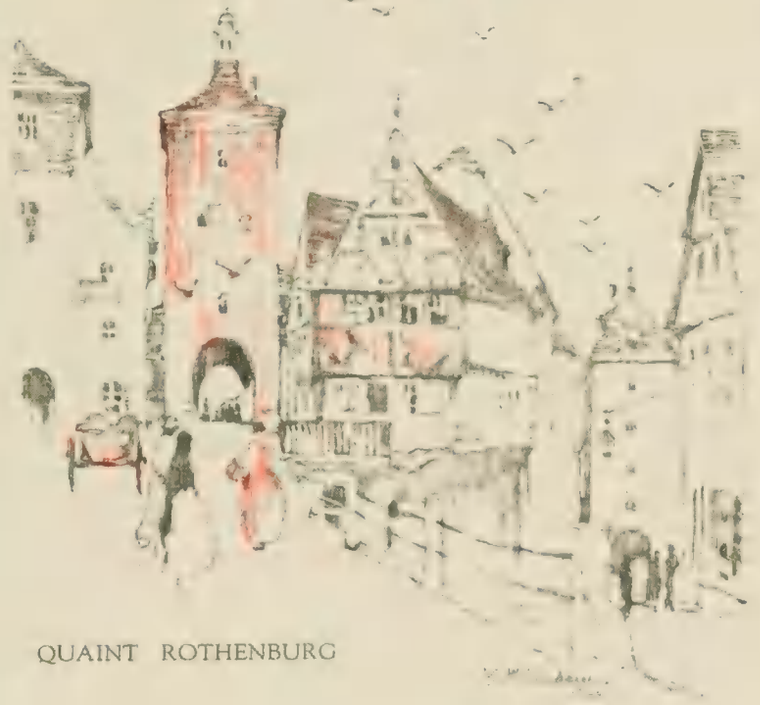
I HAVE supposed you to be interested in history, literature, architecture and nature. There remains another absorbing and inexhaustible passion for the traveler in Europe to indulge, and that is painting. You have some wonderful pictures in America, and every year you add to them. But there are still many which will never leave England or the Continent; and there are of course wall-paintings that can not be moved. I can imagine no transaction between the Old World and the New, for example, that would make it possible for Leonardo's "Last Supper" in Milan, or Raphael's frescoes in the Papal Apartments of the Vatican, to cross the Atlantic; while Michael Angelo's ceiling paintings are, I take it, physically irremovable.

THERE are still other reasons for your intention to cross the Atlantic. You may have been one of the readers of THE DELINEATOR (which, so far as I can ascertain, is quite as much a crusader as a periodical) who helped to justify that fine appeal of the Editor for funds to restore to prosperity three of the French towns destroyed in the War. In this case, how natural for you to desire to see what your money did!

I remember, when I was in your country in 1920, a scheme was on foot to buy the house in which one of your great men was born. The price having been fixed at such and such a sum, an ingenious promoter of the project estimated the number of bricks that the structure probably contained and divided the amount needed by that number of bricks, and then you were invited to buy each a brick. That seemed to me a most admirable device, because every one who had contributed could point to the house and say with truth that but for his assistance the historic building would have fallen.

Similarly, when you go to France to look at the three towns which the generous efforts of THE DELINEATOR and its readers repaired (without reparations!) you will be able to congratulate yourself on the essential value of your own gift. Without any benefactor's certainty as to how that gift was applied you will be able to enjoy the wholesale certainty that but for you those towns would be less complete. Not that you need to lay this flattering unction to your soul. Virtue is its own reward. But there is no harm in the benefactor experiencing a glow.

There remains yet another reason for wishing to visit France. I might have put it first, but I will not translate it into words at all, so poignant is it, so sorrowful and yet so flushed with satisfaction and pride.



SO MUCH for your first visit. And then those that are to follow, when you are to be envied again, for you will then taste the deep satisfaction and joy of finding that a second impression is even more wonderful than you expected; together with perhaps the piquancy of perplexity at a falling short of expectation; or even the bitterer perplexity of absolute disappointment. The old saying that familiarity breeds contempt you can utterly disregard. Not in Europe!

SILVER SHOON

A June bride and a jewel mystery

By ISABEL WALKER and HELEN REDINGTON

Silver Shoon, did you steal from the moon?
With your cloudy hair so bright,
And your dancing eyes alight—
Silver Shoon, did you steal from the moon?

Silver Shoon, when you dance on the dune,
Will you toss a moon-flake white
To a mortal in the night—
Silver Shoon, when you dance on the dune?

RICHARD HEATH, with a sudden impulse, brought his car to a halt under the clump of mulberry-trees instead of sweeping on up to the house. He had not been in this part of Virginia before; would not be here now but for an imperative summons from his sister, Ellen, who was visiting at Stafford Hall. And he was not prepared for the charmed quiet of the place. Just back from Europe, steeped—despite the serpent-trail of modern warfare—in the glory and romance of its medieval past, this first glimpse of the Hall gave him a moment of breath-taking anticipation. Here was the setting for that adventure which always, in his heart, he had been seeking. These old trees, he could see, had once served as hitching-posts, in the days when pillioned maids and beruffled swains had turned their steeds into the hospitable gateways. It was a stately pillared house, tall box-bushes lining the driveway, and across the sweep of lawn an old-fashioned garden. The scent of lilacs, heavy in the late afternoon, assailed him. He had come, this much was clear from Ellen's incoherent letter, to Celia Stafford's wedding. Celia—he was glad that was her name.

And then he forgot his dreaming, for Ellen was running down the path. He sprang from his car to catch her in his arms—the same old Ellen who could stay quiet hardly long enough to kiss him.

AS HE WATCHED THE DETECTIVE SEARCH THE BUREAU, RICHARD WAS SWEPT BY A WILD HOPE, "CELIA MAY WANT TO BACK OUT OF MARRYING DRUMMOND!"

"The child's grown up," he teased, "she's tucked up her hair."

"Oh, bobs aren't stylish any more! Isn't it a nuisance?" She slipped away from him, surveying him with the clear brown-eyed gaze he remembered. "I'm glad you're back, angel." She ended her appraisal with an approving nod. "You haven't changed so much. I suppose you know all about the Balkans now, and everything? Do you think you can do anything for Celia? You'll have to hurry. There's only about an hour left before the wedding."

"Same old Ellen!" He shook her gently. "What under heaven did you think I could do when you sent me that frantic letter? Elope with the bride or murder the groom?"

"Both!" Ellen spoke with explosive vehemence. "It's the only way any one will ever make Celia behave. And as for Blaise Drummond—" She caught Richard's arm and pulled him toward a side garden. "Let's go where we can talk before any more relatives swarm in." And even as she spoke a carriage turned in at the gate held open by a grinning colored boy. "I mustn't stay long. I'm helping Celia dress."

"I don't see why this wedding concerns you." Disapproval spoke in Richard's tone.

"Celia's my best friend!" Ellen was instantly indignant.

"Never heard of her until your letter came," Richard parried. "Then mother explained that you'd been at school with her for as much as a year, and she'd been visiting you for all of a month."

"I introduced Blaise Drummond to her," Ellen confessed soberly.

"The devil you did!" Richard echoed her solicitude. That was different. "Why?"

"You know how careless we've all been since the war. Anybody could go anywhere. And he talked such a lot about how much he'd seen of you on the other side."

"Talked about it, did he?" Richard scoffed.

"Then there really is something wrong about him? I did hope you would say he wasn't so bad." Ellen's head drooped.

Richard hesitated. There was so much that he knew, so little that he dared say about Blaise Drummond. "At that, it seems to me a hasty affair," he said.

"Richard," Ellen turned tear-filled eyes to him, "there isn't a girl in the world who would have been safe if any man pursued her the way Blaise Drummond pursued Celia.

"Is she rich?" Richard's opinion of the man was in the words.

"Mercy, no! She's just—Celia."

"So he's in love." Richard did not believe it.

"Yes." Ellen hesitated, then looked up with a flash of shrewdness. "I've thought, too, that he had an idea of whitewashing himself with Celia's standing and popularity."

She bent to release the sash of her yellow sweater from the clinging spray of bridal-wreath that bordered the path. "What is the matter with him, Richard? Nobody in Washington would tell me. Yet every man I know shuts up at the mention of his name. There—" and she drew away from her brother, pointing an accusing finger at his face, "you've exactly the same expression. That's the way they all looked, from the President down."

"You asked them all?" Richard knew that she had.

"Of course. When I got Celia's letter saying that he had followed her down here and that her father and mother thought him splendid, I tried to find out something definite. I knew she wasn't quite happy—not as Celia ought to be. But you can't go to a girl and say there is something wrong with the man but nobody knows what. And you weren't home."

"I'm sorry." Somehow Ellen managed to make him feel that his not being at home was a personal failure. He paused to light a cigaret, then seated himself beside her on a circular seat under the biggest mulberry.

"I came down," Ellen hurried on. "I thought I could at least stand by. And when I got here, they were engaged, and Celia was letting him rush her into this immediate wedding. She hasn't seemed herself. She won't talk. She can't be in love with him, and yet—well—some men do things like that to a girl."

RICHARD was but half listening. This marriage was a more serious tragedy than even Ellen suspected. Yet what could he do? Go to Celia's father? But his own mouth was sealed. Washington orders were definite on this point. Blaise Drummond's name had been blotted off the slate of diplomacy—not for his own sake, but for the young princess, victim of his intrigue, who was officially too important a personage to be touched by scandal. She was under the protection of diplomatic silence.

Was Ellen's theory right? Was it Drummond's scheme to rehabilitate himself by presenting a wife of Celia's undoubted standing and charm? Richard felt sure that Drummond did not know just how definite was the information against him, did not suspect that Mardak was in Washington now, in touch with the State Department.

"I don't like what you're thinking." Ellen's fingers forcibly turned upward the corners of his mouth. "Is it as dreadful as you look?"

Richard shook himself free from the memory of Drummond and of Europe. Since it was too late for action, they need not brood over the affair. He settled comfortably against the broad trunk of the old mulberry and watched a smoke-ring widen and dissolve into the scented, sun-drenched air.

A graveled path, bordered by a double row of white lilacs, led to the boxwood circle, clipped like a frame for the flowering shrubs within—bridal-wreath trailing against a purple mist of lilacs and blossoming mock orange lifting a thousand white and gold drinking-cups for the elves who should dance there at midnight.

"This is your proper setting, angel." Ellen patted his arm. "Oh, I know you've been awfully successful, in spite of all the prophecies that you were too romantic to be diplomatic. Just the same, give you a scarlet-lined coat and a feathered cap, a rapier in your hand and a lady fair to wave you on to noble deeds——"

Richard tossed away his cigaret and smiled. What a gift Ellen had for hitting a fellow's thoughts! "It's charmingly old," he said, "a regular dream place." He paused, then added low, his eyes on the boxwood circle, "a magic ring for fairy feet."

FROM a window opening on the clematis-wreathed balcony above their heads came the sound of a shutter pushed back. "Ellen, Ellen! I can't find my slippers!"

Ellen sprang to her feet. "Why, darling, I put them on the bed, right by your bag—in plain sight."

"They've walked off somewhere, then," came the laughing response.

"I'll run up and find them—I didn't mean to stay so long," Ellen was saying.

Richard felt an absurd reluctance to lift his eyes, so thoroughly did the voice match his mood. Already his imagination had formed the scene. He was throwing the corner of the red-lined coat Ellen had given him across his shoulder, he was sweeping off the feathered cap, he was bending low before her whose voice was warm as sunlight, clear as running water, velvet-soft as the petals of a moonflower.

Ellen, already half-way to the side door, turned around. "Oh, Richard, this is Celia," she called over her shoulder.

Then Richard looked up. He hoped that he made some response to Ellen's words. But more than anything else in the world he knew that a shaft of sunlight, striking through the mulberry leaves, had caught in her hair—hair not red nor gold but yellow flame. He knew that her color was the flush of Summer skies at dawn. And that his heart was pounding madly, "This is Celia, this is Celia."

"—I'm glad you got here, even so late."

How long had she been talking? Had she said anything else to which he should have given some response?

"It is late, isn't it?" For her words brought back to him the realization that this was not only the Celia for whom he had been looking, waiting, dreaming. She was the Celia who was going to marry Blaise Drummond. "Ellen should have told me," he finished savagely.

"Told you? What, pray?" Half-mocking, half-curious, wholly beguiling, she leaned nearer to him with the question.

Ellen appeared for a moment beside her and set a pair of silver slippers on the window-sill. "They were in your bag instead of on the bed where I left them. With these girls rushing in and out of your room, soon you'll not find anything. I'm going to lock the door until you are ready." And Ellen turned away.

"What should Ellen have told you, most provoking person?"

Richard drew a deep breath. She was lingering for talk with him, chin resting on linked hands. He must keep her, somehow he must keep her there.

"I declare I don't believe you hear a word I say!"

Not rapiers for this encounter. He must tempt her into forgetfulness, must hold her— "Do you really wish to know? And will you promise to listen to the end?"

"Of course." An unexpected, wholly distracting dimple appeared at the corner of Celia's lips. "If you don't take forever."

"But I'm going to take—forever." And then he hurried on before she should question or withdraw. "Ellen should have told me that this is haunted ground, an enchanted garden, where all the dreams of Spring are fashioned out of lilac scent and fresh-blown leaves and bird-music. And those the fairy princess does not need to play with herself she sends floating down like bright bubbles to poor mortals chained in the plain, old, everyday world. She's been sending me mine for ever so long."

"The fairy princess—" An air of deep puzzlement darkened Celia's gray eyes, and Richard's heart sang that she should so consent to play his game with him.

His voice softened. "Surely, surely you have seen her? You could never forget—never— Her hair is spun from Spring sunlight, her color stolen from the peach-blossoms. She can't help giving you dreams whether she wishes it or not. Just to see her is enough."

Was it the reflection of the sunset sky that deepened the glow in Celia's cheeks? Her eyes met his, merry and mocking.

Richard leaned an elbow on the trellis that supported the thick growth of clematis below.

"Spare that vine, good sir," begged Celia. "I have a fancy for it. In August the blossoms are like snowflakes."

"August! Who cares for August? It is a full century away." Richard tested the strength of the tendrils. "I think it is a magic beanstalk climbing heavenward."

"Please don't try it now. Ellen will turn ogre in a moment more if I don't hurry."

A sunbeam strayed from Celia's hair and sparkled on the small gleaming slippers poised lightly on the vine-wreathed sill, as if to dance away.

"Oh, no! I wasn't thinking of climbing, only wondering if it is safe for you to come down." Richard smiled up at her disarmingly.

"Come down?" Celia, in the moment of turning from him, paused uncertainly.

"Surely," said Richard, "with your silver shoon." And he began to hum, just audibly enough for Celia's ears, the song that had been haunting him from the moment he first glimpsed those shining slippers:

"Silver Shoon, did you steal from the moon?
With your cloudy hair so bright,
And your dancing eyes alight—
Silver Shoon, did you steal from the moon?"

How unbelievably black were the lashes that hid her gray eyes. She was gathering the slippers in her hand, was turning away from the window.

"Don't go," he urged, in desperate need of keeping her where he might see her. "Don't go—not yet——"

"But I must—" she hesitated, then finished gaily, "I'll see you—after a while."

And the window was only a window, framing emptiness.

RICHARD stood quite still while some one closed the shutters. Always he had believed in the miracle of the one love, instantly recognized, eternally binding. Always he had been searching, never finding, impatient and oblivious of imitations. Celia——

Slowly he turned away.

"Richard!" Ellen was back again at his side. "Richard, if you're going to attend the wedding, you'd better come up-stairs and dress. You haven't much time."

Richard drew a deep breath and tried to reply, but his voice did not come. Wedding! Celia's wedding! It couldn't be. Why, yesterday he had not known that Celia existed, yesterday he had told himself that he probably should never find her. And now he was being asked to dress to attend her marriage—her marriage to Blaise Drummond! He couldn't. Something must be done. Meanwhile he had to speak to Ellen, who was standing there regarding him with those clear questioning eyes that would see what he was thinking, know why he was hesitating——

"I kin go! I kin go! Auntie Ellen, mammy says so."

Richard turned in quick relief at the interruption. Around the corner of the house danced an elf of a boy, not more than four years old, hair as bright as Celia's own, brown eyes blazing with excitement. In his baby fist he clutched a grimy paper bag.

Something of the somberness lightened in Richard's eyes as he regarded the child.

"Oh, Merry!" Ellen bent over him adoringly. "He's Merrill Stafford, Celia's small nephew," she explained to Richard. "Where can you go, honey?" she asked.

THE PEEL TRAIT

By

JOSEPH C. LINCOLN

Every now and then a popular writer proceeds to go himself one better. That's what has happened with Joseph C. Lincoln in the current installment of "The Peel Trait." He gives here to this forceful novel a turn so shrewd, so funny, that it makes a good story all by itself. But we won't say more. A word to the wise——!

Love and heredity at war in a Cape Cod fishing village

FOR NEWCOMERS TO THE STORY

TO LORDLY old Captain Eliphalet Peel his lovely daughter Lettice (by his second marriage) was the dearest thing on earth. And so, when Wapatomac lads came courting, he maneuvered things by a trick so that she turned down her true lover, Farley Crowell—a young artist whom the cap'n did not consider a good investment—and gave herself in a "common-sense" marriage to Dave Booker, dashing keeper of the Ocean House. Deep in her heart, however, her love for Farley, who promptly left the village, burned bright as ever, but she discovered her father's treachery too late. She was already married to another man, and already that man was running wild with gambling and women. An automobile accident ended his worthless life, but Lettice would not even then forgive her father's cruel ruse. Refusing his plea to come and live with him in the second of three cottages which he owned—called A B C houses by jesting neighbors—she opened a notion shop by which to support herself. Her half brother and sister, Amarias Peel and Susanna Crusit (whose husband kept the general store) turned against her in a tempest of injured pride and thereafter schemed night and day for favor in the eyes of their rich old father, now failing. Following the Great War, Lettice's one-time lover, Farley Crowell, a broken veteran of the camouflage corps, returned to Wapatomac. Perhaps out of shame Captain Peel rented him at low cost the C house, where he set up a tiny business in sign-painting. Lettice and Farley became friends again, in a casual way, but village gossips knew that no marriage would come of it. "A Peel's foot may slip once," they cackled, "but not twice—in the same place!" Prosperity now began to creep into this Cape Cod community. There was talk of the town's buying the middle of the A B C houses and cutting a street through. It would have swelled Captain Eliphalet's purse, but he stubbornly refused to sell. Soon after this he died. Though he naturally left the "bulk of the estate" to Amarias and Susanna, his will (to the amazement of every one) apportioned ten thousand dollars and the A B C houses to Lettice. Farley, embarrassed to find himself the almost penniless tenant of the woman he had loved so single-heartedly all his life, then and there perceived that he must escape from the torment of her dear presence. So he announced to Lettice abruptly that he had definitely made up his mind to leave Wapatomac forever.

PART FOUR—CONCLUSION

TOWN-CLERK DIDLOW had called at the Booker notion shop that afternoon. Several people saw him enter the shop and one, at least, had seen him depart. That one was Mrs. Amarias Peel, and she planned to tell her husband about it at supper-time. The Peel supper was late, for Amarias had spent two hours or more with Lawyer Barnes at the latter's office. From that interview he had come home through a heavy rain, glum, downcast, and in anything but an amiable humor. Emeline noticed the storm-signals and dreaded to recognize them, but she felt that her news was sufficiently important to warrant risking the hurricane.

"Amarias," she ventured timorously, "I—I've got somethin' to tell you."

Her husband, whose appetite that evening was anything but robust, pushed a half-buttered biscuit disgustedly from his plate and growled:

"I don't care when you tell it," he declared. "If that hired girl you brought down from Boston is goin' to quit, the sooner you tell it the better. The stuff she cooks is enough to poison a hog. It's pretty nigh killed me, anyhow."

Emeline was startled into something like a protest.

"Oh, Amarias!" she cried. "You aren't goin' to tell Julia to go, are you?"

"Yes. You can do the work, same as you used to do. We can't afford luxuries—not after what I heard this afternoon."

"Oh, dear me! What have you heard?"

"Never mind. I don't want to talk about it."

"But—but, Amarias, what is it? Somethin' Mr. Barnes told you? Somethin' about—about Father Peel's will?"

Amarias's rage broke loose. "Father Peel!" he snorted furiously. "Father Peel be damned!"

"Why, Amarias! How can you talk so! You a church deacon, and about your own dead father! He's left us—us and Susanna and Abner—the bulk of the estate, hasn't he? That's what the will said. We heard it read."

Mr. Peel's lips drew back from his clenched teeth.

"The bulk of the estate!" he hissed. "Do you know what the bulk of that estate amounts to? Well, I'll tell you. After the bills are paid, and that blasted Lettice has got her ten thousand and the A B C houses, it may amount to five thousand dollars. Maybe not that."

Emeline gasped and turned white.

"Wh—what!" she cried. "Five thousand dollars! But, Amarias, Father Peel was a rich man. Everybody knew he was."

"Bah! Everybody guessed he was, the same as we did. And maybe he was rich once. But he wasn't when he died. His money had gone—except what that Lettice has managed to hook on to by her sneakin' contrivin'. By the livin' blazes, if I can get even with her—you watch me do it!"

"But, Amarias, there must be some mistake. Where has all the money gone to?"

"Don't ask me. It's been frittered away, I suppose. He gave the Government about a ton of it while the war was goin' on. Gave a thousand to this fool drive and another thousand to that, and scattered it right and left as if he didn't know nor care what became of it."

MRS. PEEL breathed heavily. The disappointment was crushing, but she tried hard to discover a thread of silver behind the clouds.

"Well," she sighed. "Well, I'm awful glad you borrowed as much from him when he was alive as Susanna and Abner did. Father lent you a lot, same as them, and that's some satisfaction— But, Amarias, were Susanna's and Abner's notes there? They're a part of the estate, aren't they? They'll have to pay them, won't they, and then we could collect our share."

Her husband sneered. "They were there, all right," he said, "in an envelope, with Susanna's name on it. And I presume likely there was a letter along with 'em. Anyhow, my notes were there, too, in another envelope with a letter to me. Here! You can read it, if you want to."

He threw the envelope across the table. In it was a little package of papers secured by a rubber band. There was also a short letter. It read as follows:

DEAR AMARIAS: Here are some notes of hand you've given me during the past dozen years or so, for value received. Altogether they amount to sixteen thousand two hundred dollars. I am giving them back to you now with my compliments. You can burn them up or keep them, just as you feel like. Susanna has had about as much and I'm leaving her hers too. Lettice hasn't had any, so I have left her some cash and the A B C houses. As you will see by my will, and as a little figuring will show you, you and Susanna get the bulk of the estate.

ELIPHALET PEEL.

Emeline read the letter through. Then she dropped it with a groan.

"Why—why, Amarias!" she exclaimed.

Her husband swore and prodded the tablecloth with his fork. His wife sighed.

"Well," she said, after a moment, "it's dreadful and I think Father Peel must have been crazy. And when I think of Lettice gettin' ten thousand dollars in real money and those A B C houses— Oh, Amarias!"

"Well, what is it? What ails you now?"

"Amarias, I meant to tell you soon as you got home. I shouldn't wonder if the town was goin' to buy the B house. I saw Noah Didlow come out of Lettice's shop this very afternoon."

Amarias leaned back in his chair.

"You saw Didlow in there with her?" he demanded.

"I saw him come out of there. And he must have been in there, mustn't he, else he wouldn't be comin' out? He— Amarias, where you goin'?"

Her husband had risen to his feet.

"Get on your hat," he ordered sharply. "Yes, and go up-stairs and change your clothes."

"But why—where am I goin' to go?"

"You're goin' with me right now to see Lettice."

"To see Lettice! Amarias, it's rainin' awful hard."

"I don't care if it's a blizzard. Go and change your clothes, I tell you."

"But why are we goin' to see her? We haven't hardly spoken to her for ever so long."

"You're goin' to speak to her now, 't any rate, and I'll tell you what to say. You'll be nice to her. Understand? She doesn't know how much, or how little, the old man left us. And she owns those A B C houses. I want those houses and I'm goin' to buy 'em, if I can."

"But, Amarias, I don't exactly see——"

He interrupted. "No, I don't suppose you do," he sneered. "I've told you, but that doesn't make any difference. I want those houses, all of 'em if I can get 'em—and if can't, I'll take two—or one. And I want to buy 'em cheap, before anybody catches on to what they're goin' to be worth. The chances are she hasn't sold the B house to Didlow and the town. He's just hinted at makin' her another offer, that's all. Well, I'll make her a bigger one. After I own those houses the town can deal with me, at any price. I'll win back part of the money I've been swindled out of. She and Susanna and the rest of 'em will find I'm not a dead one yet— There, there! Stop talkin' and hurry up!"

EMELINE obeyed orders. Twenty minutes later Lettice, alone after Farley's departure, listening in her little sitting-room to the whistle of the wind and the splash of the rain against the windows, was surprised to hear a knock at the door. When she opened that door and beheld her half-brother and his wife standing under a dripping umbrella—Amarias under seven-eighths of it and Emeline on the outskirts—she was much more surprised. It was the first call they had made upon her since she opened the notion shop.

No one would have guessed it from their manner. She made no move to shake hands, but they made it for her. They entered without waiting for an invitation and Emeline, to whom her husband had relinquished the umbrella as soon as it ceased to be of use to him, leaned the soaked affair against the wall.

"Well, Lettice," began Mr. Peel, "I—er—well, I guess you scarcely expected to see us here this evenin', did you?"

Lettice's reply was entirely frank.

"No, Amarias," she admitted. "I can't say that I did."

"I don't wonder. No, I don't wonder. But the fact is—the fact is—ahem! Sit down, Emeline. Sit down, Lettice. Emeline and I have come to have a real family talk with you—yes, a family talk, we three together. Shall we all sit down?"

He had thrown off his wet coat while speaking. Now he pulled forward a chair. His wife would have taken it, but he took it himself, so she took another. After a moment Lettice took a third.

"Lettice—" began Mr. Peel again. "Are we all comfortable? That's nice, that's nice! Lettice, I am goin' to tell you the truth. The fact is, Lettice, we are a little mite ashamed of ourselves—Emeline and I are. We've been doin' a lot of thinkin' since poor father passed on."

Apparently he expected his half-sister to make some comment on this statement. She remained silent, however, so after an instant's pause, he continued.

"Yes, we've been thinkin', Emeline and I have," he said. "We've been thinkin' that maybe we haven't acted just as we should toward you. Of course, maybe we think we had a little excuse. You haven't been very—er—cordial to us, you know, and——"

She interrupted. "Did you want me to be cordial?" she asked. "I don't remember noticing any signs of it on your part. You haven't been cordial to me, either of you, for a good many years."

"I know, I know—hush, Emeline!—as I say, maybe we have been a little mite to blame, and we realize it now, and are sorry for it. When David took to actin' the way he did, and you persisted in stickin' to him, we felt—well, Emeline and I couldn't help feelin' you ought to think of the family. The Peels have always had the name of bein' proud and—er—carryin' their heads high. We hoped—yes, and we couldn't help feelin', that you ought to leave Dave then and there. But you didn't, you know, and people were talkin' and our pride was hurt."

"And, after all, Lettice," put in Emeline, "you didn't have to marry Dave, if you didn't want to."

Her husband ordered her to be quiet, but Lettice did not seem to resent the statement.

"You are quite right, Emeline," she said promptly. "I didn't have to. I was of age, and I was supposed to have a mind of my own. You and Susanna and father were all thinking of my happiness when you worked for the match, and I let you do it. It was nobody's fault but my own. You are right there. Nowadays I do my own thinking—and mean to.

There was significance in the last sentence which Mr. Peel caught but did not understand. He hastened to oil the troubled waters.

"Well," he observed gently, "all that is past and done with. We all make mistakes, Lettice."

"Yes, we do. And

WHEN PHILIP RETURNED, CORLISS TRIED TO READ HIS FATE IN HIS FATHER'S CONTROLLED COUNTENANCE

The story of a flame that could not be put out

A TASSEL of wisteria tapped at the front window. Lilac scent, palpable like smoke from a swinging censer, drifted into the hall. And up the stairway came the voice of Violet's end-of-the-season star lecturer—authoritative, weary.

"So we must learn to find it unthinkable that our wills, our tastes, even our standards, should encase our children in a world of our fixation. It is theirs, the world—life is theirs. I say it again and again. Biologically that is all that we are—the abandoned husk upon the ground——"

Philip Mallory, whom the sound of that voice had arrested at the door of his room, above the library where his sister's meeting was in progress, sighed. His own foreboding of that very hour! His own foreboding reenforced by science. Hadn't Violet told him she was importing some eminent psychiatrist for this final meeting of the Rivermead Mother-Teachers Association? He had been right then—at forty-four his day was done.

He listened yet another moment to the spatter of gently applauding hands. He listened to faint murmurings of women relaxed from the strain of attention. He listened to a frightened mother endeavoring to combat the psychiatric doom. Violet helped her. Violet was a dear and patient chairman, her brother thought with tender, amused admiration.

"I only wanted to ask Doctor Wade," the questioner panted, "if we—parents, I mean, and teachers, and all of us older ones—ought to think that we are only husks—only husks"—it was becoming a chant, but with a mighty effort she pulled out of it—"economically, too. If it is true that we are nothing at all bio-bio-biologically, but something you'd sweep into the dust-pan, how about us as providers? And anyway, aren't we—aren't people, I mean—middle-aged people—something besides biologists?—I mean something more than bi—than bi——"

At last she succumbed to the overmastering difficulties of speech, but not before Doctor Wade had extricated her thought from its entangling alliances.

"What Mrs. Thorley is asking," he said, "is whether the human adult, in that stage of civilization to which we have advanced, has no other function than the biological. It is a fair question and——"

"A fair question—I should say it was!" declared a low voice at Philip Mallory's elbow. He swung around, surprised. "That little woman—I know she's little, don't you?—could make mincemeat of the psychiatrist if she had only learned their jargon."

The speaker was a spirited young woman, rather short, sturdy, with hair the dark auburn of an Irish setter's. She had evidently been sitting in a nook at the turn of the stairs toward the third story. She looked with friendly eyes at Philip. "You're Mr. Mallory, of course. You don't know me—I'm Katrina Blakelock."

"Of course you are! I ought to have known you—you are exactly like your mother." He shook her firm, brown hand cordially.

"I telegraphed Aunt Violet yesterday from Boston, asking if I might come here for a night before I sailed. I'm going abroad to-morrow on the Cedric. And I ran into this. I told auntie I would come down and help dispense tea afterward, but not to the meeting—no more juvenile psychology for me this season! You see, I teach at St. Monica's, and my vacation has just begun."

Her auburn-hazel eyes, sparkling frankly into his gray ones, had golden lights that might have been reflected from her glinting hair. She was better looking, Philip decided, than her mother had been a quarter of a century ago.

"I'm glad you are going to be with us, even if it is only for a little while," he told her. "I'll see you at dinner."

"Aren't you coming down?"

"No. I have to do some thinking—on being a husk." He smiled.

"Well," she laughed, turning to leave him, "don't forget that you are something besides a 'biologist!' "

PHILIP still smiled as he watched the swing of her body going down the stairs. It wouldn't be so bad, he reflected, to be an outworn shell upon the sands of time if one could have had a child like this. But his son Corliss—Corliss was another matter. Philip's smile faded.

The great authority down-stairs, he supposed, would challenge his theory, but for his part he didn't believe that a child was fairly started whose parents had not whole-heartedly loved each other. And he knew now that what he had called his love for Minna Corliss had survived their marriage only briefly. Poor Minna! Their marriage—he saw it now with the eyes of his maturity—had been of her vehement contriving. In it he had been acquiescent rather than eager, as later he had been acquiescent to the family verdict that he had better take the opening with Wheeler and Henning, cotton brokers. He hadn't really wanted to go into that business. He had wanted to teach the history of the fine arts, to write a play, to explore Africa—he had had all the nebulous aspirations of all young men with educated tastes and without robustly shaping talent. But he had fallen a little in love with Minna Corliss, he had married and settled down because other people thought it a good thing to do.

Two years after his marriage, six months after Corliss's birth, his wife had died, and again he had acquiesced—this time in his sister Violet's plea to be allowed to come and keep his home for him. Violet had been a pretty slip of a girl then, nineteen, pulsing with undirected tenderness and generosity. She lavished it all on the baby Corliss. It hadn't been fair to Violet—and it hadn't been fair to Corliss, either. Philip had acquiesced in it. Half amused, half bored, he had acquiesced in all of Violet's pretty child-training enthusiasms. And what experiments, good, bad and indifferent, had not been tried upon his son! A medley of names and terms straggled through his recollection—almost twenty years of them. Doctor Holt, Montessori, Winifred Stoner, self-determination, Binet, the sacredness of personality, the creative intention of destructive acts—poor, eager, searching Violet! But poorer Corliss!

AUTOMOBILES were beginning to depart. That vivid young creature, Katrina Blakelock, must be near the end of her tea-pouring. He was glad she was to be there for dinner. Sensible woman her mother had been—older sister of a friend of Violet's girlhood. The family had moved west. He had forgotten all about them, except when he had absent-mindedly pretended to listen while Violet read him scraps from occasional letters——

But he had come home from business early, not to think about these things—not even his problem of a son Corliss. Perhaps the boy might not turn out so badly after all! There had been no complaints about him from Exover, the latest of his schools, for nearly six months now. What was really uppermost in his mind that day was the alarming proposition which Henning had that forenoon sprung upon him.

He had always assumed that some day, in a reorganization of the firm, he was to be allowed to buy into partnership on easy terms. He had been with the concern over twenty-one years. After the first five or six he had been advanced with comfortable, unexciting regularity in salary and in authority.

He had spent the increasing salary without difficulty and without compunction. If he died—so his calculation ran—his life insurance, a heavy one, would care for Violet adequately. Corliss at twenty-five would come into a little from his grandfather Corliss's estate—enough, as much as any young man should have. Meantime they lived well. His sister had given her life for his son and his home. It was only fitting that the home should be of recompensing dignity and charm.

All very reasonable. But to-day Henning had announced that the reorganization of the firm was upon them. Old Joe Wheeler was transferring stock and interest to his son, young Joe. And they had had proposals from Eric Steiger about buying in. Steiger was ready to put in fifty thousand——

"Frankly, Phil," Henning, brusk at first, had become conciliatory once the ice had been broken, "neither my father nor myself would consider it if—if you are ready to buy in. But Steiger's been with us seventeen years——"

"I've been with you nearly twenty-two." Philip had cut in.

"Is it so long? Yes—yes, you're right. But—well, your life is different from Steiger's, your life, your interests. He eats and sleeps and dreams cotton—no friends, no clubs, no outside pursuits. While you——"

"I've always figured that my clubs, as you are referring to them, were a business asset. We've found them so, I think, Sam."

"Yes, I know your wide connections have been of considerable advantage to us. But anyway, as I said, we shan't accept Steiger's offer—though he makes his remaining with us contingent on letting him in, and he's a damned good man. I'd hate to see him go— But we shan't accept his offer if you are ready to come in. Are you?"

WAS he? Could he raise fifty thousand dollars? His investments were negligible. He and his household had always spent the whole of his income, no matter how it increased. To raise the money and to repay it would mean a right-about-face—a first mortgage from the bank on the house, something on his life-insurance policy, the sale of his few bonds, a second mortgage perhaps, and, above all, a strict curtailment of living expenses for five years—ten. Was it worth while?

On the other hand, what of the prospect of being a hired man at fifty-five, at sixty, subject to a hired man's dismissals?

But, wisdom aside, had he any longer the mental vigor for a right-about-face? Could he do it, even if he would?

And Corliss was going to be more and more costly for the next few years. If he succeeded in getting into college, his father might as well write an extra two thousand dollars a year to his budget. And if the boy didn't succeed in getting accepted, he was not likely to be much less expensive——

A hired man at sixty, at sixty-five, out of a job and an income at seventy——

But could a husk—damn Violet's big-wig! his phrase had stuck—could a husk change its way of life? Were not right-about-faces only for the young—for Corliss, he hoped, and for that golden, glinting girl of the Blakelocks?

That golden girl of the Blakelocks! His thoughts dwelt upon her. She seemed to him what he had never seemed to himself—so competent with life. To have had a wife like that beside one from the days of one's youth!

He caught at his runaway thought in surprise. How long it was since he had last seemed actually to see a woman—the real human being beneath the pretty garb of graceful manners and pleasant talk that women wore! Years and years.

He sighed. Life had been lonely. In spite of all the little compensations—Violet and the charming house and the kind hostesses who liked to have him at their dinner-tables. Lonely, and he had not known it. But to-day he knew it. The smell of lilacs on the air made him feel lost and homesick. And there was the realization that no one cared whether he chose the old man's course or still played at being a young man with something yet to achieve.

DINNER had begun rather better than young Corliss dared to hope. He had been desperate in the afternoon when, arriving unheralded from Exover, he had found his Aunt Violet's meeting in full swing. He had come home to lay before her, for transmission to his father at a propitious moment, his story of the little episode which had caused the Exover authorities to send him and his chum Venner away. Two nights before they had escaped from their dormitory, "borrowed" a car—vastly overvalued, he was sure, at thirteen hundred dollars—to run to a dance, and had subsequently smashed it. He wanted to lay the essential blamelessness of the affair before her and to negotiate from her sufficient advance cash for a trip to Venner's, out near Cleveland, until the storm over the ruined automobile should subside. And his plans had collided with one of her deadly, never-ending meetings!

HOWEVER, Doctor Wade's dicta, which he overheard as he loitered impatiently back of the library, had cheered him. He only wished that his father could have heard them, too! Those admirably sane thoughts on making a world adapted to the needs of young life, of fitting youth with its environment, not with age's! No beastly boring idea of endless education! He thought vaguely of the opportunities in South American countries—señoritas, red blossoms, guitars, prime ministerships. He thought of the rapid fortunes accumulated by Douglas Fairbanks, Charlie Chaplin——

And then he came down to earth, remembering that he was caught at home, where he least wanted to be.

Nevertheless, dinner had begun rather well. His father, in spite of obvious astonishment at seeing him, asked no inopportune questions. The Blakelock girl, though getting on—she must be twenty-four, maybe twenty-five—was not yet senile. Doctor Wade proved to be as good an old scout as his views on youth and age had led Corliss to expect; a little dippy over Aunt Violet, apparently, which was farcical, but, still, emphatically a good old scout. Under the cover of middle-aged laughter over some golf tale, he invited Katrina's attention to the pitiful phenomenon of the scientist's admiration. But she, murmuring "How pretty she is—they don't make us like that any more," directed Corliss's gaze from the psychiatrist to his aunt. What he saw struck a hollow note of dismay in his heart, for his Aunt Violet's blue eyes, starry beneath a faintly silvering cloud of soft-brown hair, told him that the vassal of his whole young life was bowing at another shrine than his.

Before he recovered from the shock of that tasteless revelation, another blow fell. The waitress was standing behind his father and was saying in tones all too distinct: "Long-distance call for you, sir. The headmaster of Exover Academy——"

As Philip left the table Violet's eyes suddenly seemed normal again and fixed themselves upon her nephew with an anguished apprehension. Corliss essayed a laugh, but it broke off in his throat. Katrina Blakelock, humorous and a little hard, appraised the situation.

"Dear Mr. Mallory, we regret to report—" she gibed.

"Where do you get that stuff?" asked Corliss belligerently.

"Oh, I teach in a school myself. And, besides, I have a brother your age."

Well, anyway, she had the sense to recognize the whole affair as usual—Corliss forgave her mockery.

When Philip came back into the dining-room, Corliss tried to read his fate in his father's controlled countenance. He chafed against the social code that forced people to act as though nothing were the matter. He hated the music which followed after dinner.

Philip, however, found it tranquilizing. Katrina sang, Violet accompanied her. "O schoene Tag"—pretty thing, that. And Katrina could open her mouth and let her clear true voice out without looking like an unfeathered bird gaping for a parental worm. Lovely girl—if only—

What the "Ductless Glands" are— and how they affect your child's health

By LEWELLYS F. BARKER, M.D.

THE HAPPY CHILD IS THE HEALTHY CHILD

with whose body, mind and spirit "all's well!" Do you wish help in keeping your child happy and healthy? If so, for fifty cents a year you can join one of THE DELINEATOR'S "Happy Child" clubs and receive a monthly letter from a skilled child specialist, giving you valuable advice about bringing up your little ones. There are four of these clubs: one for Expectant Mothers, one for New Babies, a third concerning little Runabouts, and a fourth about School Children. Send your dues to "The Happy Child Club," THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., stating which membership you wish, and your first letter will go to you at once

The Happy Child Department

Recently President of the American Child Hygiene Association; Consultant of the Division of Maternity, Infancy and Child Hygiene in the New York State Department of Health

SINCE the aim of THE DELINEATOR'S "Happy Child" department is to give facts to mothers regarding the health, beauty and happiness of their children, a word this month about the "ductless glands" and their relation to physical and mental growth may prove helpful. What part, if any, do these glands and the "internal secretions" they produce play in determining the bodily form, in modifying the functions of the organs, and in influencing the thought, feeling and behavior of the child?

The question is a particularly timely one. Not only have medical men become profoundly interested in it of late, but members of the laity, too, have heard a great deal about "endocrine glands." And as is so often the case with new discoveries, the public has received much misinformation concerning "glandular defects" and "glandular treatment" of both children and adults. The object of this brief article therefore is to record in a simple way some of the interesting facts that seem to be well established.

Every mother would rejoice if told that her child could with proper care be "healthy" and "happy"; and she would be still further gladdened if told it could also be "beautiful." No intelligent mother, accordingly, can fail to be interested in the conditions upon which the health, happiness and beauty of a developing human being depend.

Health is a condition of physical and mental soundness and well-being. Happiness depends in large measure, first, upon the possession of a variety of physical and mental powers, and, secondly, upon the opportunity adequately to exercise those powers. And beauty, in turn, consists of the manifestation of certain accepted standards as to magnitude and symmetry of body, coloring of skin, grace and flexibility of movement, and external expression of the mind within.

Without such form, and such charm of expression, a human being will be said to lack beauty. He may even be regarded as ugly or ludicrous. For although no two human beings are, or can be, precisely alike, to be healthy, happy and beautiful an individual must not be in structure of body, function of organs, or capacity of mind, too greatly different from what may be called the "ideal human type."

Now, what a human being comes to be, either in form and function of body or in capacity of mind, depends upon his heredity on the one hand and his surroundings on the other. For every human being, like every higher animal, begins in the union of two germ cells, one derived from the father and one from the mother. These two cells unite to form a single cell, which under the influence of nourishment, warmth and other influences of its surroundings grows and divides into two cells, four cells, eight cells, and ultimately into the millions of cells of which the developed body is composed.

The cells that constitute the bony skeleton, the muscles, the nerves, the skin, the sense organs and the various internal organs all originate in this way, though the cells of different groups differ greatly from the single cell from which they have been derived, and from those of other groups as they become specialized for the performance of particular functions.

All the possibilities of development lie in the original fertilized egg-cell; and these possibilities which later are realized are the ones favored by influences in the surroundings both before and after birth.

The surprising thing about development is that it proceeds in such an orderly fashion, leading in each instance to an organism much like other organisms of the same species. It surely is a remarkable thing that the head, arms, legs, heart, liver, kidneys and brain of one human being should come, in their development, to be so much like those of every other. We can not but marvel at the process that gradually transforms the little lump of living protoplasm of which the fertilized egg-cell is composed into the complex creature we know first as a child and later as an adult human being.

That human beings differ from one another ought scarcely to astonish us. Is it not more remarkable that they resemble one another as closely as they do? Evidently, in the division of cells, in their grouping into organs and tissues, and in the specialization of their functions, the processes are subject to regulatory mechanisms that favor development here, restrain it there, and control it everywhere.

STUDENTS of development have been very busy, in recent years, attempting to unravel its mysteries. They have found out a great deal about the physical and chemical influences which determine the shape and workings of the body. Among other things, they have discovered that the products of certain small "ductless glands" or "endocrine organs" are of very great significance in relation to the development of the body and the activity of the mind.

It is not going beyond well-established facts to assert that the height of the human body, its stoutness or thinness, the shape of the skull, the length of the arms and legs, the color, texture and moisture of the skin, the prominence of the eyes and their brightness, the size and shape of the jaw, the development of the teeth, the form of the nose, the sound of the voice, the distribution of the hairs on the body, the tone of the muscles, the speed of thinking, the emotional responses to outside influences, the changes that occur at puberty and the degree of masculinity or femininity manifested, are all, to a large extent at least, determined by the way the ductless glands work during the period of development.

Since insufficient activity on the one hand, or overactivity on the other, of one or more of these glands may be associated with profound modification of the characteristics mentioned above, it is legitimate to assume that normal development is to a considerable degree dependent upon a well-balanced functioning of the several glands of internal secretion.

The ductless glands include the thyroid gland and the parathyroid glands in the neck, the pituitary gland at the base of the skull, the thymus gland behind the breast bone, a suprarenal gland at the upper end of the kidney (on each side of the body), the islands of Langerhans of the pancreas, and the sex-glands. These ductless glands manufacture secretions containing powerful chemical substances; and these secretions do not go into ducts that open on the inner or outer surface of the body; instead they enter the blood and are carried to all parts of the body, thus reaching the cells and tissues which they especially influence.

The more active constituents of these secretions are slowly being isolated as pure chemical substances; thus, that of the marrow of the suprarenal gland is known as "epinephrin" or "adrenalin" and that of the thyroid gland as "thyroxin." The chemical nature of the secretion from other glands is as yet unknown, though powerful extracts have been obtained from some of them, including "pituitrin" from the pituitary gland and "insulin" from the islands of the pancreas.

TO MAKE clear how important the proper working of these glands must be for healthy natural development, examples of the abnormal development that has been found to occur when a gland is artificially removed in early life, or when it has been diseased so as to lessen its function or so as to cause it to overfunction, may be cited.

Thus, some children are born without a thyroid gland, or with a gland that is much smaller and less active than normal. They remain dwarf-like in stature, have sunken, dull-looking eyes, thick, dry, wrinkled skin, and sparse, coarse hair; they are prone to be fat and to have a pudgy look; their bones do not develop properly, and their teeth are late in appearing. More distressing still, they are inattentive, and slow-minded, sometimes almost idiotic.

Surgical operations at which a large part or all of the thyroid gland has been removed from human beings or animals have been followed by the development of similar symptoms. If children suffering from the above-mentioned symptoms are given either small doses of dried thyroid gland substance derived from sheep (or other animals), or the active principle of the thyroid known as thyroxin, the symptoms will largely disappear.

But there are other children who present an entirely different picture, due to an increased and probably a perverted activity of the thyroid gland. These children suffer from what is known as "Graves' disease" or "exophthalmic goitre." In them the thyroid gland is enlarged (goitre) and pulsates, the eyes are very prominent, the lid slits are wide, the skin is thin and moist and the heart beats at a very rapid rate. The patient has a frightened look, is very nervous and restless, loses weight rapidly and often suffers from profuse sweats and watery diarrhea.

Under suitable medical treatment, or by applying X-rays or radium over the thyroid gland to reduce its activity, the symptoms of exophthalmic goitre can be improved. In severe forms of the disease, surgeons remove a portion of the gland, an operation that is often quickly followed by marked improvement of the patient's condition. The disease is fortunately rare in children, but it is a common affection in women between the ages of sixteen and forty.

Sometimes the thyroid gland undergoes enlargement and degeneration because of lack of iodin in the food (endemic goitre). Any one who has traveled in Switzerland has been struck by the great number of large and unsightly goitres to be seen there. Moderate goitre of this type is common on the borders of the great lakes in the United States and Canada. It is interesting that small doses of sodium iodid, prescribed by the family physician for a week or so each year, will prevent the appearance of goitre of this sort in girls who would otherwise develop it.

JUST as striking are the changes in bodily appearance and mental functions that may be associated with disorders of the pituitary gland. This gland consists of three parts, a front lobe, a rear lobe and a middle portion. The first lobe is of importance for the growth of bone and for the sexual functions. The rear lobe and the middle portion yield on extraction a fluid known as "pituitrin," which is a powerful stimulant to contraction of the smooth muscles of the uterus and of the intestine; it also enables the kidneys to secrete a concentrated urine.

Now if, during development, the pituitary gland is too active, there will be overgrowth of bone; the skull will enlarge and the arms and legs will grow to be very long. The "giants" of circuses and the "longest lady" of Barnum's shows, it is believed, were instances of such "hyperpituitarism."

When the enlargement of the pituitary gland occurs in later life, the appearance of the person undergoes a remarkable change. The lower jaw becomes greatly enlarged, the teeth become more or less separated, the face assumes a hexagonal shape, the hands become huge and spadelike in form, and the fingers and toes become sausage shaped. This condition, known as "acromegaly," has frequently been found to be associated with tumors of the pituitary gland.

BIRD NUMBER

EDITOR—HARRIET IDE EAGER

PICTURE EDITOR—ROBERT GRAEF

My Little Page

DEAR EARLY BIRDS: That's my hopeful June name for you, because I hope you will all write to me early this month, and try early for the Birdhouse Contest. Don't put it off. Suppose your editor and the picture editor said to each other: "Well, to-morrow, maybe or the next day, we'll make THE LITTLE DELINEATOR. But not now. We're too busy and it's too much trouble." And they would keep putting it off and putting it off, until—suddenly—Great Jumping Grasshoppers! (as Tommy Tiptoe's friend, the Water-skater would say)—there would be THE BIG DELINEATOR, all printed and ready to mail with no LITTLE DELINEATOR inside. How would you feel then, and how would all the other boys and girls feel?

Excuse me if I've scolded too much, for I am still your faithful and loving editor, HARRIET IDE EAGER.

P.S.—My address is always THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, care of THE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y.

HERE'S NEWS! HERE'S BIG NEWS!

Your editor is going abroad! Your editor is going across the ocean, to Europe, and all the interesting things she sees there she will write for you in THE LITTLE DELINEATOR. Even our Deli-bear will trot along and have funny adventures in strange countries.

You will make friends with children in different countries—see how they dress, and what they play, and you will have a chance to win real foreign prizes.

Watch for the July LITTLE DELINEATOR—our first foreign number! And watch for all the other foreign numbers to come. Hurray for all the foreign numbers of THE LITTLE DELINEATOR!

Here's Tommy Tiptoe come alive—Alfred Hoblitzell, Junior, six years old, of Wheeling, West Virginia, wearing a green and red and yellow Tommy Tiptoe suit his mother made for him. Isn't he nice!

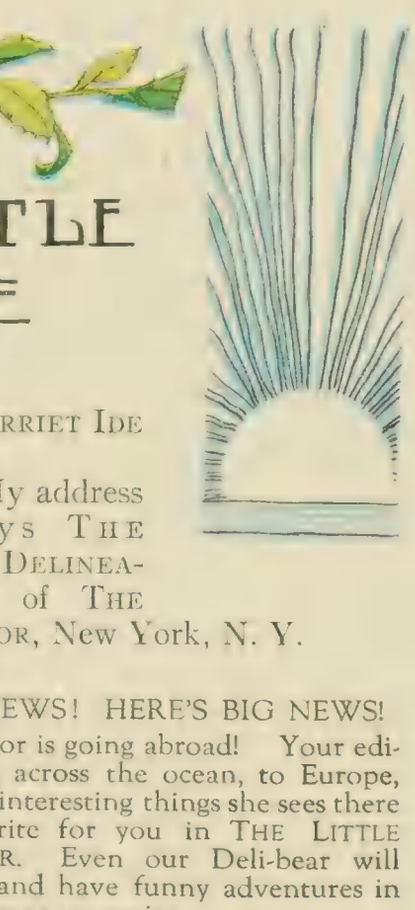
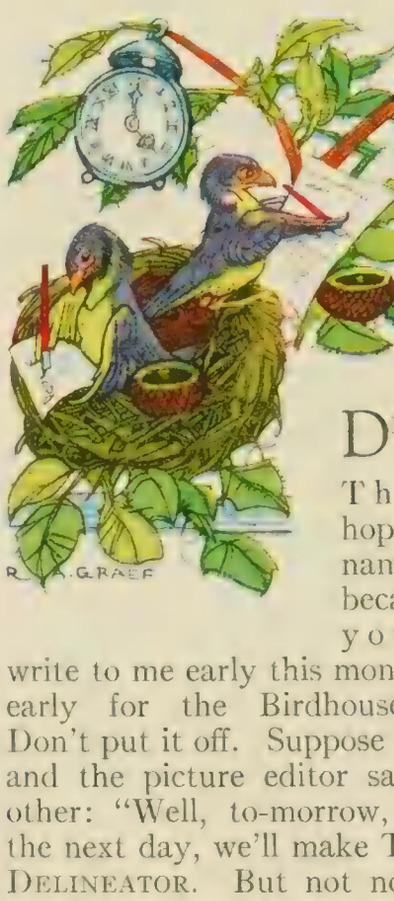
AMERICA'S BIRD CLUB

The Audubon Society



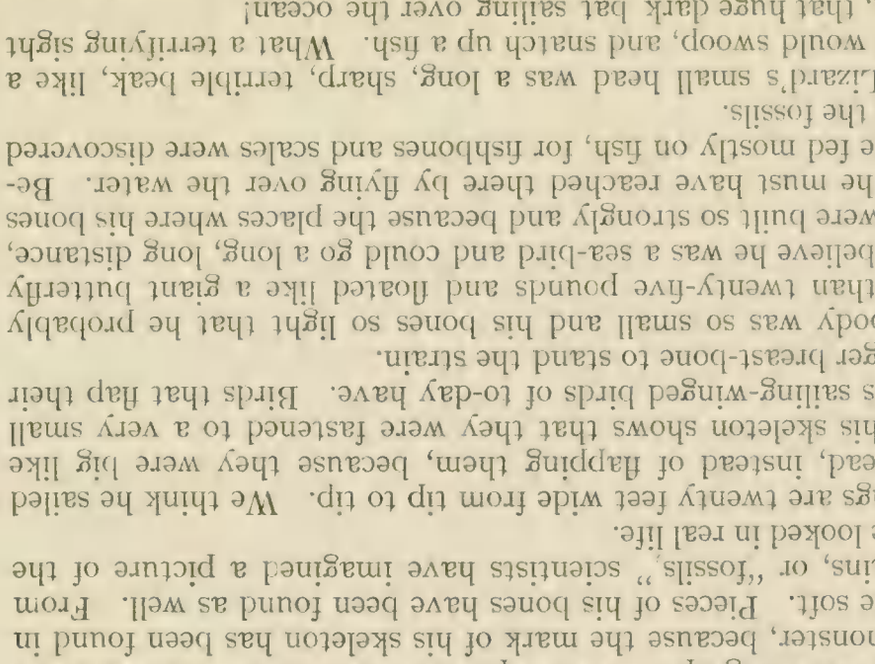
DID you know that if all the birds suddenly vanished from the earth, we should soon have no trees, no plants, no food, and that you and I and every other living creature would die? Birds keep all growing things alive by eating harmful insects which would kill our food, and so kill us.

And birds need friends. They need protection. Every child who loves birds should join a Bird Club. There is a big Bird Club in America called "The Audubon Society," named for our great nature-lover, Audubon. Any person or club or school interested in protecting and studying birds may join, and with the membership comes a subscription to "Bird-Lore," a magazine giving news and pictures for bird-lovers.



If your school class does not belong, ask your teacher to let you. Membership cost five dollars a year. The Audubon Society publishes interesting leaflets about birds, costing only five cents each, besides many bird books and pictures. Write all your bird questions to The Audubon Society, 1974 Broadway, New York, N. Y.

WIN THIS BIRDHOUSE



For the most interesting, helpful letters on "How Children Can Help the Birds," we will give three prizes. First prize—The birdhouse in the left picture. Second prize—The birdhouse in the right. Third prize—A big picture like this month's bird cover, framed. Each one must give his name, age and address. Every child who enters the contest and sends a stamped, self-addressed envelope will receive the "Bird-Letter" from your editor, telling names of good bird-books for children and some bird-games to play. Contest closes June 20. Address Bird-house Contest, THE LITTLE DELINEATOR, New York, N. Y.

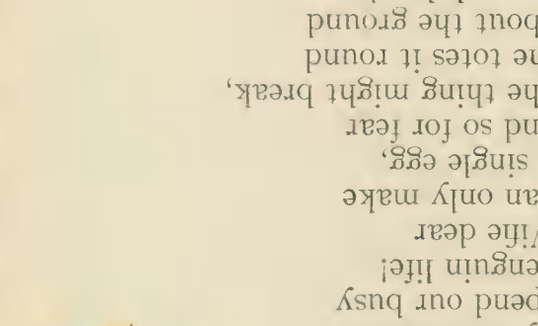
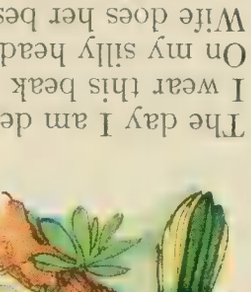
That Lived on the Earth Millions of Years Ago

THE FLEW over the young earth millions of years ago, in the days we call "prehistoric," or before history. We can only guess what life was like then, from strange relics dug up in various parts of the world. But we know there was such a monster, because the mark of his skeleton has been found in stone that was once soft. Pieces of his bones have been found as well. From these dug-up remains, or "fossils," scientists have imagined a picture of the Flying Lizard as he looked in real life.



His skeleton-wings are twenty feet wide from tip to tip. We think he sailed with wings outspread, instead of flapping them, because they were big like sails and because his skeleton shows that they were fastened to a very small breastbone, such as sailing-winged birds of to-day have. Birds that flap their wings need a stronger breast-bone to stand the strain.

His lizard-like body was so small and his bones so light that he probably weighed no more than twenty-five pounds and floated like a giant butterfly over the sea. We believe he was a sea-bird and could go a long, long distance, because his wings were built so strongly and because the places where his bones were found, show he must have reached there by flying over the water. Besides, he must have fed mostly on fish, for fishbones and scales were discovered in the ground with the fossils.



On the Flying Lizard's small head was a long, sharp, terrible beak, like a dagger. Down he would swoop, and snatch up a fish. What a terrifying sight he must have been, that huge dark bat sailing over the ocean!

Other strange lizards lived on the prehistoric earth at that time, but the Flying Lizard was the strangest of them all.

Feathered friend=and Stranger bird

SEE me, see me!
Chick-chickadee-dee!
A cheery fat
Small acrobat!
Head down I cling
To twigs and swing,
Snatch off a worm
'Fore he can squirm,
Turn somersaults,
Quick as a wink,
Till you might think
This sign I wear:
"Any side up,
Do not take care!"
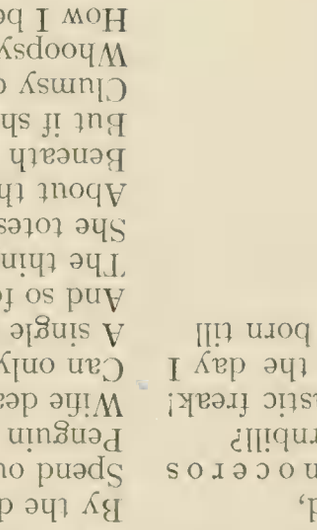
On bugs I sup—
Eight, nine or ten.
I have no faults
Harmful to men.
Oh no, I'm nice
And do no evil,
And only eat
Such things as these:
Bad moths I meet
Who hurt the trees,
The pesky lice
And wicked weevil.
In sleet and snow
I'm quite a sprinter.
When others go
South for the Winter,
You'll see me rustling
Through the storm,
Hustling, bustling,
Gay and warm!

KIK-A-RICK!
Kik-a-reck!
Pick, pick!
Peck, peck!
Whack, thwack,
Who's there?
Woodpecker pair!
Gray, white and black,
With handsome red
Bright-feathered head!
No one could call
Us choristers,
But we are all
Good foresters,
Protecting trees
From enemies,
Bad bugs and such
Who eat too much.
Nuts too we stack
And store away,
In hole or crack
For a Winter day.
Kik-a-rick! Kik-a-rick!
Who's there?
Who's there?
Woodpecker pair!

but honest truth in every word.



OH, haven't you heard
Of that curious bird,
Rhinoceros Hornbill?
Fantastic freak!
From the day I am born till
The day I am dead,
I wear this beak
On my silly head.
Wife does her best—
Lays only one
Gray egg upon
Our Hornbill nest
In a hollow tree.
And then watch me!
I plaster that door
With mud until Ma shows no more
Than her yellow bill!
And there she'll wait
Till her Baby's ready.
But I treat 'em great,
And I feed 'em steady,
From morn till night,
On mouse and rat
Till Ma's so fat,
She's a perfect sight!

Pa and wife,
Friends and cousins
By the dozens
Spend our busy
Penguin life!
Wife dear
Can only make
A single egg,
And so for fear
The thing might break,
She totes it round
About the ground
Beneath her leg.
But if she drops it,
Clumsy creeter—
Whoopsy whopsit!
How I beat her!

THIS Penguin chap
You might not call
A bird at all!
But I can flap
My wings for paddle,
Fast and dizzy,
Widdle waddle!
In the water
Where my daughter,

I'M THE absurd
Flamingo bird
I love to stand
On one long leg
In muddy bogs,
(Oh, not to beg for daily bread
With outstretched hand)
No, with my head
To suck up frogs!
Elegant rose
Are my feathered clothes,
A perfect fit.
Wife loves to sit
On a round mud-hill,
And snuggle there
On her nest until Crack! go her eggs
Nor does she care
My happy bride,
If her long, long legs
Hang down outside!

DEAR AUNT HARRIET:
If I were Tommy Tiploe I would go to the birds and ask them: "Why do your eggs have so many colors? Where do you get your beautiful voices and learn so many songs? Why do you build your houses high up in trees, roofs of houses, under blinds and in chimneys sometime? Why are your wings so pretty? Why do you fly, not walk? What do you build your nests out of? How do you teach your little babies to fly? What kind of food do you eat?" Then, let them take me in the air on their back and show me things I never saw, show me how to build a bird's nest, show me what makes them keep up in the air.

CARELESS DELI-BEAR

Written by William Preston, Jr., E. Cleveland, Ohio (First prize-winner, November Deli-bear contest)

Our Deli-bear went out to play
With wagon red and feeling gay.

He played until the shades of night,
Came down and shut out all the light.

The morning came and Deli found,
He'd left his wagon out on the ground.

He looked and looked and felt so sad,
He'd lost the only wagon he had.

His mother asked him why he cried
"I've lost my wagon and I wish I'd died."

"Well I'm sure you'll be careful evermore
You will find your wagon behind the door."

"When a Girl Marries"—

The problem of furnishing begins

By

MRS. CHARLES BRADLEY SANDERS
Head of the Department of House Decoration

BRIDES

of this year, yesteryear, or years to come: Do the problems of a new home overwhelm you? Are you "at sea" as to the appropriateness of its furnishing? Whether they be the choosing, placing or making of your house decorations, write for the solution of your difficulties, enclosing a stamped envelope. We will send you all the information you desire. Our booklet, "Furnishing the Home," will be found most practical. Address Mrs. Charles Bradley Sanders, care of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building New York, N. Y.

WHEN the bride or beginner sets out to furnish a home, she is usually, at some stage of the enterprise, bewildered by the assortment of house furnishings available. Unless she has some slight knowledge of the recognized principles on which successful house decoration is founded, she will find herself floundering amid a maze of the latest decorating fads, and wondering why she can not attain that bit of beauty so much desired. Caution, please, before buying anything; remember that the most successful homes are the simplest. Small areas of carefully chosen color and good design are worth feet and yards of colorless tones or inappropriate patterns. Any one, for example, may buy yards of white damask and spread upon it white china heavily banded in gold with cut-glass goblets and a vase for roses, but only those who either naturally inherit artistic feeling or who are influenced by the principles of good decoration would have the assurance that a table set with a simple cloth of jade-green linen, buff pottery and a centerpiece of stoneware filled with either bittersweet or ivy would make the little home a very pleasant and individual place to live in.

Generally speaking, in the treatment of walls lies the success or failure of a room. They are the decorator's first consideration always, and are best tackled by comparing them with a picture. It may be necessary to use a neutral flat color to bring out color and design in the carpet or other furnishings if they have already been decided on; while on the other hand, a striped or figured wall-paper may be needed to relieve the plain somber woods and fabrics of contemplated furnishings. Again, the furnishing of a room may be built around a certain color, as many people have decided preferences concerning color. This requires a simple knowledge of the blending of colors, which may be acquired by studying the color wheel. If strictly period furnishings are to be indulged in, only the type of wall decoration which conforms to the traditions or motifs of that particular period should be considered.

After walls come the floors, and indeed their color and finish are of great importance. As floors are primarily intended to be walked on, light colors and cheap materials should be barred from the purchasing list. Buy only the best the markets offer, whether it be rugs, carpets, or linoleum, as it not only adds to the value of the house but to its comfort and attractiveness. It is entirely a matter of choice whether one buys large or small rugs, carpets or linoleum, but in any case the wood floor (if any is left showing) should be several shades darker than the woodwork, and the floor covering should be the darkest of any dominating color note in the room. There are always the Orientals, the Wiltons, the velvets, the Axminsters, chenilles, the linens, fiber, braided, hooked and woven rag rugs in the list of appropriate small-house floor coverings. Linoleum, it should be noted, in the present-day variety of plain colors and patterns is by no means confined to kitchen use; and every room in the house can be made warmer, more quiet and beautiful by its use.

After floor coverings comes the choosing of furniture—a task which should not be hurried. Take plenty of time and look around. If you are not situated so that you can see a variety of furniture at close hand, send for manufacturers' catalogs. They will help you decide and will tell you where you may purchase your choice. Of course, if you are especially fond of antiques, and have one or two cherished possessions to start with, auctions and chance finds are the most reasonable methods of obtaining additional pieces. Antique dealers occasionally have the very pieces you are looking for at about the same price as such a piece of modern furniture would be.

The inexperienced are often uncertain as to whether combining periods in furniture is correct. It is just as permissible as combining colors or fabrics, so long as the various pieces are good in themselves and conform to the general style of the big foundation pieces of a room. If, perchance, the budget is small, and only a small sum has been put aside for furnishings, it is best to invest in two or three comfortable, well-made pieces only. The accessories and smaller pieces can be acquired from time to time.

It is surprising how comfortable and happy a household can be whose living-room boasts of only a rug, couch, desk, lamp and chair. For the dining-room a rug, table, four chairs and a serving-table, which can be used as a sideboard until such time one may be purchased, are ample to start with, while the bedchamber needs only a small rug, a bed, chair, two chests of drawers and a mirror. This amount of furnishing completes the actual necessities and brings us up to the problem of curtaining, which is the most important finish of a room. Keep in mind first and foremost that curtains are hung to secure privacy, to modify light and to lend color and distinction to a room; but durability and quality are very important when purchasing for a permanent home.

to start a garden last Fall, you are already rejoicing in blossoming perennials. But there is still hope of Summer bloom for you if you are just now laying out your garden, since it is not too late to put in many annuals. We have prepared several garden "patterns," any one of which we will be glad to send you for twenty-five cents. Write to the Department of Home Building, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and be sure to specify which "pattern" you want. There are the Gold Medal Garden, both practical and beautiful; the Housewife's Garden, whose features are economy and simplicity; the garden for the home where there are no children, and one for the home where there are; and two gardens for the busy and the leisurely home-maker. Each pattern contains full directions for laying out, planting and caring for the grounds

A BIT OF GARDENING ADDS JOY TO SCHOOL AND HAS GREAT EDUCATIONAL VALUE

WE WANT our children to love their schools. But is it reasonable to expect them to do so while the school buildings have the forbidding aspect of county jails? Little children instinctively love beauty—particularly the colorful charm of grass and flowers and trees, and since so many precious hours of childhood are spent in or about the schools we owe it to the children to take away from school premises the reproach of barren ugliness.

This is really a very easy thing to do if the aid of Mother Nature be enlisted, for even a little judicious planting will work wonders in a barren school yard.

For instance, suppose against the bare, windowless front of a New England district school a doorway arch should be erected and a climbing rose or a vine of wild bittersweet planted near it. Or—another suggestion—a two-foot-wide flower-bed, close to the building, made safe from little feet by a caging of boards, could be planted with all the lovely things country children are continually bringing to "teacher." Now and then, no doubt, a mother or grandmother would contribute toward the bed a root from her garden.

Many and varied are the requirements which school-yard planting may be devised to meet. The planting may grace the building and make it more attractive; it may be of educational value to the children; it may be so planned that it will be of interest while school is in session, yet uninjured by the Summer vacation's neglect; it may yield material for nature-study and drawing; it may teach ordinary gardening operations; or, finally, it may be such a stimulus that the child will be tempted to undertake similar planting at home.

FOR the country child, one of the valuable things obtained from school attendance is his familiarity with a lovely bit of roadside. As he trudges schoolward, he watches the development of flower and tree, and is the richer for the intimacy.

This lovely succession is one of the things school-yard planting can provide; so let us consider the planting of our two-foot bed alongside the school building. If the only space be on the north side, shade-loving plants should be set out; if the sunny side be available, the planting should be different. From late February, when snowdrops come, until school is out in June, the bed should always show something in bloom. No one who has ever seen little children spying out the first crocus will have forgotten their rapture.

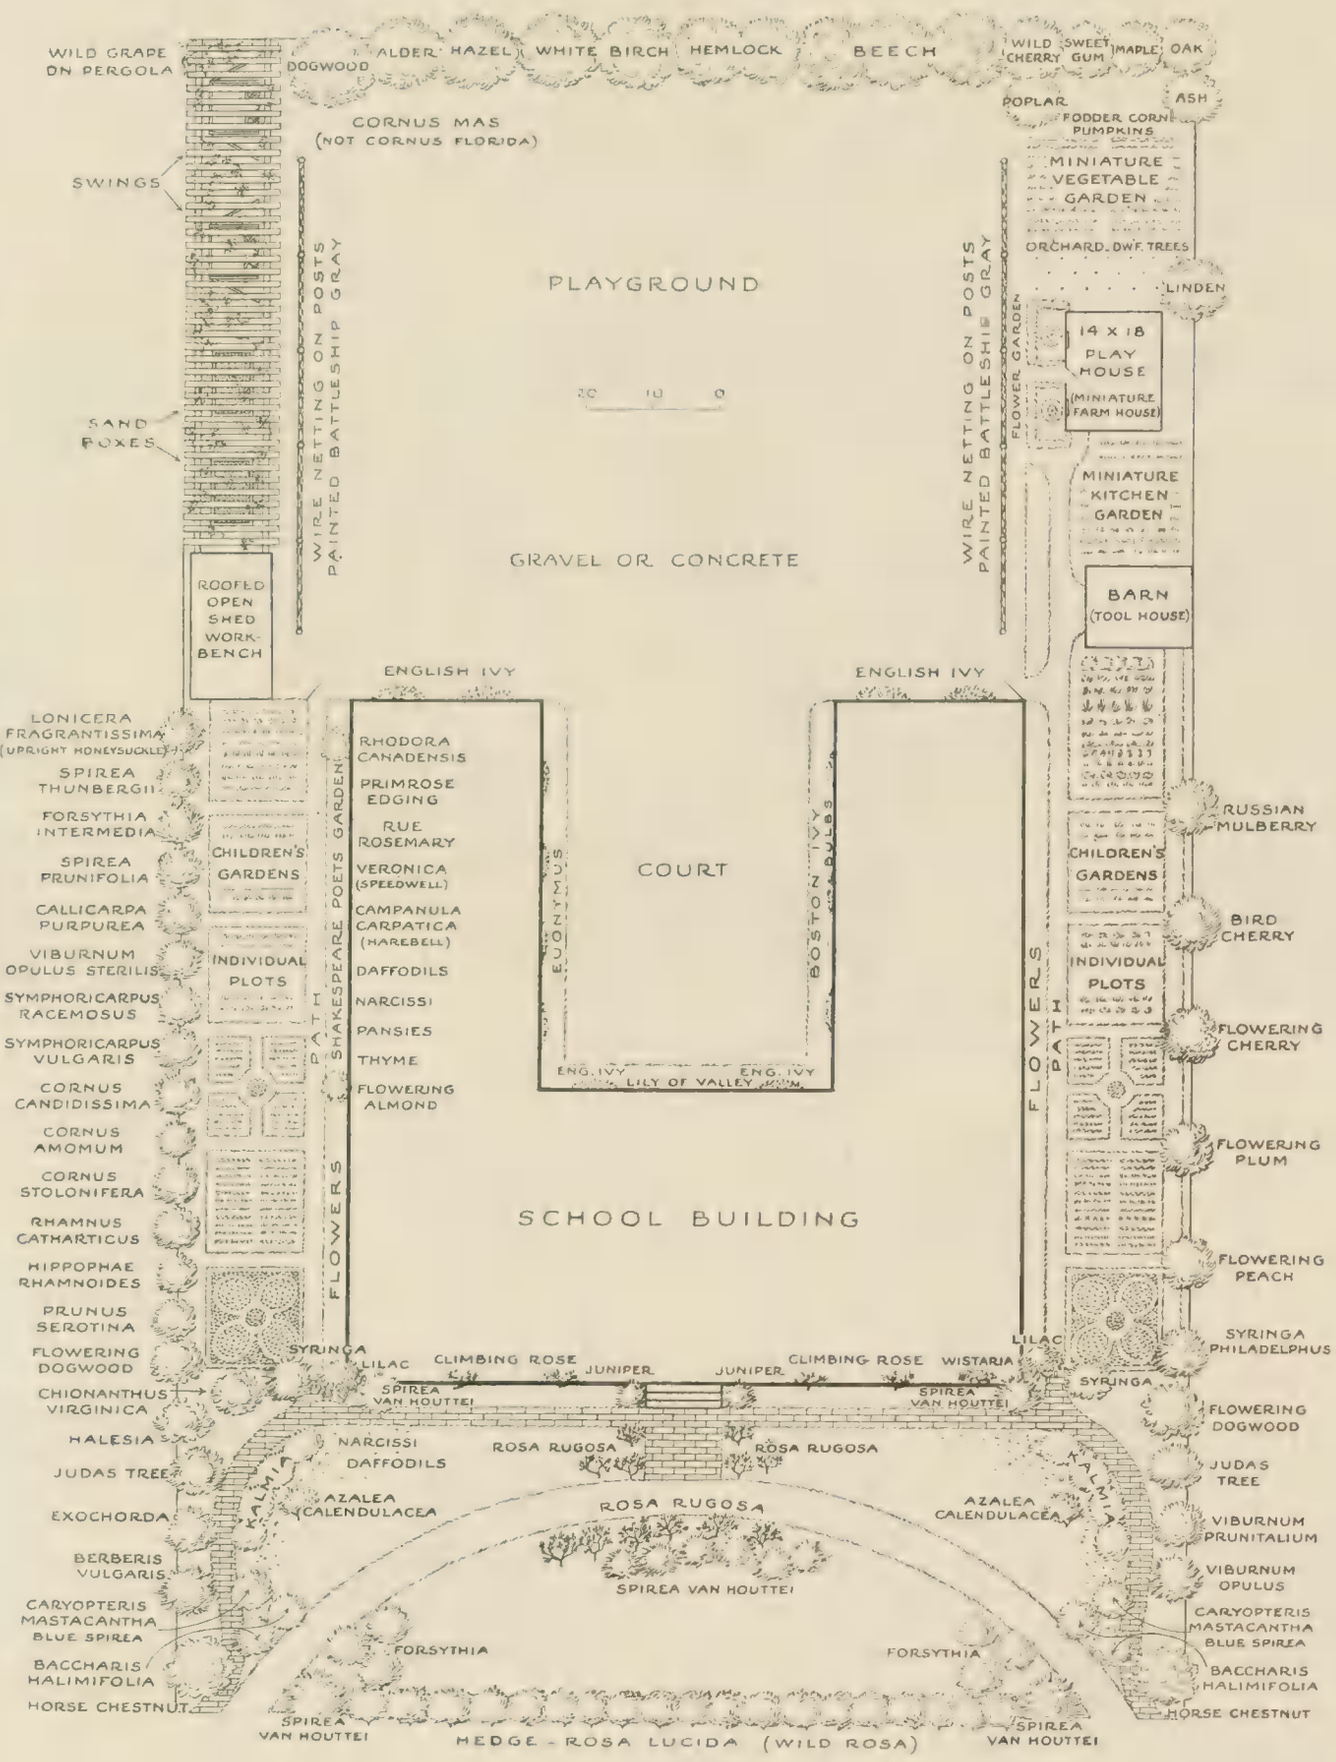
In laying out such a bed a general plan should be followed. For instance, against the wall could be the naked flowering jasmine, which blooms in March, hardy chrysanthemums, dahlias planted in May for Autumn blooming, Christmas roses and Autumn crocuses.

But let us suppose that, instead of a narrow two-foot space, the school is in the suburbs, has ample grounds and is set well back. Then what shall the planting program be?

In such a case, why not turn the entire half or quarter acre into garden? If there be ample playground space besides, the front could be laid out as a formal garden, each child having his tiny section.

I believe, instead of making this a matter of additional work for teachers, there could be a very delightful co-operation with the local gardening club, which, I am sure, would take the greatest interest in the matter. Probably the more expert gardeners would be willing to take turns at giving an afternoon a week in planting time. Many a root from home gardens would find its way to the school; and the gardening would thus prove a point of contact between townsfolk and children. How pleasant and restful it would seem to a tired teacher to be able to enjoy the garden merely as an interested spectator, not as one responsible for the work!

As for the choice of things to plant, this selection should be kept homey and simple.



IN THE case of one school building I have in mind the arrangement is as follows: Along the sidewalk is a low hedge of the wild rose (Rosa lucida); the shrubs at the corners are of forsythia, which is golden in the late April, and baccharis, which blooms in the early Autumn. The group opposing the front walk consists of Rosa rugosa, with which are mingled some bushes of spiræa Van Houttei. This group is in brilliant color in June. Beside the front walk are also Rosa rugosa plants with a spiræa as companion.

On the sides, by the half-concealed path, are shrubs to give a succession of bloom and color. Along the boundary fence are low-growing trees—flowering dog-wood, hawthorn, halesia (very lovely in June), redbud or Judas tree. The shrubs are the mountain laurel (Kalmia latifolia), which children should learn to treasure, or rhododendron maximum. If these do not succeed in your locality (and they won't if there be limestone in the soil), you can then use a group of Deutzia gracilis and Weigelia.

Against the building are trained climbing roses (Lady Gay and Dorothy Perkins) and a wisteria. In the flower-beds is a succession of hardy plants and bulbs—peony, dicentra, crown imperial, Darwin tulips and the like. In front of the shrubs at the side and bordering the half-concealed side path are poet's narcissus and many other early plants—anemones, bloodroot, hepatica, jack-in-the-pulpit, trillium. This planting is at its height of beauty in June and will thrive with but slight care.

In the school garden there should and dignified simplicity of English homes have both been captured by Donn Barber in this plan for a brick bungalow. If you like, our Home-Building Department will send you, for a dollar, a workable, detailed blue-print of it, with suggestive hints for building. Order DELINEATOR Model House Number Fourteen.

Or if this doesn't exactly meet your needs, we'll mail you, without charge, pictures and descriptions of Eighteen other houses for which we have blue prints. Just drop a line and a self-addressed, stamped envelope, please, to the Home-Building Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

THIS interesting brick house is the fourth in our series of DELINEATOR bungalows. While the floor-plans show the attic space developed into comfortable living quarters, the house may be built without the upper rooms and storage space, thus keeping it well within the bungalow class.

It is hardly necessary for us to point out the merits of this unusually well-designed house; only an architect of ability and experience could combine such balance of line with so unique a plan. There is no ornamentation or elevation in excess; and nothing is overlooked in the efficiency of arrangement or comfortable size of rooms. It is suggested that the house as it stands be built entirely of brick, the quality and color depending on individual choice or on the situation chosen for the proposed new dwelling. It will make some difference in the choice of brick whether the house be intended for the city or the country. The design naturally suggests that rough-texture face brick be employed, this being paid up with dark mortar joints to make it most effective; but common brick would be equally desirable if properly used.

As there is a prevailing feeling among architects that no building material can produce a better effect than a popular native material, this house built in certain localities would be equally pleasing in wood or stone. For example, in the vicinity of Philadelphia the use of the native stone would conform to the prevailing custom, while wood would carry on the traditions in certain sections of New England. Brick, on the other hand, may be used in any locality and be correct, producing color and effects that need no precedent.

Whether a common or a face brick be used, the lasting quality—providing it be a solidly burned clay product—is the same. To be sure, the initial cost is slightly more, but considering the saving in maintenance and insurance, a brick house is by far the cheapest in the long run. The solidity and hospitality that a brick house conveys appeal to many who would welcome the introduction of color either in wall surfaces, roof or trim. If the side walls are to be of face brick, a range of soft, blending colors are at the disposal of the home-owner. These range from the creams through the buffs and golden bronze tints to the browns, purples, maroons and gun-metal colors. The most fastidious tastes and complicated color schemes can be met by the choosing or blending of any of these shades.

After selecting your brick, keep in mind the choice of a bond. Mortar is, of course, used to cement the bricks together; but the real bond is the overlapping of one brick on another. A glance at any brick wall will make this clear. It will be seen that instead of one brick resting directly on another, they are always shifted back and forth so no vertical joints come together. In years past, the bonding of brick was only used structurally—to secure strength as a wall; now, however, many attractive patterns may be arrived at by different arrangements of the brick bond; so any one seeking texture and color in a brick would do well to investigate also the various bonds.

Those who build a brick house will find many supplementary uses for the left-overs which they would not find if the house were of wood. Fireplaces, walks, terrace walls, outdoor-porch floors, garden walls and gateways, all may be made of the same material as the house.

The lower floor-plan shows a living-room 15½ x 25 feet, with a fireplace which, to conform to this particular type of architecture, would be of brick. Trim and all other woodwork had best be of oak, mellowed and rubbed with wax or oil. As the bedchambers are in an ell, shut off from the main living-quarters, it would be optional with the home-owner whether or not he continued this hardwood trim throughout or used a pine, birch or ash, decorated.

A rough-finished plaster, tinted or painted, would suit this type of house and be ideal as a background for the heavier English furniture which would be correct in it. American walnut or fumed oak furniture would be a good starting-point from which to choose color for the living-room walls. A cream gray could be stippled with a silver gray; and if buff or burnt-orange fabrics were used for curtains, cushions, etc., these would introduce the necessary color and warmth to make the room attractive. The entrance-hall and long corridor leading to the bedchambers could also be in the same cream gray, while one bedroom in a shell pink, another in a yellow green and the third in pale yellow—tint or paint—would make interesting, restful backgrounds against which any of the glazed chintzes, the cretonnes, the India print muslins or the better ginghams would hang forth in splendor. Wrought iron or burnished steel lighting fixtures and metal bannisters and stair rails could be most effectively used throughout the entire house.

PERFUMES AND PROCESSIONS

By CELIA CAROLINE COLE

THE WOMAN WITHOUT PERFUME IS LIKE A ROSE WITHOUT FRAGRANCE

says Celia Caroline Cole. But just as the flower's bouquet is peculiarly her own, so the fastidious woman will choose the perfume which best expresses her personality. Ah, but how? If this puzzles you, write to Miss Cole and she will help you to select just that sort of floating fragrance that is you. She will also gladly answer any other questions about beauty—the care of skin, hair and figure—that you may want to ask her. Her address is THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. All she asks is that you enclose a stamped envelope for her reply

ONE of the blackest hours of our life had to do with a circus parade. And it happened when we were four. Wheedled into a nap by the promise that we should be wakened in time to see the parade, we settled down under a blue coverlet to sleep. And then our mother and our sister and our everybody forgot all about us. And the parade went by. A half hour later we woke up with that wonderful feeling of "This is the Day! Now the beautiful thing will happen!" The parade! Our mother came flying to our shout, her arms outstretched in sympathy and regret.

But life had died for us. We knew, without being told, that the parade had gone by and we'd missed it. Our father took us right out to the circus grounds to make up for it, and our mother let us make a little raspberry pie for supper. But to this day when we wake up suddenly from some dream, real or day, with the feeling (Don't you have it sometimes, unaccountably?) that life has gone by, like a parade, and we've missed it; we see a little blue coverlet that we've kicked off, we hear the click-clack of a horse's feet on the way to the circus grounds, and we feel under our fingers a flat, little, sticky raspberry pie that means nothing at all to us. The parade has gone by while we've slept.

And that's one of the things we simply can't bear to have happen to any one—let the parade pass while she sleeps.

Here is another June. Whole processions of Junes lie back of us. What have we done with them?

June herself is a procession. The trees have formed themselves into a chanting, grandiloquent procession of green; the scared little buds in the garden riot full bloom on their march; in schools and universities all over the country solemn processions of high-thoughted, trembling-kneed youngsters march up to get their diplomas—and, too, there is that most terrifying and longed-for procession of all, with its world-old accompaniments: grave Lohengrin, misty veil, scent of flowers, tearful eyes, confusion, high happiness, fear.

And each parade has its perfume—the smell of elephants and sawdust; the mustiness of old books; the incense of church and roses. No procession is complete without its perfume.

And you, too, are a procession, a more or less public parade of failures and hopes, loves and dislikes, moodiness and steadfastness, impiety and holiness. And you, too, are incomplete without your perfume.

WE FOUND a little group of men, the other day, down on a musty side street here in New York, who know all about perfumes and personality. They are studying the personality of every person they can, in order to translate that personality into perfume. Instead of beginning with a blending of fragrances and then trying to name it according to its type, they are beginning with types of people and trying to translate them into perfume.

Ah, mes-amies-of-the-more-beautiful-sex, at last we are getting closer to the spirit of things!

And here is a thing that happened. A few months ago one of the beauty salons in New York gave a "beauty-writer" luncheon just to get us all together for a happy time.

And after the luncheon a Russian princess, who was like a tall, gold iris and a sword-blade and a proud blue flame all blent into one, and who is also a part of that salon, talked with each of us a few moments and then told us what we were, expressed in perfume; and all around that long, flowered table excited little cries of amazement greeted the accurate reading of character—personality—what you will, in scents. Ourself—was read perfectly; and then that tall gold iris of a princess, who had never seen us until that day, told us which perfumes we should always use. We almost made the sign-against-witches to protect us; for she mentioned the very two perfumes which, months before, we had chosen from the products of a famous French perfumer because that blend had called from all the rest, "I'm you! I'm you!"

And that's how much truth there is in no woman being completely expressed unless she be expressed in perfume, too!

We went, for several days, from perfumer to perfumer, sniffing and spraying and becoming more certain every minute that though the day might come when we should have to wear the same hat and the same dress day in and day out, the time would never come when we would not, somehow, afford a bit of perfume.

They say magic doesn't come out of a bottle, but it pretty nearly does when it is a perfume bottle. That little floating touch of scent—no just neat 'n' clean woman can compete with that!

First of all, let us consider sachets, because they begin underneath. Little ribbon bags of it, scattered around in all your bureau drawers, and even in your dressing-table drawer on top of your brushes, will give a lovely, faint fragrance to your hair. Crêpe-paper bags of it, filled with cotton and sachet powder—the samples, if you can get them, that the manufacturer carries—slipped into your shoes on the boot-shelf or in the shoe-bag will prove a delight. And do not forget to have little bags of it in the clothes closet and tucked away among your table linen, so that the ruling spirit of the house may be felt everywhere by her fragrance.

Use toilet waters, if you like, but not in place of perfume. Perfume is diluted from the essential oil of perfume; toilet water is diluted from the perfume itself, and loses some of its lovely native quality in the process. But toilet water rubbed briskly over the body tones up the skin delightfully.

Nowadays you can get the most ravishing perfumes at a very reasonable price. We smelled all the French, and adored them, as they sat there in a chic procession high up above Fifth Avenue, bottle after bottle, green, amber, amethyst, each as lovely in line as a Grecian urn. Here, too, they talk in terms of personality, trying to fit the fragrance to the inner woman and her moods. And here they beg you not to use perfume at the last moment of your toilette, because it will come forth too obtrusive, too strong; but, from time to time, to use a few drops on your garments, and to place tiny sachets in the bureau drawers and have them sewn into your frocks and coats and hats; then at the very last of the toilette, to use a touch on the lobes of the ears, across the upper lip, and on the hands.

Perfume, to be at its rarest, should be on the flesh, warm; not on clothes.

THERE is a little book (a poet wrote it for this French maker, we are sure of that) which gives types of women, coloring, moods, habits, and for each type her perfume. One need not smell; one has only to read. This perfume, we are told, is best for Winter; that, with its spicy coolness, is for Summer; this one belongs to the day when a gale is blowing, skirts flying and violets breathing at you; this one, oh, so delicate and silken and lovely, is for elderly people; this new one, deep, inscrutable, means: "I—have lived."

We went to the American manufacturers, too. And while on these joyful rounds, we visited a thrilling theater of a room called a "laboratory of flowers," where was pictured for us the story of each perfume. First, against the clear, blue, silken sea was enacted the birth of a certain well-known perfume named after a famous French watering-place—a scent so chic and cool, it enables one to visualize the flash and sparkle of the sea, the brilliance of the throng. It is a crisp, challenging perfume; but there are dreams in it too. And next to it, on a little stage, was that essence of all power and pride—the very aristocrat of perfumes. Beyond it was one so young and joyous and exquisitely alive that one could think of it only in terms of youth, of young, silver moons, slender swaying birch trees—débutantes!

And here, too, were displayed the violet perfumes. One, especially, smelled to me like a huge bunch of violets on its way in the rain to a Yale-Harvard game. Then there were impertinent, bobbed-hair perfumes; and one so clear and happy we could almost hear it sing.

Oh never, never should a woman be without perfume singing out from her, or swaying out from every movement, or stealing out like a lovely hidden secret. For it does something to you, not just to the people about you. Wearing the right perfume, you bear loveliness with you wherever you go, and you're comfortingly aware of it!

Perhaps in the next life, when we can look back and see clearly, we'll say, "Why that's what I was—that clear, floating, spiritual perfume; and I never knew it and went clumping about with a body and clothes!"

The woman without perfume, like a rose without fragrance, lacks something in charm, in desirability; but, unlike the rose, she doesn't need to stay that way. Without a fragrance that exquisitely expresses her, every woman is sleeping while the parade goes by. Oh, whatever happens, please let us not do that!

Summer Clothes Strike a Gay Note With Sporting Prints, Blazer Stripes and Charming Colors

BY EVELYN DODGE

(See pages 27, 28 and 29)

IF YOU are one of those women who have been hypnotized by advertising slogans into believing that you express your personality by your perfume, your overstuffed furniture and the design of your wall-papers, you are going to have a very hard time this Summer explaining your clothes to the Dorcas Society. For materials this season are extremely gay, brilliant and daring.

FASHIONS AND FABRICS reflect a world that is very good to live in and styles have taken on the boyish simplicity of the sports clothes that suggest an out-door life.

The smartest type of dress for general wear this Summer either for town or country is the so-called sports frock. The Chanel version of it with the jumper blouse and kick plait or finely plaited skirt is extremely chic and has the right kind of youthful look even for women—not the detestable mutton-dressed-as-lamb effect that fashionable women avoid. It is sometimes called the jumper frock, sometimes the blouse ensemble. Three versions of it are illustrated on pages 28 and 29. The blue ensemble at the top of page 28 shows the characteristic Chanel blouse and matching skirt. The skirt may be of flannel with the blouse of the same material or of crêpe de Chine, heavy silk broadcloth or silk crêpe in the same color. The sleeveless coat at the right is of flannel to match the skirt, and you may have additional blouses of striped flannel, striped silk broadcloth or heavy crêpe de Chine to wear with it in the country. When you come in town for a day's shopping, the matching jumper and skirt are perfectly suitable for the city.

You can follow the same schedule of interchangeable blouses with the red and white jumper-blouse costume on page 28 and with the green and yellow blouse costumes on page 29. The blouse can match the skirt when the material is striped or plain—in the former case changing the direction of the stripes, having them run up and down in the skirt and crosswise in the jumper gives the play on stripes that is so smart this season. In the latter case when the material is plain, embroidery introduces another color. The embroidered jumpers and peasant blouses make nice little frocks for afternoon. When the skirt is printed (see page 28), you can have blouses that match each of the colors in the print. With a frock in jumper effect you can have a sleeveless jacket or a plain colored flannel blazer to match any of the colors in your frock and which takes care of cool days and the cooler end of the day.

For country frocks the striped flannels and striped tub silks such as crêpe de Chine, silk broadcloth and silk radium—all of these wash like cottons and keep their colors much better—are very smart. The same type of frock with long sleeves made in the plain colored crêpe de Chine, etc., is very useful, especially for business.

The new borders, prints, etc., belong more to the leisure-class needs of afternoon frocks.

SUMMER FABRICS—While plain colored crêpes and crêpes de Chine are still very good style and are given freshness by their new pastel colors, the most interesting materials of the season are what are known as "the novelties"—borders, half-and-half materials, crosswise designs, prints in geometrical figures, ferronnière, floral and dotted patterns. Stripes used crosswise or lengthwise, or crosswise and lengthwise are also new and very smart.

Half-and-half silks and wools are divided lengthwise through the center. Sometimes one half will be plain and the other half a plaid, stripe or check, or floral printed pattern. Sometimes one half, in the case of satin crêpes, will be the shining satin, the other half the dull crêpe. Sometimes the design in one half is printed in one shade of a smart color and the other half of it will be in another shade of the same color.

Crosswise designs are printed or woven in stripes or bands across the material and are made up to run across the figure.

Ferronnière patterns are copied from the really beautiful designs of iron grillwork that is used so much in Latin countries.

Stripes have well-defined 1925 characteristics—there are the rather wide Roman stripes which combine several lovely colors, sometimes on a cream, sand, blue or salmon ground. Sage green, orange, lemon, coral and soft blue are the favorite Roman colors. Blazer stripes are wide and keep to two colors, dividing the field fairly evenly between the two. Tub silks use wide stripes, wide and hairline stripes combined, or groups of narrow stripes.

The prints, ferronnière designs, floral and geometrical figures are used for silks or the cottons.

Borders, stripes and crosswise designs are to be found in all materials—silk, cotton and wool.

All these materials are illustrated in characteristic colors on pages 27, 28 and 29.

Plain materials are also used, especially in the warm-weather sports woolens, such as kasha, cheviot, homespun, flannel and jersey; also in crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, flat crêpe, etc.

Mottled or balbriggan effects are very smart in wool jersey.

THE SUMMER COLORS—Colors, on the whole, are quieter than designs. Delicate pinks entirely removed from baby pink by a strong tinge of yellow and known as flesh, chair, pastel or crayon pink are very smart for kasha, flannel and crêpe de Chine for the country. Blue in the pastel, madonna, powder, pervenche and flag-blue shades is also a great favorite, and quite a little navy blue is used with white. The Summer greens are almond, gray-green, menthe, chartreuse, a yellowish grass-green, and some jade and Irish green for flannel. Yellow is good, especially the Chinese and citron shades, and orange is often used with yellow and cocoa colors. Quite a little clear lacquer red is worn in the solid color, in designs on a white ground, and with black and white in prints. Tomato and Pompeiian reds are smart in printed designs with brown and sepia on a parchment-colored ground. The mauve and cyclamen shades are used mostly for evening, with some Parma violet and orchid for day wear.

White, the pastel shades and bright colors are used for the country and the pinkish beige, rosy beige, cocoa, grège, gray, dark blue and white, gray-green and the natural color of kasha and shantung are the colors for daytime wear in town.

MATING THE MATERIAL WITH THE MODE—It seems perfectly self-evident that certain styles call for certain materials, yet some of the worst mistakes that are made in home dressmaking lie in combining the wrong fabric with the wrong fashion. Styles cut on straight, narrow, sheath lines require materials with a good body and a firm texture. Styles that introduce soft fulness call for soft bodyless materials—if they are to fall in straight lines. In the case of the full-skirted bouffant robes de style the spreading effect of the skirt may be emphasized by the stiffness of organdy, taffeta or swiss, but in the styles illustrated on pages 27, 28 and 29 the fulness is suited to the soft silks, crêpes de Chine, cotton voiles, etc. When there are plaits, the material, even if it is as soft as crêpe de Chine, must be of a character that will hold a plait nicely.

Bordered materials, half-and-half materials, and crosswise stripes and plaids should be used for frocks and blouses with straight lower edges. Otherwise the border, stripe, etc., will run into the lower edge on an ugly angle instead of running parallel to it. (See pages 27, 28 and 29.)

You must also consider the width of your material in relation to the purpose you intend putting it to. Many of the new borders and half-and-half materials are fifty-four inches wide and the width is long enough for a one-piece dress. Others are only forty inches wide and must be used for tunic blouses or for frocks with a yoke at the top and a band at the bottom, which give you a dress length. The pink frock and the tunic blouses on page 27 are examples of the use of the narrower novelty materials.

The best patterns tell you which of the new materials are suited to the design you have picked out and what width of material you can use. Never use a material that is not suggested on the pattern, for it would have been listed if it could have been used successfully for that style. The same rule holds true of widths. Do not buy a material that does not come within an inch or two of the widths given on the pattern envelope. If thirty-five and thirty-nine inches are given, you can of course use thirty-six or forty, but not twenty-seven or fifty-four. If the narrow width was omitted, it was because it could only be used with ugly piecing that would ruin your frock. If the wider widths were not given, it was because they were unnecessarily wide for the design and would waste your material and your money.

SOULIÉ'S SKETCHES SENT FROM THE BUTTERICK PARIS SHOP SHOW THE EARLY SUMMER MODES OF WORTH, RENÉE, PAUL POIRET, JENNY AND MARTIAL ET ARMAND

Poiret turns to brilliant peasant colors for a blouse frock of two-colored kasha. The jacket-like bodice and sleeve tops are of scarlet kasha, the group-plaited skirt, sleeves, belt, etc., of old-blue wool

Poiret combines a coat and a cape, a square and a circle black satin with white wool and white crêpe in an early Summer wrap. The coat is made of black satin hemmed with white crêpe. The cape is a square of white wool above a circle of black satin

Renée designs not only her fashions but her fabrics. What appears to be a print is in reality a white muslin entirely quilted in an original pattern stitched in black and used for a Summer ensemble composed of a coat, a white organdy blouse and a black plaited skirt

The same print in two colorings—black on white in the frock and black on rose in the band and collar—is used by Martial et Armand for a Summer dress with the molded body and flared skirt of a fashion which Paris is experimenting with this season

Jenny uses a tier, flounce or tunic—call it what you like—with a dip toward the back on a frock of gray wool with rows of silver buttons set between pipings of silver leather. A bouquet of tiny flowers holds down the collarless revers

Jenny is one of the gayest of the French dressmakers in her love of color and in her use of pretty little touches that are characteristic of her work. A coat of navy-blue rep is trimmed with radio diamonds of black braid, and faced with a collar and jabot of buttercup-yellow Georgette

Worth makes a charming ensemble costume of black lacquered mousseline with a collar and hip band of red and yellow pheasant feathers tied with bows of the ciré mousseline at the neck and waistline. The coat flares in front and is worn over a tunic blouse of embroidered crêpe

The Eighteen-eighties are the Die-Hards of the history of dress. Now and then the bustle back turns up in a Paris frock looking very much more attractive than in its earlier incarnations. Renée uses it for a dark blue satin 1880 frock with a row of white buttons in front and three flared frills and a lifted drapery behind

Martial et Armand make a charming frock of lavender Georgette with indented volants which repeat the outline of the bodice sections. The buttonholes at the hem are worked in black and white wool. Paris is using extremely short skirts for its models which are modified when made for the French femme du monde

Worth introduces a young, vivacious note in an evening frock of printed chiffon which touches the high spots of the short skirt vogue at the sides. Godets give it the new flare at the front and sides and there is a train in back

THE SUMMER FROCK PUTS NEW MATERIALS TO NEW USES

THE collars, jabots and the inverted plait, which disguises the fact that narrow skirts are insisting on the new freedom, are having a tremendous vogue, but not more so than the new prints, crosswise designs, stripes, and half-and-half materials. Among the prints the polka-dot has suddenly come into its own, and stripes are running lengthwise, crosswise and in groups.

Frocks are making use of the lovely and practical tub silks—the silk broadcloths, radiums, crêpe de Chines and pongees, striped or plain and sometimes printed—as these silks wash quite as well as cottons and keep their freshness longer. Linen is smart, and of the cottons there are linen-finished cottons, cotton broadcloth, cotton crêpe, cotton shantung and cotton pongee, plain or striped, etc. For afternoon, dresses choose their materials from a list that includes flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, faille, crêpe faille, satin, crêpe satin, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma, Georgette and foulard. Sports frocks keep to wool jersey or flannel either plain, striped, bordered or in half-and-half designs.

FROCKS ARE SHORT ON LENGTH AND LONG ON LINES, AND HAVE APRONS AND FRONT CIRCULAR FLARES

6072—One takes off ten pounds, more or less, by means of the long shawl collar, the long sleeve and lengthwise stripes. This one-piece dress has a vestee and slips on over the head. It may be made of striped or printed cotton crêpe, linen-finished cottons, cotton shantung, heavy crêpe de Chine, shantung or flannel, striped silk broadcloth or striped linen with plain to match; of gingham or plaid linen with plain to match, plain cotton broadcloth, cotton crêpe, etc., with contrasting bindings and vestee.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 32-inch striped silk broadcloth. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is for ladies 36 to 52 bust.

6100—Another one-piece frock that is as becoming to large figures as it is to the average one. It has a straight lower edge and an excellent collar. Make it of stripes, or plaids if you are slender, in cotton broadcloth, cotton crêpe of good weight, linen-finished cottons, cotton shantung, heavy crêpe de Chine, shantung, radium, linen, silk broadcloth or flannel, or of these materials in plain colors trimmed with the same material in contrast. Lower edge 46 inches.

36 bust requires 3⅝ yards 32-inch striped silk broadcloth.

The dress is for ladies 36 to 48 bust.

6098—10246—The lowly apron, recognized socially and fashionably, comes to the front for an unusual dress and attaches itself to a bib which crosses over to the back. Embroidery and a hand-made flower trim it. Work in contrast. For this one-piece slip-over dress use plain crêpe de Chine or crêpe Roma with fabric flower in contrast, or, if made without sleeves, with a lace apron. Or use printed crêpe de Chine, foulard, etc. It may have a body lining marked for a camisole top. Lower edge 45 inches.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 40-inch crêpe satin.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6097—Simplest of all frocks to make is the one-piece kimono style that slips on over the head. The tab and closing are new and smart and the lower edge is straight. It is suitable for plain silk broadcloth, plain heavy crêpe de Chine, plain shantung, flannel, wool jersey, cotton broadcloth, cotton crêpe of good weight, cotton shantung, linen or linen-finished cottons, etc., with contrasting. Lower edge 46 inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 32-inch silk broadcloth.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

Dress 6097

6099—Tumbling down the front of a frock almost to the hem a jabot of Georgette or lace edging centers itself on a one-piece slip-over dress with a straight lower edge. Use printed cotton voile, cotton Georgette, or fine cotton crêpe with Georgette to match, or flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille or crêpe satin with lace edging jabot, crêpe de Chine, crêpe Roma or Georgette with the same material to harmonize or with lace edging, or use printed crêpe de Chine, radium, silk crêpe, satin Georgette, crosswise designs or novelty crêpe satin with a long sleeve and jabot of Georgette to match; wide borders in crêpe satin, silk crêpe or crêpe de Chine, etc.

Lower edge 48½ inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch printed Georgette.

The dress is attractive and good style for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6074—Fashion has found a way to eat her cake and have it too—a way to have a frock straight and narrow and full and free. This one-piece slip-over frock fits the hipline closely, but it has a circular flare across the front only. Use crêpe de Chine, Canton crêpe or crêpe faille—printed with plain to match, printed radium with plain to match or make it all of one material in flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe de Chine, crêpe faille, or crêpe satin.

Lower edge 44 inches.

36 bust requires 3 yards 40-inch printed silk.

The dress is very attractive for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses

SILK ENSEMBLES AND SHORT-SLEEVE DRESSES WITH CIRCULAR SKIRTS, ETC., FOR SUMMER

6080—For the lovely new wide borders and crosswise designs one needs a frock with a straight lower edge. The plaits at the back give a little ease to this slip-over, one-piece dress close fitting at the hip. Use bordered wide heavy silks, such as silk crêpe, crêpe satin, crêpe de Chine, with plain to match for the tie collar, etc.; bordered wide flannel with crêpe de Chine, plain heavy crêpe de Chine with embroidery; or with long sleeves of Georgette use printed heavy crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, satin, etc.

36 bust requires 1½ yard 54-inch bordered silk. Lower edge 46 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6010—A Summery ensemble dispenses with coat sleeves and its one-piece frock slips on over the head. It may be made with a body lining. One may use printed heavy crêpe de Chine, radium, satin, pongee, silk crêpe or faille with plain to match for the sleeveless coat, or with kasha. Or use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, heavy crêpe de Chine, with the same material in a darker shade or in contrast, or with kasha, lace or a printed material to match. Lower edge of dress 44½ inches.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 35-inch printed silk for dress and 2⅝ yards 35-inch heavy crêpe de Chine for coat.

The dress and coat are for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6010

Dress 6108

5981—Ever so many times during the Summer one needs this type of coat to pull on over a sports frock, etc. This one is easily made as there are no buttonholes or notches in the long collar. The raglan sleeve is smart. Flannel, camel's-hair twills, homespuns, cheviot, tweeds, teddy bear, napped sports coatings, fleece coatings, double-faced coatings etc., are used.

36 bust requires 2¾ yards 54-inch kasha.

The coat is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6045—6080—10314—The silk coat has the new tie collar which is worn open or closed. The dress beneath is the one-piece slip-over type which fits the hipline closely and is suitable for silk crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin, etc. The embroidery is decorative. Work it in beads. For the coat use wide borders, novelty crosswise designs, ribbed silks, kasha, camel's-hair twills, ribbed wools, cashmere coatings and suitings, with silk braid, novelty faille or satin, etc. The coat and dress have straight lower edges.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 54-inch novelty faille and satin (cut crosswise) for the coat 3 yards 39-inch heavy crêpe de Chine for dress. Lower edges, coat 45½ inches dress 46 inches.

The coat is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses; dress for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6078—No wardrobe is strictly 100% smart without at least one jabot dress and one dress with an apron front. This slip-over, one-piece frock has both. The dress, apron and jabot have straight lower edges. There is a separate one-piece slip with a camisole top. Use crêpe Roma or Georgette—entirely or with lace apron and jabot—crêpe de Chine, alone or with lace; foulards or printed crêpe de Chine, alone or with Georgette to match; or lace—over a flesh-colored slip of heavy crêpe de Chine. Without the slip use crêpe satin alone or with lace.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 40-inch flowered Georgette, and ⅝ yard 39-inch plain Georgette for cuffs and jabot. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6108—The woman who wants simplicity in her dress, but with a little more grace than the straight narrow dresses give, will like this frock with its two-piece circular skirt attached at the hipline. It slips on over the head and may have a body lining. Flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe Roma, crêpe de Chine, crêpe satin or Georgette make attractive dresses in this long body style. Or use printed crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, satin, Georgette, etc., with plain to match.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 39-inch satin crêpe. Lower edge 2¾ yards.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6076—10317—A quaint slip-over frock attaches its tucked full straight skirt at a slightly low waistline and closes at the left underarm. Embroidery trims it. Work in color. Use organdy with Val lace frills and contrasting organdy for collar and cuffs, which may be detachable, or use plain crêpe de Chine, Georgette, fine cotton crêpe, cotton Georgette or cotton voile with lace and organdy, etc. Lower edge 2 yards. 16 years requires 2¾ yards 44-inch organdy.

The dress is for misses, 15 to 20 years, and small women.

5989—Summer discards sleeves for a band at the armhole to match one's yoke. Make this slip-over dress with its straight lower edge of printed crêpe de Chine, printed cotton voile, pin-dot voile or pin-dot swiss, with plain to match, or of plain crêpe de Chine, pongee, cotton voile, with contrast or all of taffeta, organdy, etc.

7 years requires 1½ yard 35-inch printed silk and ⅜ yard 35-inch plain.

The dress is for little girls 4 to 10 years.

6064—A hand-made fabric flower in a contrasting color trims the shoulder of this slip-over frock with its frilled straight skirt attached at the low waistline. When made of transparent materials, such as plain Georgette, chiffon voile, cotton Georgette or organdy, it has a camisole lining and narrow drop skirt of flesh-colored satin. Without drop skirt, use taffeta. Lower edge of skirt 2⅛ yards; of drop skirt 46 inches.

17 years requires 4⅛ yards 39-inch Georgette.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20, and small women.

6101—What the well-dressed very young man will wear will very often be double-breasted. This little suit consisting of a waist and straight trousers may be made of linen, linen-finished cottons, chambray, rep, poplin, galatea, madras or pongee. The wide collar is new.

3 years requires 1½ yard 35-inch linen.

The suit is for little boys 2 to 6 years.

6044—The pretty type of dress uses tucks and ruffles for softness. The tucks cluster at each side of the front and back. It is charming in plain cotton voile or plain fine cotton crêpe with lace or organdy, or plain crêpe de Chine, batiste, cotton Georgette, or Georgette with lace, etc. This is a one-piece frock and slips on over the head. The dress is for misses 16 to 20 years, and ladies 38, 40 bust.

6085—10149—The "pocket-edition" afternoon dress puts its yoke and sleeve in one. It slips over the head and has separate bloomers and a straight lower edge. Make it of crêpe de Chine, fine cotton crêpe, cotton voile, or pongee—plain, or printed in small designs with plain to match. Fine embroidery trims yoke and skirt. Work the sprays in color or white.

4 years requires 1⅞ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is adorable for girls 2 to 6 years.

6087—Smocked in bright colors this peasant-style one-piece dress slips on over the head and has a straight lower edge. It may be made with or without shirring or smocking. Use crêpe de Chine, Georgette, pongee, cotton voile, cotton Georgette, cotton pongee, etc.

12 years requires 2⅛ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine.

The dress is for juniors and girls 8 to 15 years.

6067—6089—Spots on one's frock are quite all right if you can prove they are part of the design. This slip-over dress, with or without bloomers, has a cluster of plaits at each side in front and back. Make it of crêpe de Chine, printed in small designs, with plain to match or use chambray, cotton pongee, fine cotton crêpe, cotton voile, etc. Shantung, etc., makes the six-gore-crown hat.

8 years requires 2⅝ yards 35-inch cotton print for dress, and 20¾-inch head measure requires ⅝ yard 35-inch silk for hat.

The dress is for girls 6 to 10 years, hat for girls 2 to 12.

6034—The picturesque dress of printed cotton voile, fine cotton crêpe or dotted swiss has a tie collar of organdy. It slips over the head and closes at the left underarm. The full straight skirt is attached at a slightly low waistline. Or use printed Georgette, crêpe de Chine, etc.

17 years needs 2½ yards 40-inch novelty voile. Lower edge 2 yds.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years, also ladies 38 bust.

6068—5952—10230—Silk crêpe, satin and heavy crêpe de Chine are used for a slip-over dress with a two-piece circular skirt attached at the hipline. The embroidered sleeve is smart. Work it to match the collar. The six gored hat is made of crêpe satin, etc.

17 years requires 2¾ yards 40-inch silk crêpe for dress and 21½ head measure ½ yard 35-inch silk for hat. Lower edge 2 yards.

The dress is for misses 15 to 20 years and small women; the hat for misses, ladies and girls.

TUCKED AND PLAITED DRESSES, PAJAMA NEGLIGÉES AND THE BABY'S FIRST WARDROBE

6052—10301—Embroidery gives a vest effect to a slip-over one-piece dress. Work in cross-stitch. Use light-weight flannel, heavy crêpe de Chine, silk broadcloth, pongee, cotton pongee or cotton broadcloth—alone or with contrasting; plain, striped or printed with plain to match—striped or printed radium with plain to match, or wool jersey alone or with contrasting. It has a straight lower edge. Lower edge 46 inches.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch light-weight flannel.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

6089—Make this six-gored-crown hat of chintz, printed shantung, heavy cotton crêpe, cotton shantung with plain to match, or plain cotton poplin, etc.

6 years and 20½-inch head measure require ½ yard 32-inch linen crash, or ⅝ yard 35-inch cotton poplin for view A; ⅜ yard 27-inch printed material, with ½ yard 27-inch contrasting for view B, and ⅜ yard 27-inch material and ⅜ yard contrasting 27-inch material for view C.

The hat is for girls 2 to 12 years.

6091—A simple Summer dress has a cluster of tucks at each shoulder in front, a plaited section inserted at each side and a straight lower edge. Make this slip-over one-piece frock of printed fine cotton crêpe, etc., with collar, cuffs and frill of harmonizing organdy, or of printed cotton Georgette, crêpe de Chine or Georgette with plain to harmonize, etc.

36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch printed voile. Lower edge 1⅝ yard.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

6093—Oriental ease and beauty are caught by a pajama negligée made of crêpe de Chine, pongee, satin, silk crêpe, cotton crêpe, cotton pongee or cotton broadcloth—printed with plain to match or plain with contrasting or with printed—or use chintz, cretonne, etc. with plain to match.

36 bust requires 4⅜ yards 40-inch printed silk.

The negligée is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

Two soups everybody should eat often!

Nature herself invites you to this feast, laden with healthful nutriment. Peas sweetened by the sun to their most delicious and tempting flavor. Celery blanched to snowy whiteness—the crisp, glistening glory of the gardens.

And the appetite simply cannot resist them, in these nourishing and wholesome Campbell's Soups! Enriched with fresh country butter. Seasoned "just so".

Eat such vegetable foods abundantly. Everybody is better for them. Children especially—and doubly blessed is the home of healthy children.

Prepared with milk or cream instead of water, these two soups are even more nourishing, even more delightful to the taste. Treats you should give your family—often!

LIFE and LETTERS of IVORY SOAP

Being the authorized biography of AMERICA'S best known product

IN 1890, when Ivory Soap was just eleven years old, a soirée was held in a fashionable Fifth Avenue mansion, in New York, at which the chief form of entertainment was bubble-blowing. The ladies and gentlemen who participated in this stimulating sport (prizes being given for the largest bubbles) became entranced with its fascinating possibilities, and the "soap-bubble party" became the vogue of the Social Season.

Ivory was, of course, the chosen soap, because a burst Ivory bubble did not spoil the ladies' clothes, and the pure Ivory suds protected their dainty finger-tips from harm.

That was 35 years ago, long before Ivory Flakes and Guest Ivory, now such important members of the Ivory Family, had even been thought of. Just the other day, while a Procter & Gamble representative was waiting, a chauffeur from one of those very same Fifth Avenue mansions hurried into a fashionable grocery store on Madison Avenue with a message from his employer.

"You left out a carton of Guest Ivory when you delivered our order this morning, and my mistress wants it right away," he said.

Later the representative asked the grocer whether Ivory was as popular with his wealthy customers today as it had been in the past. "Yes, more so," he said. "They often buy it by the case of 100 cakes. There is scarcely a wealthy home on our list that doesn't get Ivory regularly."

FIVE GENERATIONS and an IVORY Poem

AT just about the same time the chauffeur was delivering his message in New York, the makers of Ivory received the following letter from a woman in Colorado:

"Five generations of my family have been raised with Ivory Soap. My own first recollection of soap was of Ivory, and the first poem I remember reciting was an Ivory Soap poem published in the Youth's Companion forty years ago.

"I have been married twenty years, and as a mother I can vouch for Ivory's excellence. All good housewives appreciate such products, but seldom take the time to say so. So here is my compliment to you, unsolicited and from the heart."

And not long afterwards came this note from a matron of Texas:

"I don't just like Ivory—I love it!

"I've been keeping house for sixteen years, and during all that time

Guest IVORY

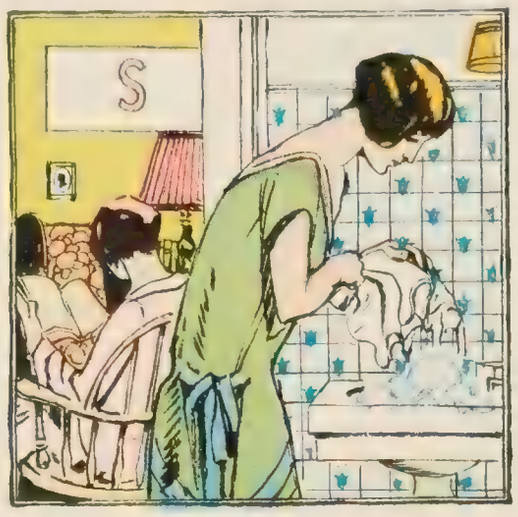
THE dainty new cake of Guest Ivory, made especially for the face and hands, just fits feminine fingers and the toilet soap holder. It costs 5 cents.

FOR the bath, most people prefer the medium-size cake of Ivory. "It floats," of course, so you never have to hunt for your soap at the bottom of the tub.

Bath IVORY

I've used Ivory for everything soap can be used for. I bathed my baby fourteen years ago with Ivory, and kept her dear little head sweet and clean with it. She and I use it exclusively for our baths today. We both use it to shampoo our hair. We use it on our faces, too, always coming back to it every time after trying other soaps. All these years I've been using it, not having it used, and my hands are the source of constant envy to my friends. I am so happy that we now have Guest Ivory."

The experience of trying other soaps—because they cost more, or are colored or perfumed, or make wonderful promises—and then finally coming back to Ivory, seems to be a national habit, and everyone knows Ivory purity.



"I guess I'll try Ivory"

When the present biographer of Ivory was preparing this history, he became convinced that the users of Ivory must be the most ingenious people in the world. They have found uses for Ivory which even its own makers had never thought of.

As the result of an inquiry made a few years ago, more than 50,000 recipes for the use of Ivory were received—recipes for making insecticides, cleaning rubber plants, making furniture polish and leather dressing, taking out iodine stains, making foot powder, curing bee and mosquito-stings. Apparently when Ivory users don't know exactly what to do about some problem they say, "Well, I guess I'll try Ivory," and lo! another recipe! (The best of the Ivory recipes have been collected in a booklet called "Unusual Uses of Ivory Soap"— we shall be glad to send you a copy.)

Ivory has traveled all over the globe, carrying its message of cleanliness and good cheer.

A letter from Foochow, China, tells of a Christmas celebration in the missionary hospital at which gifts from home were distributed, and in every package there was a cake of Ivory—for the patients, the doctors, the nurses, the teachers, the helpers in the leper colony, the laundresses, gardeners and the scrubwomen.

Ivory works hard at College

Of the stupendous number of Ivory cakes made in the last 46 years, some have helped a good many thousands of students through college (the present scribe is one, and knows). But apparently it is in the girls' colleges that Ivory does its most diversified job. From Boston came this letter recently:

"Perhaps it has never occurred to you that the college girl of today cannot get along without Ivory Soap. Here are a few of the things she uses it for in one week:

Shampoo
Laundry (mostly blouses and lingerie)
Daily bath
Dishwashing after bridge or tea.

"Did you know that most girls carry a cake of Guest Ivory in their week-end bags, and always pack one in their trunks for emergencies?"

How Johnny Pine became Johnny Soap

Ivory has always been a great adventurer, and has been the center of many a romantic and exciting incident.

Mr. Harry Sinclair Drago, the author of a number of novels and many short stories, tells a true Ivory yarn that deserves a place in any Ivory biography.

Mr. Drago and his wife were on a camping trip in Nevada, far from any settlement. They had one cake of Ivory which they prized most highly because if it should be lost they would have to go bathless.

Well, it was lost. It slipped out of the pack into the river, and, because of the current, could not be recovered. You may be sure they were troubled. Next day they started downstream, and suddenly came upon a camp of Piute Indians. What specially drew their attention was a group of squaws clustered around an ancient brave known as Johnny Pine, who was immersed to the elbows in an old bucket "so brimful of soapsuds that it looked like a giant ice-cream soda."

The cause of the suds was, of course, the precious cake of Ivory, which Johnny had found floating in the water. But, because it was white, and floated, Johnny was convinced that it wasn't soap, and when Mr. Drago offered to buy it, Johnny refused to sell. Finally, however, after considerable dickering, Johnny parted with the Ivory in exchange for a silver dollar. But he was not through.

"You buy him if me catch him more?" he said with the gleam of a fortune-seeker in his eye.

"Sure, we buy," replied Mrs. Drago.

They heard afterwards that Johnny fished the river for weeks in search of another cake of Ivory to sell for a dollar. And the Indians named him Johnny Soap as the result.

*The "Ivory Idea" travels* 2,000 miles

A year or so ago, a Massachusetts woman moved to Montana. Recently she saw an Ivory advertisement in one of her favorite magazines, and wrote this letter about it:

"That advertisement brought to my mind a picture of my mother's linen closet back in Massachusetts. She has always used Ivory, both for toilet and household purposes, in bringing up her family of ten. But that had slipped my mind until your advertisement gave my memory a jog and made me resolve to get some Ivory right away.

"I'd been in the habit of buying two soaps for our household—one for toilet and one for general use—thinking that was a necessary economy. Briefly, that advertisement said to me, 'Why, you know your mother is the most efficient and economical housekeeper, and she has always had cakes of Ivory stacked in her linen closet for all purposes, so it must have been good, and economical, too.'

"Then there was the paragraph that recalled to my mind that Ivory is convenient because it does float.

"To make a long story short, I got in a good supply of Ivory and I certainly do think it was a good buy. It makes so much more lather than the washing soap I've been using that it makes my laundry work at least twice as easy, and my babies do have such fun chasing the cake around in their baths! I intend to stick to Ivory from now on, and I expect to do a kind act by passing the Ivory idea along to my neighbors."

Some time ago an inquiry was made among 11,000 families chosen at random throughout America, to discover what soaps they used. It was found that 175 kinds were used for washing faces and hands; 162 kinds for bathing—one family even used a scouring powder for this; 96 kinds for bathing the baby, and 132 kinds for washing dishes. But for every one of these purposes, far more families used Ivory than any other soap.

We wish there were space enough to quote from letters written by mothers of Ivory Soap babies (and prize babies, too); by women who do all their own housework, including the laundry, and give Ivory the credit for keeping their hands soft and white; by managers of hotels who say that their guests actually come and congratulate them upon placing Ivory in the bathroom; from doctors and hospitals; from men who insist that Ivory is the grandest shaving soap in the world; from both men and women who have discovered (either by themselves or at the suggestion of their dentist) that Ivory makes a fine tooth-cleanser; from travelers who can't find any other soap that works so well in so many kinds of water—but all these must be saved for another time. [to be continued]

Laundry Ivory

The big economical Laundry Ivory cake is for general laundry and household use—it costs very little more than the harsh laundry soaps and protects both hands and clothes.

These beautiful, tissue-thin flakes of genuine Ivory are particularly for the safe, quick, cleansing of all delicate fabrics. But lots of women also use Ivory Flakes for dishwashing (to protect their hands), and for shampooing.

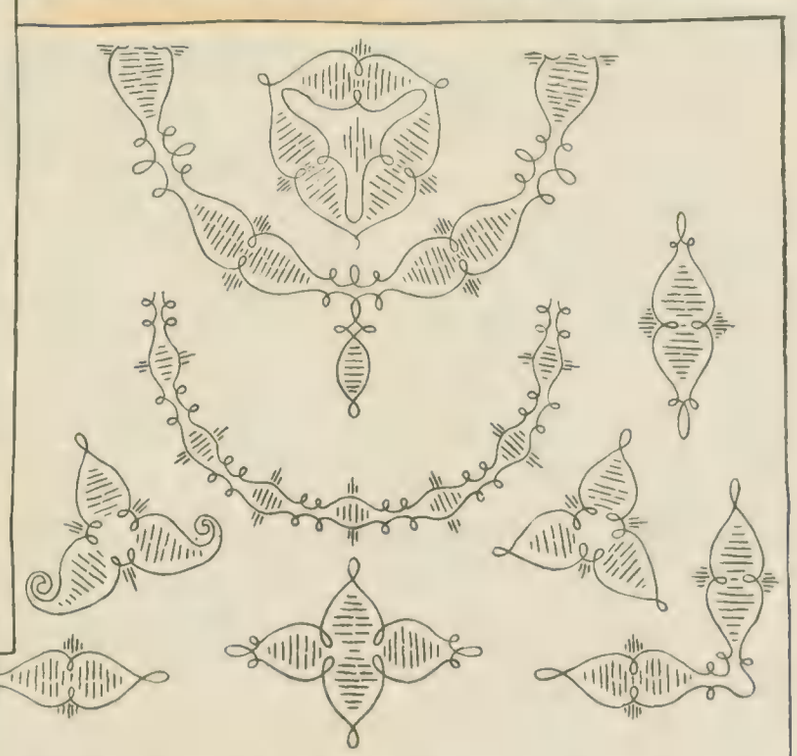
Through the centuries it has been proven that the double walled house is the only warm house—that an air space is necessary between the outer wall and the inner wall to retain the warmth in the house and keep the cold out. All good houses are insulated with an air space between the outer and inner walls. This is also the Esmond process of Blanket manufacture.

Send 10c for Esmond Doll Blanket. It will please your children and show what Esmond Quality is. The story of Bunny Esmond for children, free on request.

Esmond Blankets are woven two-in-one—two walls with an air space between.

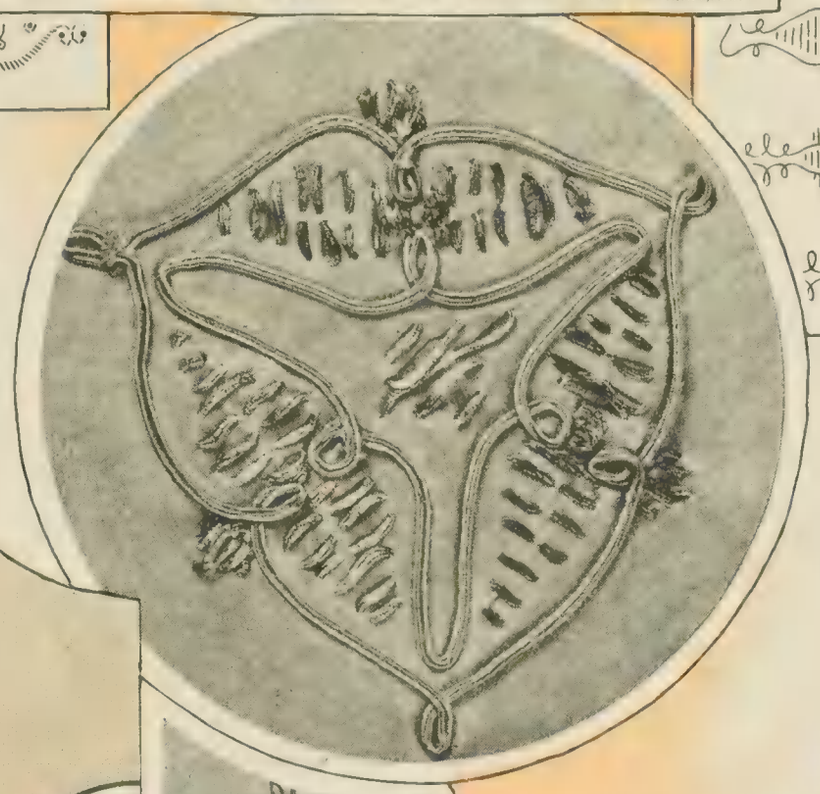
Esmond Blankets are single blankets with the warmth of a pair. In the Esmond process, only one side of the yarn is fuzzed which makes the Esmond stronger, besides warmer, than a blanket made in the ordinary way with only one strand fuzzed on both sides. All Esmond Blankets have the air space between—it is the Esmond process.

ONE AND ONE IN ONE-STITCH MAKE DESIGNS THAT ARE QUICKLY DONE COMBINED WITH BRAID OR WITH OTHER EMBROIDERY STITCHES



Embroidery design 10347

10347—Heavy-headed June roses are set in circles of feathery one-stitch on Summer frocks and blouses. Finished, the design has every appearance of a very elaborate piece of embroidery, but in reality the roses, which take the longer to work, are few and placed rather far apart and the quickly embroidered one-stitch circles fill in the yawning spaces. Work the roses in the flat unpadded satin-stitch or outline. It can be used also for scarfs, hats and children's clothes, and can be adapted to 3½ yards each of banding 2 and 3¼ inches wide and to twenty motifs in eight assorted sizes.



Embroidery design 10345

10348—The hour-glass figure beloved of ladies of a generation ago finds a place for itself on the dresses of to-day. This design is quite striking on honey-colored crêpe de Chine with the hour-glass outline in a self-colored braid and the straight stitches in gold thread. It may be worked in a combination of braiding, outline or chain stitch and one-stitch embroidery and makes a lovely trimming for dresses or blouses, coats, hats, etc. The design can be adapted to 3½ yards each of banding 2¼ and 1½ inches wide, four neck outlines, four corners and twenty-two assorted motifs.

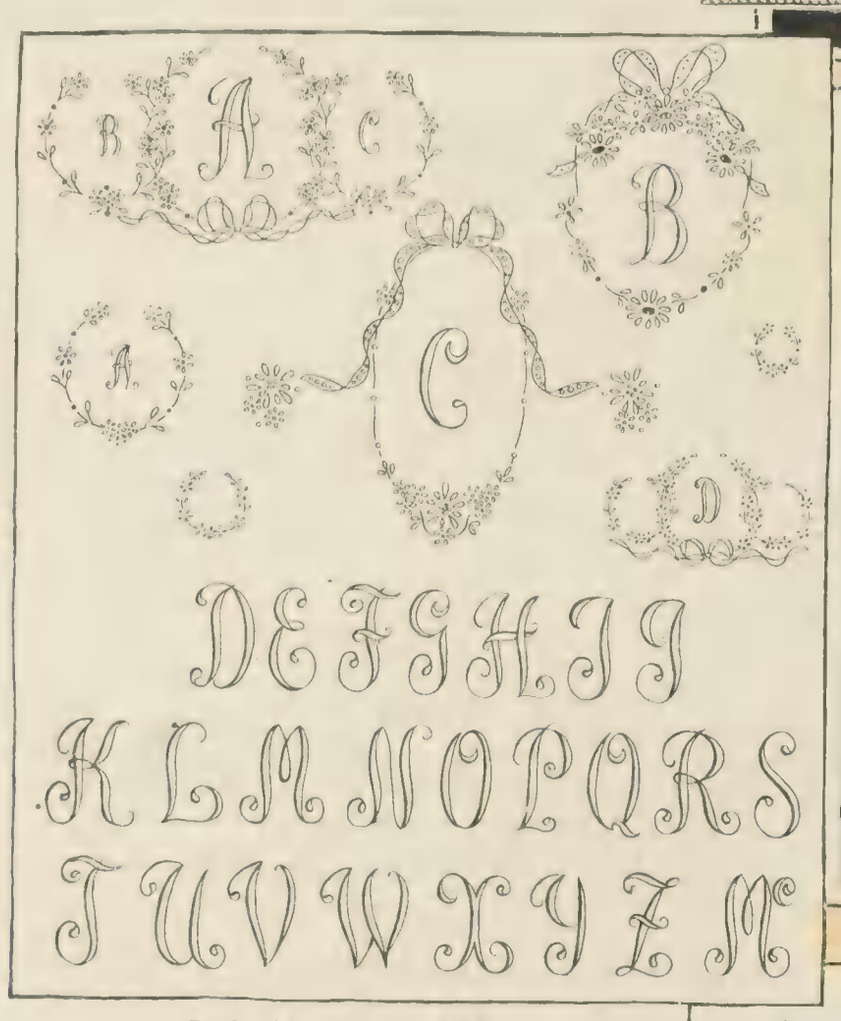
10349—Gather your roses while you may into an embroidered basket for a beautiful new bedspread. The flowers are quite large and as the stitches are rather long and the design open, the bedspread is soon finished. Pinks from the palest shell pink to the deepest coral, pastel blues and lavenders make lovely flowers on a pale-blue sateen background. The stitches used are lazy-daisy, outline and one-stitch and the design consists of a basket, a pointed motif and two corners and may be used for a double, three-quarter or single bed.

IN NEW AND STRIKING DESIGNS JUNE BRINGS A RIOT OF COLOR TO THE EMBROIDERY WORLD



10351—A breakfast-set with a bird design makes a cheerful bit of color for a breakfast-nook or for Summer camps. These doilies are worked in a combination of satin-stitch, outline stitch, cross-stitch and French-knot embroidery. This is a generous design, for it covers a seven-piece luncheon or breakfast-set and a three-piece buffet-set. It can be adapted to two doilies 11½ by 11½ inches, six doilies 9 by 11 inches and two doilies 10 by 10 inches.

Embroidery design 10351

10350—Here is a design of unusual markings for one's odd towels, pillow-cases, sheets, etc. The framed monograms are of exquisite fineness and beauty, and they may also be used to advantage for marking lingerie. The stitches used are satin-stitch for the initials, satin-stitch or eyelets for the flowers, and French stemming and French knots. This design can be used on dresses, etc., as well as on household linens and underwear. It can be adapted to two motifs each of sizes 7½ by 9½, 5 by 6½, 4½ by 9 and 2½ by 4¾ inches, eight assorted motifs and two alphabets each 2½ and 1 inch high.

10352—The ships, flower-baskets, fruits, etc., of this design can be used for stenciling or painting, or for needlework stamping for banding and motifs to be worked in a combination of outline and satin-stitch embroidery. This is a very useful design that can be employed for a great many purposes. It may be embroidered in outline stitch or painted or stenciled on material or oilcloth. It may be used for household linens, dresses, hats, scarfs, etc. The design can be adapted to 1¾ yard of banding 5¼ inches wide, two motifs 5 by 17¼ inches, two motifs 2¾ by 10¾ inches, thirty-six assorted motifs and twelve corners 2¾ by 7¼ inches.

Embroidery design 10346

10346—The radical red is a color beloved for cross-stitch and here is a design that is very effective in red, black and yellow on white voile and natural pongee. It is worked in a combination of cross-stitch and one-stitch. The one-stitch embroidery is used in the flower petals and the stitches are placed rather more closely than is usual on one-stitch embroidery. So the design has a little of the appearance of being worked in a loose unpadded satin-stitch. It is for use on the new peasant blouses that are so popular with the suspender skirt, on dresses, hats, scarfs, etc. The design can be adapted to 3½ yards each of banding 2 and 3 inches wide, and eighteen motifs in five assorted sizes.

Adventures in Health

These letters are typical of thousands which tell of the amazing power of one simple fresh food

"I WAS PASSING through that transitory stage known to all young fellows with its attendant eruptions on the face and neck known as pimples and boils. My face was ghastly and my Mother counted twenty-seven boils on my neck at one time. Of a retiring disposition, this made me more so and I became so sensitive that I often crossed to the other side of the street to avoid meeting the female of the species.

"There was nothing I refused to try. An old-fashioned friend suggested Yeast. With the devotion of a martyr I religiously ate my two yeast cakes a day. In four months every boil had disappeared, my face was clearing, and, most important, I regained my lost confidence."

HAROLD V. DEMOND, New York City

NOT a "cure-all," not a medicine in any sense—Fleischmann's Yeast is simply a remarkable fresh food.

The millions of tiny active yeast plants in every cake invigorate the whole system. They aid digestion—clear the skin—banish the poisons of constipation. Where cathartics give only temporary relief, yeast strengthens the intestinal muscles and makes them healthy and active. And day by day it releases new stores of energy.

"I AM A HOSTESS at a hotel and not a day passes that someone doesn't ask me how I manage to be up late at night and out in the sun every day and still keep my skin so clear and fair and my eyes so bright. My answer is Fleischmann's Yeast. When I first heard of the curative properties of Yeast I 'tried' it—with no very startling results. Two years more of intestinal indigestion brought me to the point where I determined I'd stick at it. Three cakes of yeast dissolved in water became a daily rite. It was three months before I had the results I wanted—relief from indigestion, gas and chronic constipation. To this day I take one cake as regularly as I rise in the morning."

MRS. GERTRUDE W. HOOD, Mount Lowe, Calif.

Eat two or three cakes a day before meals; on crackers—in fruit juices or milk—or just plain. For constipation especially, dissolve one cake in hot water (not scalding) night and morning. Buy several cakes at a time—they will keep fresh in a cool dry place for two or three days. All grocers have Fleischmann's Yeast. Start eating it today!

And let us send you a free copy of our latest booklet on Yeast for Health. Health Research Dept. C-17, The Fleischmann Company, 701 Washington Street, New York.

"MY WORK TAKES me to construction camps where we get 'grub' instead of food. I suffered incessantly from diarrhoea; I could neither digest nor assimilate my 'grub' and became so weak I could hardly get about. I had taken green pills, blue pills, yellow pills, red pills. I tried Fleischmann's Yeast. That was five months ago. I am now a devotee of Fleischmann's Yeast—I have thrown away my rainbow of pills and now enjoy camp 'grub' with the appetite of any husky on the job."

BERT T. MASON, Burney, Calif.

THERE are many delicious ways of eating yeast—dissolved in water, fruit juices or milk, spread on crackers, or eaten plain.

"IN MARCH, 1923, I had what I supposed was a nervous breakdown. I was restless, irritable, tired and depressed; my sleep was broken. I had headaches and dizzy spells.

"I thought it quite safe to experiment with a food-medicine, so I began to use Fleischmann's Yeast. Gradually my ills disappeared—I became regular, and discontinued the use of cathartics. My energy returned—and in four or five months I was my former self. Not only have I regained my health, but my color and my general appearance have been improved since I have been using Fleischmann's Yeast. And I still use Fleischmann's Yeast."

MRS. MARGARET ADE SWEENEY, Roxbury, Mass.

"SINCE CHILDHOOD I suffered from chronic constipation. I lived by the 'physic bottle' as religiously as Robert Louis Stevenson ever did. I was nervous and irritable; my appetite was poor, and the food I did eat was not properly digested.

"Three years ago I began the use of Fleischmann's Yeast—a cake before each meal. Results were not instantaneous, but I held tenaciously to the hope that it might help me. It did. At the end of six weeks I felt much better; the daily laxative had become a thing of the past; I had a ravenous appetite. I continued. Fleischmann's Yeast has put me in a state of excellent health."

GLEN C. ANDERSON, Minneapolis, Minn.

Prevent this

(Perhaps bad teeth were the cause—)

Do you think it absurd to say that contagious diseases can result from bad teeth? There is plenty of scientific support for the statement that bad teeth may lead to even more serious afflictions.

Use Colgate's—

It removes causes of tooth decay

You can't be too careful of your teeth, for when tooth troubles start, serious results may follow. Health, good looks and happiness can be ruined by decaying teeth. Give yourself and your family a chance to escape disease by the most effective and inexpensive method in the world—prevention.

Take Colgate's with you wherever you go.

Science proves that many dread diseases are traceable to tooth decay. Because of this, preventive dentistry is sweeping the country. Dentists are trying to prevent tooth trouble and thus prevent much sickness. Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream is allied with this modern move for better teeth and better health.

"Washes," Polishes and Protects

Colgate's is a preventive dentifrice—safe, effective, and pleasant to use because of its delightful flavor. It removes causes of tooth decay by the gentle "washing" action of its non-gritty chalk and tasteless soap. These are the two ingredients that authorities say are most important in a dentifrice.

Right for Your Teeth

Colgate's conforms to the modern scientific idea of what a good dental cream should be. It is made right and priced right—and it is on sale today at your favorite store—25c for a large tube.

EQUIPPING THE BRIDE'S KITCHEN

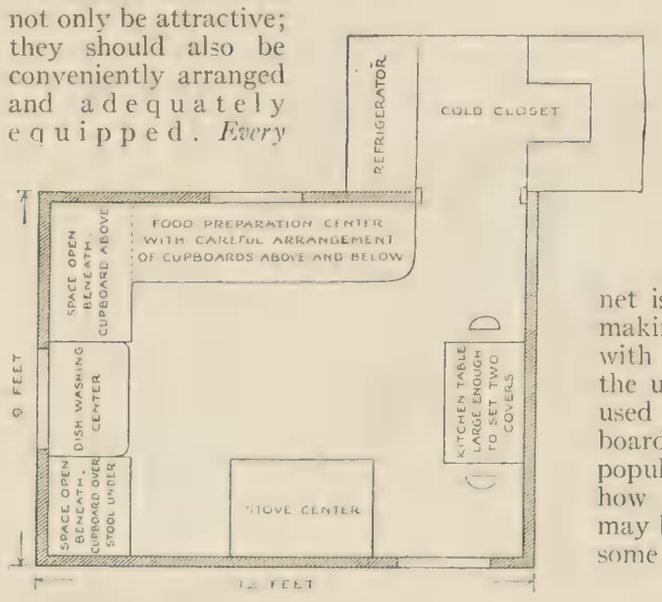
By Anne Madison

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

AFTER YOU HAVE PLANNED

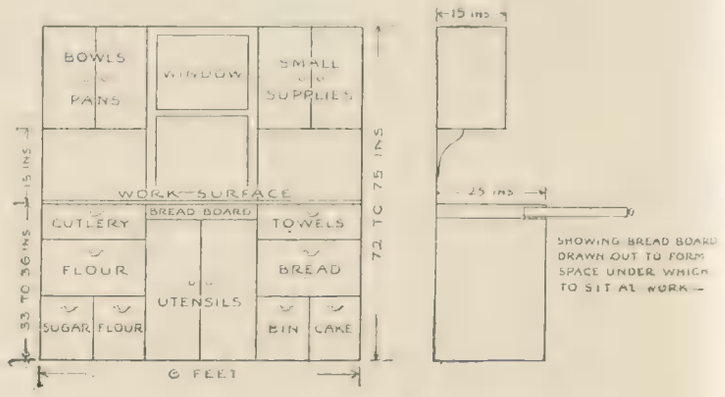
your arrangement as this article tells you to plan it, let us help you select the right equipment to make your kitchen the convenient little workshop you want.

Consult our list of "Kitchen Necessities," which we have ready to send to you, and avoid the nuisance of an overequipped or underequipped kitchen. Also, if you would whisk your meals onto the table as soon as HE steps into the house, you will need just the right utensils for cooking and serving. Write for "Pots and Pans," a little discussion of what to buy and how to use it.



Both leaflets are yours for the asking. Just send a two-cent stamp, for postage, with your request to the Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

Convenient cabinets and cupboards make the tiny kitchen roomy enough for efficient work



THE old idea that any location and arrangement were good enough for the kitchen has yielded to the modern point of view that nothing is too good. The bride of to-day looks forward to a kitchen which is light and well ventilated, and she plans to have it well equipped in every way. If the house she moves into is an old one and the kitchen is dark and inconveniently arranged, her first job is to transform it into a livable and lovable room, one in which work may be done happily and without unnecessary effort. I know one such kitchen which began as a dark little hole of a place but ended up gloriously. The walls, woodwork and furniture were painted a lovely cream and the old floor a light orange. Artificial lights were skilfully placed to brighten corners which on dull days were still dim and to give good light after dark. The result was that the room always gave the impression of being touched with sunshine. It was a cheerful, delightful little workshop, at once lovely and convenient, where housekeeping was a pleasure.

Kitchens should not only be attractive; they should also be conveniently arranged and adequately equipped. Every kitchen has three centers of activity, each contributing to a separate interest and yet all closely related. The first center and the one which is most often used is the center where food is prepared for cooking or serving. Cakes, bread, muffins or pies are mixed here. Salads are made ready, meats are put in shape for cooking. When we begin to analyze this center, we find that the following things should be included. First, working space, a generous flat table surface, high enough from the floor to permit the woman to stand comfortably without bending while she is working. A height of between thirty-three and thirty-six inches from the floor will accomplish this, the lesser height for short women and the greater height for tall women. A part of this work space should be free underneath so as to enable the woman to sit as well as stand at her work. If this work-table is built in a cabinet form, the place for sitting at work may be accomplished by having a large bread-board made to slide into the cabinet which may be pulled out to form a table. A working space six feet long, twenty-five inches deep and from thirty-three to thirty-six inches high is not too abundant provision to make for unhampered work, although good work can be done with less space.

Second, storage space. The ideal arrangement would be to have within arm's length all the utensils, tools and materials to be used in preparing food. This is of course impossible, because vegetables and fruits can not be stored long in a warm kitchen. Milk, eggs, butter, meat must be stored in a cold place. Nevertheless everything to be used in this center should be as accessible as possible, and in the organization of the center the location of the refrigerator, pantry and dumb-waiter, if there be one, must be taken into account. The modern kitchen cabinet is an expression of the attempt we are making to surround the preparation-table with cupboards which contain as many of the utensils and as much of the food to be used day by day as possible. Built-in cupboards and cabinets are also becoming justly popular. The accompanying sketch shows how effective a small space in the kitchen may be made if every foot of it is devoted to some useful purpose.

"YOUTHFULNESS is the real pot of gold at the end of every woman's rainbow! Pond's Two Creams are a wonderful help to this coveted end."

Gloria Vanderbilt

MY FIRST GLIMPSE of Mrs. Reginald Vanderbilt brought a little catch to my throat. I had heard she was very lovely — this young woman, barely twenty-one, two years married to the son of one of America's oldest, wealthiest, most distinguished families, and mother of an exquisite baby girl. But I was unprepared for beauty so compelling, so unique.

"It's partly because she's so tall," I said to my companion, "and so slender. Did you ever see such grace?"

Mrs. Vanderbilt is "brune" but with a difference. Her hair seems black until the sunlight breaks its shadows into shimmering bronze. In the depths of her dark eyes burn the fires of golden topazes. And in the snows of her delicate skin blooms the rose of her full-blown lips, ruby-red and strangely beautiful.

In spite of her extreme youth Mrs. Vanderbilt carries an air. She might have been born to the purple. For she has the poise and the cachet of the woman who has lived her girlhood in the most distinguished society of Europe.

ALL these impressions flashed upon me. As Mrs. Vanderbilt moved toward me with a singing grace, I recalled what I had heard men say, "She dances—oh, divinely!"

"What a bouquet she lends that gown," I murmured. "The Parisian couturier who designed it must have thrilled to see its black velvet next arms and shoulders of such dazzling whiteness."

"But the contrast is in the color alone," said someone in our group. "When it comes to texture, there's little to choose between chiffon velvet and Mrs. Vanderbilt's skin."

Mrs. Vanderbilt spoke in a voice whose low modulations and finished diction come from fluency in three languages besides her own.

"It ought to be a good skin," she was saying. "I take good care of it."

"Of course," my friend rejoined. "No doubt you devote hours of every day to keeping it exquisite."

"On the contrary," cried Mrs. Vanderbilt, "only a few minutes—far less time than many of my friends. It's not the time that counts. It's the method!"

"Do tell us what your method is," we queried.

MRS. REGINALD C. VANDERBILT

in a black velvet gown by Vionnet. As Miss Gloria Morgan she spent her girlhood abroad. Since her marriage she has become a distinguished leader in the exclusive society of New York and Newport

"Two Creams," said Mrs. Vanderbilt. "One to cleanse the skin and keep it fresh and firm. The other to protect and give it that 'velvety' finish you've just spoken of. I've used Pond's Two Creams for a long time and have never found any better."

IT is this approval, given by the women of Society who must keep their youth and beauty —for Mrs. Vanderbilt is only one of many—that is the final proof of the sterling worth of Pond's Two Creams.

The first step in following the Pond's method of skin care is a deep, thorough cleansing with Pond's Cold Cream. Smooth it lavishly over your face, neck, arms and hands. Let it stay on a few moments so that its pure oils may sink deep down into the pores and soften the dust, soot, hardened excess oil, powder and rouge that choke them.

Wipe all the cream off and note the dirt it brings with it. Repeat the process. And now, to close the pores, dash your skin with cold water, or rub it lightly with a bit of ice.

This daily Pond's cleansing should follow any prolonged time spent out of doors. If your skin is inclined to be either very dry or too oily, you should use Pond's Cold Cream twice or more. And to overcome the dryness that forms lines and wrinkles, leave some of the cream on all night.

The second step in the Pond's Method of caring for the skin is a soft finish and protection with Pond's Vanishing Cream. Fluff just a light film over the skin of your face and hands. It will vanish—for Pond's Vanishing Cream is greaseless.

NOTICE now, how even the surface of your skin looks. The Vanishing Cream has leveled off all roughnesses. It gives you a lustre, too, a soft bright, clear tone.

And how much more smoothly your rouge and powder blend and how well they stay over this delicate foundation of Vanishing Cream. You need have no more fear of nose-shine, now.

You should always use Pond's Vanishing Cream before you powder, and with particular care before you go out. For it protects your skin so that wind, dust, sun and soot cannot rob it of its natural oils, its bloom of youth.

Follow the lead of Mrs. Reginald Vanderbilt. Buy your own Pond's Creams. Find out for yourself that what she says is wholly true—"They constitute as simple, as effectual a method of caring for the skin as has yet been discovered." You may have the Cold Cream in extra large jars now. And both creams in the smaller jars you are familiar with. The Pond's Extract Company.

The Eureka tilted to illustrate the detachable sweep-action brush.

Illustrating Eureka's high vacuum principle of cleaning.

Don't Confuse

the High Vacuum Eureka with Ordinary Electric Carpet Sweepers . . .

Only the "high vacuum" principle of cleaning, as built into the Grand Prize Eureka—involving the movement of a tremendous volume of air at a very high speed through a very narrow nozzle—enables an electric cleaner to maintain its original cleaning efficiency without frequent adjustment and replacement of its vital parts.

In ordinary electric "carpet sweepers" where cleaning effectiveness depends on a revolving brush propelled at a high speed by a rubber belt connected to a high speed motor, it is apparent that the original cleaning efficiency suffers an immediate decrease as these vital parts (belts and brushes) fail to function as when new.

Nothing less than the evident superiority could have won for the Eureka Vacuum Cleaner the Grand Prizes and Highest Awards repeatedly conferred upon it by international authorities, or the place it holds today in more than a million American homes. Let your natural desire to own the best guide you to the choice of the Grand Prize Eureka.

EQUIPPING THE BRIDE'S KITCHEN

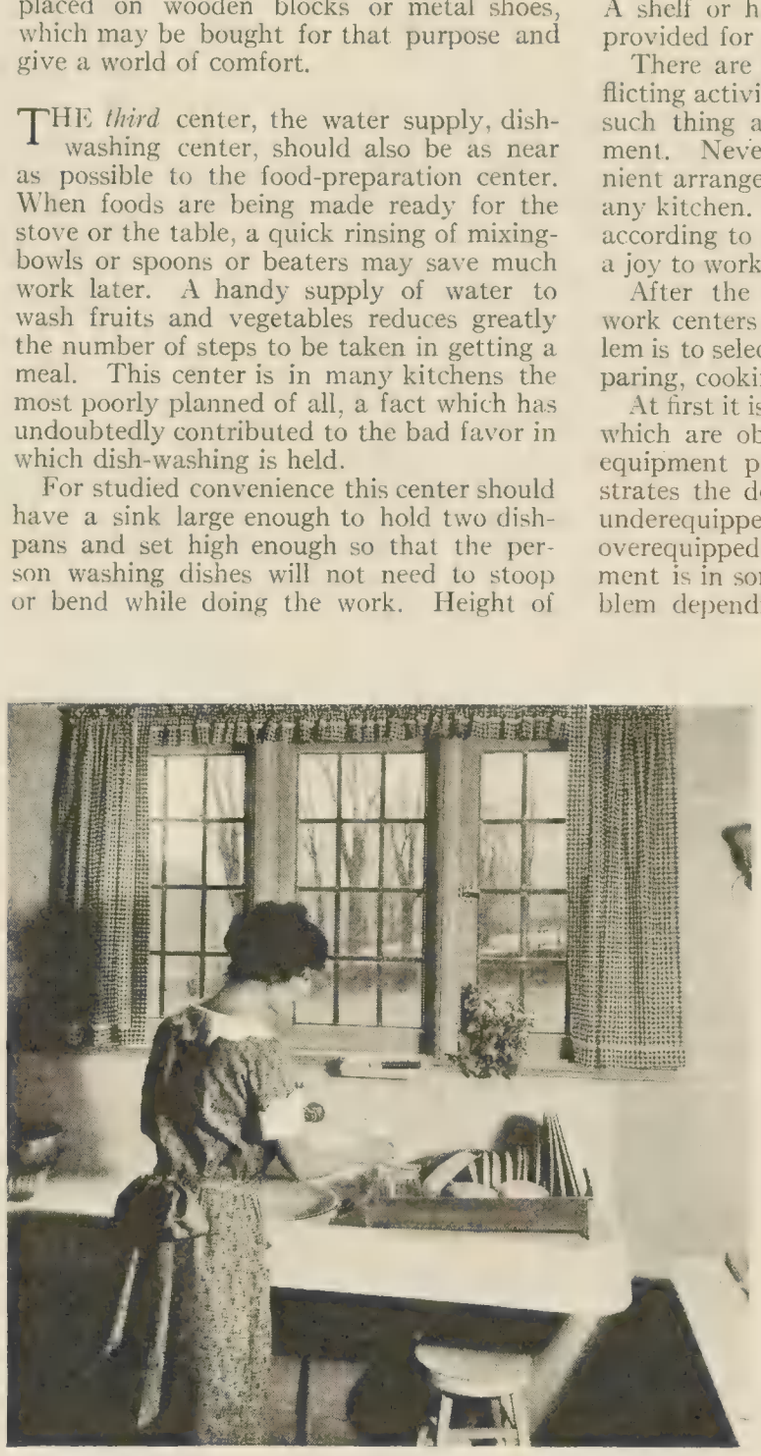
With modern equipment and a temperature chart meals are easily prepared

IN THE second center of kitchen activities, the stove claims the important place. It should by all means be located near the food-preparation center, for often while one dish is being mixed another one which may need frequent attention is cooking on the stove. A step or two should suffice to reach it to give the necessary stir or push or glance before returning to the work at hand.

In addition to a surface for boiling and stewing, the stove should possess a good oven. The oven should be equipped with a thermometer or heat-regulator, for the bride of today can provide herself with a cook-book giving tables of exact temperatures for cooking various foods, and she rarely begins her housekeeping job with experience enough to justify her in using her judgment only. The stove should have a warming oven or shelf, for otherwise the inexperienced bride may be tempted to break the epicurean rule of serving hot foods on hot plates. A small metal-covered table at the side of the stove is a great convenience to serve as a stand for hot dishes as they come from the oven and for foods gotten ready to go into the oven or onto the stove. Unless a hearth of cement or tile or other fireproof material has been built under the stove, a hearth should be made of a large thick sheet of asbestos covered with a sheet of tin or zinc or galvanized iron. If the surface of the stove is so low that it means bending over it when cooking is being done there, its legs should be lifted by being placed on wooden blocks or metal shoes, which may be bought for that purpose and give a world of comfort.

THE third center, the water supply, dish-washing center, should also be as near as possible to the food-preparation center. When foods are being made ready for the stove or the table, a quick rinsing of mixing-bowls or spoons or beaters may save much work later. A handy supply of water to wash fruits and vegetables reduces greatly the number of steps to be taken in getting a meal. This center is in many kitchens the most poorly planned of all, a fact which has undoubtedly contributed to the bad favor in which dish-washing is held.



For studied convenience this center should have a sink large enough to hold two dish-pans and set high enough so that the person washing dishes will not need to stoop or bend while doing the work. Height of sink corresponds closely to height of work-table. On one side of the sink a generous-sized table or shelf should be placed for holding the collection of soiled dishes. On the other side a table or shelf should be placed to hold the dish-rack or drainer, with abundant space left for placing the clean dishes as they are wiped. A hinged faucet which combines both hot and cold water and can be swung from one dish-pan to the other or back against the sink when not in use is a great convenience. Over or under one of the shelves, and preferably over, should be built a cupboard to hold supplies of soap, brushes and other cleaning utensils and materials. A shelf or hooks under the sink should be provided for caring for the dish-pans.

There are so many overlapping and conflicting activities in a kitchen that there is no such thing as an absolutely ideal arrangement. Nevertheless some form of convenient arrangement may be possible for almost any kitchen. One bride planned her kitchen according to the sketch shown here and it is a joy to work in.

After the best possible arrangement of work centers has been made, the next problem is to select the equipment needed in preparing, cooking and serving food.

At first it is better to buy only those things which are obviously needed and add other equipment piece by piece as time demonstrates the desirability of having them. An underequipped kitchen is a hardship. An overequipped kitchen is a nuisance. Equipment is in some measure an individual problem depending in part upon the kind of dishes the family taste desires, in part upon the knowledge of food preparation possessed by the bride, in part upon the way meals are planned. Careful planning of the list of equipment is the best way to avoid both over-equipment and under-equipment — and a good list can be used to check up in shopping.

The note at the beginning of this article tells about some valuable lists we have prepared to give assistance in the problem of purchasing kitchen equipment. In these lists no attempt will be made to say that all of the equipment suggested is needed or to maintain that it will be adequate for all kitchens. The lists will, however, serve as something to guide the bride in her choice of those things with which to begin the task of feeding her "dear brute."

Sinks should be high enough to prevent uncomfortable stooping

An easy way to make better Jam and Jelly

EVEN the most inexperienced housewife can now easily make better looking and better tasting jams and jellies than "grandmother used to make". The new way takes only one minute's boiling, never fails to set, costs less and is so simple even a child can do it.

Success in jam and jelly making used to depend entirely upon the presence in the fruits of a substance called pectin. Some fruits contained little or none; others contained a lot while green, which gradually disappeared as the fruits reached delicious full-flavored ripeness. That is why under-ripe fruit had to be used—why there used to be so many failures and no two batches were ever the same.

Now you can be sure of perfect jams and jellies every time. A way has been found to separate, refine and concentrate this jelly-making property of fruit, so it can be used with any fruit or fruit juice to make the best jam or jelly you ever tasted—quickly, easily and economically. This product, called CERTO (Surejell), is simply concentrated liquid pectin, made entirely from fruit. It contains no preservative or gelatine.

Better Color and Flavor

Instead of being darkened by long boiling, the rich, natural color is preserved; and besides, practically none of the delicious fruit flavor and aroma is boiled away. That's why Certo-made jams and jellies look better, taste better and are better.

Makes One-Half More

Jam or jelly from the same amount of fruit than by the old method because practically no juice is boiled away. For this reason more sugar is used with CERTO — simply to make jelly with the juice that was boiled away by the old method.

CERTO is sold by all grocers. Attached to each bottle is a book containing about 100 jam, jelly and marmalade recipes. Get a bottle or two and some berries today. Ripe fruit has the best flavor and CERTO makes it jell. Start this fascinating method of making delicious jams and jellies. Children love them. You cannot have too much. Fill your shelves now while fresh fruits are here. Order CERTO today.

Free Trial Bottle

Let us send you a free trial bottle of CERTO — enough to make 10 large glasses of strawberry jam. To help pay postage and packing cost, send 10c in stamps or money. Use coupon —now, before you forget it.

How to Make Strawberry Jam

Crush about 2 quarts of berries in single layers so that each berry is actually crushed or broken up to a pulp. Best results are obtained by running berries through a food chopper. This allows fruit to quickly absorb the sugar during the short boil, and prevents fruit rising to the top or floating. Measure 4 level cups (2 lbs.) crushed berries into a large kettle, add 7 level cups (3 lbs.) sugar and mix well. Use hottest fire and stir constantly before and while boiling. Bring to a full rolling boil and boil hard from 1 to 2 minutes, remove from fire and stir in ½ bottle (scant ½ cup) CERTO. Skim and stir repeatedly for just 5 minutes after taking from fire to cool slightly. Then pour quickly and seal hot.

Use same recipe for Blackberry, Raspberry or Loganberry Jam.

1 Bring fruit and sugar to a boil.

2 Boil one minute and add Certo.

3 Skim, pour and wax while hot.

"EATS" FOR THE SWEET GIRL GRADUATE

By Lucile Brewer

Recipes have been tested and approved by the New York State College of Home Economics, Cornell University—Martha Van Rensselaer

A picnic to-day, a tea to-morrow; these are busy times indeed for the young graduate. And every occasion demands novel refreshment. In addition to the suggestions given here, we've prepared a group of recipes for toothsome sandwich-fillings, dainty ices, and tasty cakes and wafers, so that every function you give will have its delightful surprise. Send two cents to cover return postage to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and ask for "Festive Favorites"

JUNE is crowded full of activities and occasions for the sweet-girl graduate, whether she be leaving high school or college. "Eats" for evening parties, "spreads" for class affairs or "pick-me-ups" for impromptu picnics are much in demand. Each girl who entertains besieges her mother to have something "different"—something that will bring forth "ohs" and "ahs" and "ums" from admiring friends. This taxes mother's ingenuity to the limit, whether she is merely asked to provide the idea for something daughter may prepare in her room with chafing-dish and grill, or receives the hint that a timely box of goodies would be welcome, or is requested to help prepare the eats for a local or home affair.

For such occasions the following dishes are suggested for their novelty and attractiveness as well as for their deliciousness and their possibilities of using the class colors in the menu:

HAM ZEST

1 quart finely ground lean cold boiled ham
3 small minced pickles
Paprika to taste
3 hard-cooked eggs chopped
1 minced pimiento
Salt

Mix all ingredients thoroughly. Remove all fat from the ham stock, strain and add just enough of the stock to hold the ingredients together. Turn into any kind of mold which can have a weight placed upon it. Let stand overnight. Turn on to a platter, surround with watercress and serve with a sauce made by mixing two-thirds of a cup of tomato catchup and one-third of a cup of horseradish sauce.

GIBLET TOAST WITH BROILERS

Cook giblets until soft enough to crush with a spoon. Mash thoroughly, adding a little of the stock if necessary. Add an equal measure of butter and one-half as much sweet cream. Season to taste with chopped parsley, lemon-juice, salt and pepper. Heat and spread on slices of toasted bread cut in triangles. Serve as a garnish around broiled chicken.

COMMENCEMENT SALAD

1 pound red cherries
1 pint strawberries
1 cup shredded pineapple
2 sprays mint
Meringue dressing
Pistachio-nuts

Pit and drain the cherries. Slice the strawberries. Cut the mint in small pieces. Combine the ingredients and chill. Just before serving, sprinkle with powdered sugar and shake lightly. On each serving put meringue salad dressing and sprinkle with the finely chopped nuts. Garnish with strawberry leaves.

MERINGUE SALAD DRESSING

⅔ cup sugar
2 eggs
2 teaspoons lemon-juice
½ cup water
1 tablespoon grapefruit-juice

Cook sugar and water until it threads. Pour the sirup gradually over the stiffly beaten egg-whites. Beat thoroughly, add beaten yolks and cook over hot water, beating constantly until the mixture is thick. Beat until cool, add acid and serve very cold.

CRYSTALLIZED STRAWBERRIES

1 egg-white
Powdered sugar
2 tablespoons water
Strawberries

Select large firm berries. Wash them and remove the hulls. Drain on soft paper. Beat the egg-white until foamy and add the water. Dip the berries one at a time in the egg mixture and roll them in the powdered sugar. Lay them on waxed paper and let stand until perfectly dry. Then keep in ice-box until ready to serve.

FROZEN COFFEE CREAM

1 quart milk
4 tablespoons coffee
1 cup sugar
1 teaspoon vanilla
1 cup cream beaten stiff

Heat the milk in a double boiler, add the coffee and let stand for thirty minutes. Strain and add sugar. When, cold add vanilla and whipped cream. Freeze. Serve with finely cut candied grapefruit-rind and chopped blanched pistachio-nuts.

PEANUT SWEETHEARTS

Cut thin slices from date, raisin or white bread and cut in heart shapes. Spread evenly with warm peanut-butter fudge. Let stand a few minutes and cover with second slice. Spread top slice with creamed butter and sprinkle with chopped peanuts.

POP-CORN WAFERS

⅓ cup sugar
1 beaten egg-white
1 cup finely chopped or ground pop-corn
½ cup chopped English walnuts
½ teaspoon vanilla

Add sugar to the beaten egg-white and beat thoroughly and add the other ingredients. Spread on thin slices of buttered whole-wheat bread. Brown in slow oven. Serve hot.

ROSEBUDS

From a white cake baked in shallow pan cut small round shapes. Ice with a soft icing made from beaten egg-white and powdered sugar, tinted a dainty pink with fruit coloring and flavored with almond. Roll the iced cakes in shredded coconut.

"Take extra care in feeding during baby's second summer"

Baby specialists advise mothers

Painted by Maude Tousey Fangel

TIME of grave fears and foreboding — the second summer! Mothers have dreaded it always.

Yet baby specialists tell us that the second year should be less dangerous than the first. The child is older, and better able to resist disease.

The causes of upsets are simply these: In the second year little stomachs are being trained to handle a grown-up diet. Strange solid foods bring new experiences — some not altogether happy.

In addition, there is the fussy business of cutting teeth—enough to make a grown-up grumble.

The important thing during this time is feeding. Three things are necessary in the second summer diet: 1. Food must supply certain essentials for growth. 2. It must be extremely simple and easy to digest. 3. It must be properly prepared and guarded against hot weather taint.

For many years physicians have advised mothers to use one food which ideally fills these requirements — Cream of Wheat!

Cream of Wheat supplies in generous amount, one of a baby's most urgent needs—vital energy. Made of the best hard wheat, it is exceptionally rich in carbohydrates or energy units.

With this high energy value is coupled another advantage—its easy digestibility. The fine granular form of Cream of Wheat is so simple to digest that a baby's inexperienced stomach can handle it with perfect ease.

Ample energy supplied quickly, fully and easily—just what your baby needs during this important period, in a food form which is safe and simple enough for him to digest.

A food for all the family, too! You can serve it in any number of delightful ways; not only as a cereal, with dates, prunes and raisins but in tempting desserts, meat and vegetable dishes. Send for our new recipe booklet, "50 Ways of Serving Cream of Wheat."

How to prepare CREAM OF WHEAT for the Baby

Pour two tablespoons Cream of Wheat into one cup of rapidly boiling salted water, stirring constantly. Cook in a double boiler one hour at least. Give with whole milk or cream. If cooked with milk scald the milk add Cream of Wheat and cook in double boiler one hour

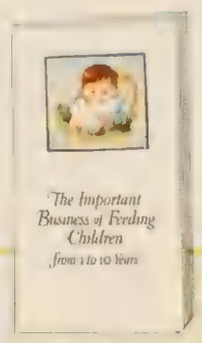
How to reheat CREAM OF WHEAT

Pour a small amount of water (or milk) over Cream of Wheat and heat in double boiler ten or fifteen minutes. When hot, stir until thoroughly mixed. Reheated in this way, left over Cream of Wheat is just as smooth and delicious as though cooked fresh

CREAM OF WHEAT with broth

⅛ cup uncooked Cream of Wheat — 3 pints broth
chopped parsley

Prepare broth as for consomme. When nearly done add Cream of Wheat and cook fifteen minutes. Just before serving add chopped parsley



CREAM OF WHEAT Custard

1 cup cooked Cream of Wheat — 2 eggs
1½ cups milk — ½ cup sugar
½ teaspoon vanilla

Mix Cream of Wheat with milk, beaten egg and sugar; add vanilla. Pour the Cream of Wheat mixture into a buttered baking dish and bake one-half hour in a moderate oven. Serve with cream

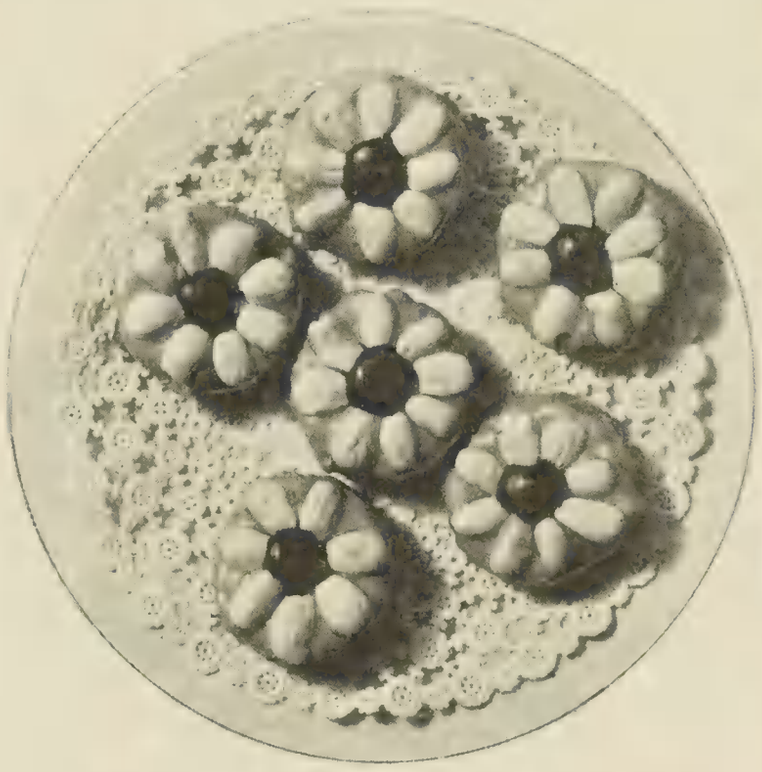
MARGUERITE CAKES

Tint white icing a pale yellow. Spread smoothly on small thin cakes. Select large almonds, blanche and separate in halves. Press halves in the cake, round side on top, to form a daisy and form the center from melted chocolate.

DEVIL'S-FOOD DELIGHT

Between two medium-thick slices of plain unfrosted devil's-food cake place a slice of vanilla ice-cream. Over all pour hot fudge chocolate sauce and sprinkle lightly with chopped roasted almonds.



PINEAPPLE TEMPTATION

Lay a half-inch slice of angel-cake on a plate, cover with crushed sweetened pineapple; over this place a layer of vanilla ice-cream. Cover all with maraschino sauce. Garnish with mint.

MARASCHINO SAUCE

1 cup cream
1 egg-white
2 tablespoons powdered sugar
2 tablespoons maraschino-sirup
2 tablespoons minced maraschino cherries

Whip the cream until it begins to thicken, add beaten egg-white and sugar. Whip until stiff and gradually add cherry mixture. Set on ice until ready to serve.

STRAWBERRY RAPTURE

1 quart strawberries
1 pint sugar
1 pint cream
1 teaspoon gelatin softened in 2 tablespoons water

Mix berries and sugar thoroughly. Put over fire and heat quickly. Boil five minutes. Remove from fire; add softened gelatin. Cool and turn into freezer. When mixture begins to freeze, add cream beaten stiff. Serve in glasses on strawberry leaves.

SUGGESTIONS FOR SANDWICHES

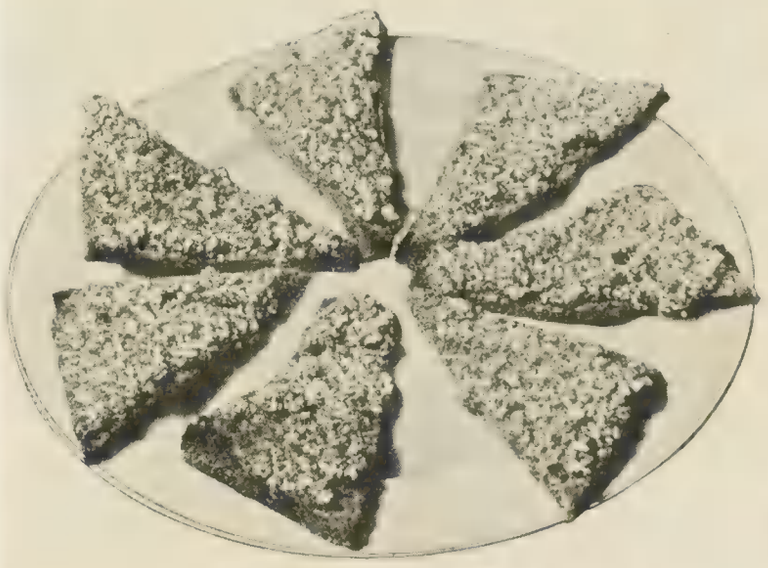
Sandwiches are always needed for the affairs in which the June graduate takes part. A few are suggested here:

Jam Dreams—Spread thin slices of bread with an equal amount of any tart jam or marmalade and cream cheese.

Tomato Club—Sliced tomato, crisp bacon and lettuce between slices of hot buttered toast spread with salad dressing.

Bacon-Salad Sandwich—One-fourth pound of bacon cooked until crisp and chopped very fine. Mix with one tablespoon each of minced green pepper, chives, pimiento and lemon-juice. Use with salad dressing as a sandwich filling.

Ham and Tartare Sauce—Moisten one cup chopped cold boiled ham with tartare sauce. The onion in the sauce may be omitted.



Cucumber Relish Sandwich—Cut thin slices of bread in rounds the same size as slices of cucumbers. Marinate the sliced cucumbers in French dressing and place between the buttered rounds of bread spread also with salad dressing. Garnish with minced parsley.

Chicken Fillers—Use one cup of chopped cooked chicken, one hard-cooked egg rubbed through a sieve, one-third cup of minced celery and one tablespoon of minced parsley. Mix this with boiled salad dressing and spread between thin slices of buttered bread. Garnish with thin slices of stuffed olives.

Ice-Cream Sandwiches—Ice-cream sandwiches may be made from any cake baked either in a loaf or in cup-cakes. If cup-cakes are used, they should be split in half and the cream shaped to fit the cake. Soft or crisp sweet wafers may be used. Serve with hot or cold sauce.

With white cake, strawberry, cherry, raspberry, pistachio, peach or pineapple ice-cream may be used. The sandwiches may be served with maraschino sauce or whipped cream and garnished with tiny pieces of candied cherries, thin strips of angelica, or finely-chopped pistachio-nuts or blanched almonds.

With devil's-food, caramel or gold cake, coffee, chocolate, caramel or raisin ice-cream may be used. Hot chocolate fudge, butterscotch, marshmallow sauce or whipped cream may be served with the sandwiches.

Crisp triangles of giblet toast add a novel touch if you serve broiled chicken

A wonderful new ice cream "treat" —Log Cabin Sundae

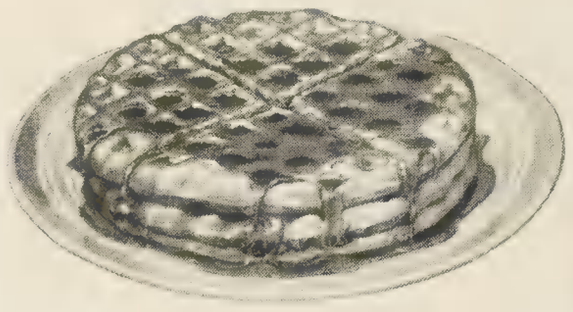
How the first taste that touches your tongue will surprise you!

The cool richness of ice cream, blending with the syrup with its rare taste of maple!

It will give your family and guests an unexpected thrill—this new dish, Log Cabin Sundae. To prepare it, just cover plain ice cream with Towle's Log Cabin Syrup—and, if you like, sprinkle it over with nuts.

For special "treats" of this kind in the summer—as a sweetening for lemonade or as pour-over for Fruit Cocktails—as well as for pancakes and waffles all year 'round, Log Cabin has become America's favorite syrup—because it brings the joy of maple at its best.

Choice maple sugar from Canada and Vermont is blended with granulated cane sugar in Log Cabin, by the Towle process. It is this method of blending, known only to the makers of Log Cabin, which mellows and enhances the goodness of the maple—which gives you a wonderful flavor that no other syrup can have.



Many tempting foods, such as Maple Puff, Log Cabin Fudge and Log Cabin Cake Frosting can be easily prepared with this syrup. Use the coupon to send for the free set of 24 recipe cards.

Towle's Log Cabin Syrup comes only in the Log-Cabin-Shaped cans—in three sizes. Ask your grocer for a can today.

MEAL PLANS FOR JUNE

By Jessie Boys

These menus have been edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics. Recipes for any five dishes mentioned here will gladly be sent on receipt of two cents in stamps to cover postage. Mail your request to the Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

MENUS for early June are more easily planned than for the last of the month, for in spite of the greater abundance of both fruits and fresh vegetables in these later weeks the weather is hotter then and it is therefore more effort to plan the appealing things and also more uncomfortable to prepare them. Much appreciation is due the cook who sacrifices personal desires to the good and the pleasure of the whole family.

Left-overs, whether of fruit, meat, fish or vegetables, will give as great satisfaction as at their first appearance if they are jellied and garnished attractively. Some may be creamed or made into sandwiches.

Fruits and Vegetables should be used extensively in their season. The more attractively vegetables are prepared and seasoned the slower will the family be to tire of them. Forms of service as well as methods of preparation need to be varied now and then.

Picnic Luncheons are in demand in the early Summer. The Tuesday and the Wednesday luncheon in the accompanying menus may be used for picnics without change, and many of the others will need but little revision.

June Desserts—For June desserts, fruit ices and sherbets and fruit-gelatin dishes are simplest to make, and they offer sufficient variety to last the warm season through if interspersed with fresh fruit and an occasional shortcake.

Strawberries fresh from the garden may be carefully brushed instead of washed. They are a most refreshing sight if used as a beginning course, served without having been hulled on a plate with a mound of powdered sugar in the center.

Milk—If your milk comes to you in good condition, keep it so; and if it doesn't, investigate the source of supply for yourself. Milk should be placed in the refrigerator as soon after delivery as possible. The shelf beneath the ice-chamber is the coolest and should be reserved especially for the milk and butter.

Afternoon Tea—One of the easiest ways for a young hostess to gain a reputation for hospitality is always to be prepared to serve afternoon tea. The simplest forms of refreshment are often the most welcomed. Delicacy of quality is more to be desired than elaborateness or quantity.

An Emergency Shelf—A well-equipped emergency shelf of food materials is insurance against embarrassment. It also makes for success in entertaining casual guests or for getting up an impromptu picnic.

Biscuit and Shortcake—There is one encouraging thing about mastering the making of a really good baking-powder biscuit: you can always make delicious shortcakes.

Left-over Sandwiches—Incidentally, almost any sandwich left from tea may be wrapped in a damp napkin and toasted for supper with pleasing results.

Hors-d'Œuvres—These delightful before-the-meal titbits lose nothing in their zestful and appetite-whetting qualities even if they are nothing more than carefully prepared radishes, olives and sardines with slices of lemon.

GOLDEN RIPE~DRIPPING WITH SUNSHINE & SUGAR

Make your SPRING MENUS SPARKLE Serve Hawaii's Favorite Fruit

Springtime . . . . tonic-time . . . . season of lazy appetites, when fruit foods are so necessary to health!

Springtime is Pineapple-time! And fortunately, thanks to the miracle of the canners' art, luscious, golden Hawaiian Pineapple is now available everywhere – regardless of season – packed in two convenient forms: Sliced and Crushed.

Do you enjoy this matchless tropical fruit as often as you should? Do you serve Hawaiian Pineapple Salads, Pastries, Ices, Desserts, "ades" and Punches? And do you serve it often for dessert, for breakfast or as a side dish with meat – both the Sliced and the Crushed – just as they come from the can?

Both Crushed and Sliced Hawaiian Pineapple are identical in quality and flavor – the same full-ripened fruit, grown on the same model Hawaiian Plantations.

You'll find it pays to keep both kinds on hand!

Hawaii Suggests That You Try These Recipes:

ROYAL FRUIT SALAD: Arrange on lettuce leaves, a slice of Canned Hawaiian Pineapple and a slice of orange (slightly smaller). Over this slice half a banana. Garnish with chopped mint and mayonnaise.

PINEAPPLE SALAD MOUSSE: Soften 1 teaspoon gelatine in 1 tablespoon water and dissolve over boiling water. Thoroughly drain 1 cup Crushed Hawaiian Pineapple and add ½ cup diced oranges, 1 cup very thick mayonnaise, 2 cups cream, whipped, and the dissolved gelatine. When well mixed pour into a mold, cover tightly and pack in equal parts of ice and salt 4 hours. Serve on lettuce with additional mayonnaise if desired. This may be used for a combination salad and dessert course.

PINEAPPLE RICE: Place a layer of boiled rice in a casserole; then a layer of slices of Canned Hawaiian Pineapple and a thin layer of currant jelly. Top with a meringue and brown in oven. Serve cold.

MARSHMALLOW DELIGHT: Drain the syrup from 1 large can of Crushed Hawaiian Pineapple. Cut ¼ lb. of marshmallows in pieces. Arrange the marshmallows in layers in a serving dish, sprinkling each layer with finely chopped roasted almonds. Pour the pineapple syrup over all and set aside in a cold place for at least 2 hours. Spread the drained Crushed Pineapple over the top just before serving.

Are the Floors in This Old Manor House More Modern than Your Own?

A fine old home, this Lancaster Manor House. Its stately brick walls could tell you tales of crinoline days, tales of a great Civil War. Yet today, for decorators, architects, home-lovers everywhere, this old American mansion has a newer, a more personal message. Read it. Then come to see the Manor House itself.

"SOFT wood upstairs and hardwood downstairs" was the vogue for floors when this old Manor House was built.

Today, however, this mansion of the '60's is a striking example of a new and growing vogue—the vogue for linoleum floors of color and design.

As you enter its spacious hall, you are met with an old-fashioned welcome. You know that you are in a home of refinement and good taste. Then your eye strikes the floor. What a beautiful floor! How well its neat blocks of black and cream convey a feeling of cheer and brightness. Can this be linoleum?

But wait! You enter the living-room. Somehow you feel you've seen this room before. It's just the kind of living-room you have always wanted. Everything in it seems to belong. A soft, rippling floor of Jaspé linoleum forms the basis for the whole decorative scheme—an ideal background for the fine fabric rugs, a richly mellow setting for the rare old furniture.

The dining-room, too, wins your instant favor. A big room, yet pleasingly trim and inviting. The massive table, the high-backed chairs, suggest the happy family group. And what floor could be more in the spirit of this old-time festive hall than the natural marble floor of Armstrong's Linoleum!

Pattern floors of Armstrong's Linoleum have been laid throughout this quaint old Manor House. In each room, a floor of color and design fits ideally into a definite scheme of decoration. Visit the Armstrong Manor the next time you are motoring through eastern Pennsylvania. A cordial welcome awaits you.

An Invitation: We invite all who are interested in furnishing and decorating homes to see this old Manor. It's easy to reach. The Lincoln Highway leads right into Lancaster, Pa. The Manor itself is but three miles north on the Lititz Pike. If you plan to come by train, write us and cars will meet you at either the Pennsylvania or Reading Railroad Station in Lancaster.

You wander upstairs. As you pass from room to room, you are more than ever aware of the new beauty, the new decorative uses of patterned linoleum floors. In one room a pretty green Jaspé floor inspired the decorative treatment. Hooked and braided rugs look their best on such a floor. The quaint old rocker and highboy are right at home, too. The other rooms—there are seven spacious bedrooms—all prove how appropriate a floor of Armstrong's Linoleum is for every room in the house.

Are such floors permanent? you may ask. Yes, for they are cemented in place over a heavy lining of builders' deadening felt and should last as long as the house itself. Are they easy to keep clean? All the housekeeper gives them is a daily dusting with a dry mop. Once or twice a year the floors are rewaxed and polished. Are they costly? They cost no more than ordinary floors of wood, yet they never require refinishing.

Would you like to know more about the new pattern floors of Armstrong's Linoleum? Then come to see the Armstrong Manor House, or write to us for Agnes Foster Wright's new book, "Floors, Furniture, and Color." This book on furnishing and decorating homes will be sent to anyone in the United States for twenty-five cents. Armstrong Cork Company, Linoleum Division, 866 West Walnut Street, Lancaster, Pa.

ARTISTRY IN BOOK-SHELVES

By Estelle H. Ries

The Department of House Decoration of THE DELINEATOR is at your service if you wish additional suggestions for artistic book arrangements or desire assistance in any personal book-case or bookshelf problem. Be sure to send a two-cent stamp to cover return postage with your request

WHAT to do with the books that the various members of the family bring into the house is always a problem.

Whether book-shelves shall extend from floor to ceiling or only part way up must be determined by the number of books to be accommodated. Where there is a choice between having one wall entirely filled from floor to ceiling or two walls partly filled, the latter course would in most cases be preferable. It would make all the books more accessible and would permit of window openings above the shelves for better admission of light and air. When shelving is built up to the ceiling it gives a sense of height to a low room.

As to building shelves out into the room or flush with the wall, this is a matter of preference. To me there seems far greater intimacy and companionableness in the projecting shelves. And then, it is convenient to have the top shelf stand out from the wall so that you may lay a book down for a moment without having to walk across the room to a table.

Another consideration is the fact that shelves built into a wall so that the books are flush with it are usually more expensive to construct and less flexible to change in case of alteration. One can not readily take them down and use the wall as a solid background for another purpose.

Books should, of course, be within convenient reach, both the low ones and the high ones. They should not be stacked from the very floor. A convenient height for the lowest is about eighteen inches.

On the other hand, it is a mistake to have the shelves too high. Aside from the inconvenience of having to stretch on tiptoe or mount a chair in order to reach the volumes, there is the undesirable certainty that the books themselves will be subject to a higher temperature the nearer they are to the ceiling. Such continuous heat is liable to injure the bindings.

If shelves are constructed of soft wood five-eighths of an inch thick, they should not be much more than two feet long. If they are, they will gradually bend in the middle under the weight of the books.

It is an advantage to cover the shelves with green baize. This is easily stuck on with glue and will be found to be quite a protection to the bindings. It has the advantage of holding the dust which collects and may then be cleaned with the aid of a small vacuum cleaner.

Shelves should not tightly surround the books. There should be free circulation of air around them. If there are glass doors, these should be opened every day. Shelves built against a wall should be the same finish and style as the rest of the woodwork.

Libraries are either inherited or created. For the new library just growing, sectional bookcases commend themselves. They may be built at any height and come with glass doors or without. Also they may be readily dismantled into units and moved with their contents—a decided convenience to apartment dwellers.

In every bedroom, guest-room, living-room or other intimate place where one may relax, as well as in the formal library itself, there should unquestionably be a single shelf set apart for the special books that are claiming general attention at the moment. Place also on this shelf your favorite books and current magazines. Then whenever spare moments offer themselves there will be at hand some interesting volume to meet the mood of the moment.

This bookcase was cleverly evolved from the former opening of a double doorway

KNOX
SPARKLING
GELATINE
"The Highest Quality for Health"

THE addition of Knox Sparkling Gelatine to milk insures the complete digestion of the milk, thus increasing the obtainable nourishment by about 23%. It is as good for healthy children as for frail ones—as effective for grown-ups as for youngsters.

How to add Gelatine to Milk

Soak for ten minutes one level tablespoonful of Knox Sparkling Gelatine in ½ cup of cold milk taken from a quart of milk; cover while soaking; then place the cup in boiling water, stirring until gelatine is fully dissolved; add this dissolved gelatine to the quart of cold milk from which it was taken. For smaller quantities of milk reduce gelatine in proportion. In infant feeding, add the dissolved gelatine to the regular formula prescribed by the physician.

BUTTERS—PIQUANT AND SWEET

By Estelle Lambert Matteson

Edited and approved by Martha Van Rensselaer, Head of the New York State College of Home Economics at Cornell University

For a savory picnic or luncheon sandwich try a spread of lobster butter with crisp slices of cucumber and lettuce

WHEN it's still an hour or so before dinner or when the little ones romp into the house with appetites whetted by play outside, no combination could be more healthful, appetizing and satisfying than home-baked bread and fresh butter and milk.

But frequently we are not content with just that combination. Our palates often require tickling and our minds run to something new and zestful.

With butter as a base, the spreads given here will more than please the most captious appetite. The piquant butters are ideal for butter-balls and, served with bread at the table, they fit in with almost any entrée or meat. They can be kept in a jar and used for sandwich spreads. With a crisp lettuce leaf and fresh bread they are savory, easy-to-make sandwiches for Summer picnics.

Thin pastry cookies spread with the sweet butters are just as good as sweet tarts, and can be more conveniently packed. If bread is preferred, it should be cut thin and the filling should be generous.

Some people do not care for fish flavors, but we have prepared a few butters that contain fish. These are very uncommon in their preparation and appetizing in their use. Every housekeeper might, in this case, adopt as her slogan, "Try anything once."

HERB BUTTER

Have on a cold plate one-half cup of butter, one teaspoon of thoroughly dried and finely chopped parsley, one-half teaspoon of powdered Summer savory, one teaspoon of lemon-juice, two saltspoons of salt and one-quarter teaspoon of white pepper. Mix the whole together thoroughly with a fork and use when required.

This herb butter should always be kept in a cool place until required.

PIMIENTO BUTTER

Place four pimientos in a bowl and mash to a pulp. Remove the pulp and press through a sieve into a bowl; add one-half cup of butter and one-half green pepper finely minced. Mix and use as required.

HORSERADISH BUTTER

Take one-half cup of fresh butter and add to it one tablespoon of freshly ground horseradish. Mix well in a bowl with a fork and when it is very evenly mixed add one tablespoon of minced parsley. Put the butter in a jar and place where it is cool, for future use.

GREEN BUTTER

Take the heart of an onion, four branches of parsley, two branches of watercress or peppergrass, one-half cup of butter, one and one-half saltspoons of salt and one-half saltspoon of cayenne pepper. Place all of these ingredients except the butter in a bowl and mash very smoothly. Then add the butter and mix again until the whole is thickened. Pass through a strainer into a bowl and keep in a cool place for use as required.

CREOLE BUTTER

Take one-half cup of butter, two saltspoons of ground English mustard, two teaspoons of good white malt vinegar, two teaspoons of Worcestershire sauce, one-fourth teaspoon of salt, one teaspoon of cayenne pepper and two egg-yolks, boiled. Place all of these articles in a bowl, mix thoroughly with a spoon and use as required.

GARDEN BUTTER

The ingredients for this butter are: two tablespoons of chopped parsley, two tablespoons of chopped celery, two tablespoons of chopped chives, one teaspoon of tarragon leaves and one teaspoon of chopped watercress or peppergrass. These should all be well washed and thoroughly drained. Place these ingredients in a chopping-bowl with a tablespoon of capers, chopped pickle, the yolks of two cold hard-boiled eggs, and mash until they are fine. Remove and press through a colander into a bowl. Add half a cup of butter; beat sharply with a wooden spoon for five minutes, store and use as required.

BACON OR HAM BUTTER

Fry thin slices of lean bacon or ham until crisp. Lift the slices from the fat and pound to a paste on a meat-board. Add enough butter to make a smoothly spreading paste. To two tablespoons of paste add one teaspoon of horseradish or mustard.

ANCHOVY BUTTER

Place half a cup of butter in a bowl. Add one tablespoon of pounded anchovies and the strained juice of half a lemon. Mix well together. Keep in a cool place for future use.

LOBSTER OR CRAB BUTTER

Pound to a paste one small can of the best lobster or crab (or the equivalent of a small can if you use the fresh fish) and one-half cup of butter. Season lightly with pepper. When using this butter for sandwiches, spread one piece of bread with mayonnaise and the other piece with the lobster or crab mixture. Put a lettuce leaf or thin slice of cucumber between the two.

SARDINE BUTTER

Take one-fourth cup of butter, four large sardines, skinned and boned, and one teaspoon of lemon-juice. Pound these into a smooth paste. When using this paste, spread one half of the sandwich with the paste and the other half with mashed hard-boiled egg or a thin layer of minced onion.

CHEESE BUTTER

Mash together one-half cup of American cheese and one-half cup of butter. When using this butter, spread one half of the sandwich with this mixture and the other half with a tart jelly. Either crackers or saltines or bread can be used. Also any

The Queen of the Belgians
The King of England's daughter
The Queen of Sweden

How their precious possessions were restored to dainty loveliness

The Queen of the Belgians

"When the King and Queen of the Belgians visited this country a banquet was given their majesties at one of the famous New York hotels. As I am an old newspaper woman I got one of the guards to let me go up to the banquet floor.

"I met one of the parlor maids sobbing bitterly, closely followed by a housekeeper who also seemed distressed. I asked what was the matter and the housekeeper explained that in some unaccountable manner the wrap that the Queen left in the dressing room had been soiled by a hotel attendant. The Queen always wears white and this particular garment was of beautiful heavy brocade trimmed with white fur.

"I suggested sponging it with Lux, and finally persuaded them to let me do it. I sponged it with lukewarm water and Lux, until all soiled places disappeared. I rinsed it the same way and pressed it with a warm iron over a clean cloth.

"When I removed the cloth there the wrap was spotlessly clean—saved by Lux!"

Kathrine Stone Brown, L. I.

The Queen of Sweden

"There had been a state dinner at the home of the Marshal of the Court of Sweden. The following day when I happened to be with the wife of the Court Marshal, one of her maids came into the room holding some priceless doilies of cobweb fineness—sadly soiled. Her Ladyship told me the doilies had been lent her for the dinner by one of the Ladies-in-Waiting to the Queen. She would have to return them personally with apologies!

"Here I interrupted: 'If you don't mind I would like to save the situation!' (confident that I could safely depend on Lux).

"The precious lace doilies were handed over to me. When the little things had dried I examined them and indeed, I felt proud. I could see no trace of soil whatever."

Mrs. S. Fagrell, Calif.

The King of England's Daughter

"When the people in Ireland heard of the intended wedding of the King's only daughter, they decided to send some of the beautiful lace for which Ireland is famed.

"After it was ready, the most rare and beautiful piece was found to be soiled. There wasn't time to make another and without this the other pieces would be incomplete. The workmanship was so delicate that to trust it to any one but an expert might ruin it altogether.

"At last an old Irish woman pleaded to be allowed to cleanse it, stating she knew of a wonderful preparation that would remove spots without injuring the most delicate fabric.

"Great was the joy when the lace was returned free from soil and as beautiful as ever. When questioned the old woman announced she had washed it with Lux."

Mrs. Wesley M'Leon, Mich.

Now the Big New Package too

In addition to the well-known uses — washing silks, woolens, fine cottons and linens — use Lux for dishes, the family laundry, shampoo, babies' milk bottles, paint, porcelain, woodwork, rugs and linoleum. Lux won't harm anything that water alone won't harm.

A sanitary floor easily cleaned. A comfortable floor—springy and restful to the feet. A beautiful floor—in unusual, colorful patterns. This example is Belflor Inlaid Pattern No. 7105/8.

New beauty and economy in a long-famous linoleum

WHEN she fitted out her own kitchen she didn't ask her mother what kind of refrigerator or cook-stove she had. Modern things are so much better. Yet she did want the same kind of linoleum. That floor of Nairn Inlaid Linoleum in her mother's home had worn for years.

But how much more lovely and colorful she found the modern Nairn patterns, especially in Belflor Inlaid, the newest Nairn Flooring. Here was beauty that her mother never dreamed of seeing in a linoleum flooring. And what a pleasant surprise was the low price. For a patented process of manufacture brings this beautiful flooring within everyone's reach.

The soft, clouded effects found in Belflor are duplicated in no other linoleum. In fact, Belflor Inlaid is so different from what you ordinarily think of as "kitchen flooring" that it's being used in many homes for the dining-room, bedrooms, and sun-room. It makes a marvelous background for rugs. Its colors add new rich values to the decorative scheme.

Not only is Belflor Inlaid more artistic than wood, but it requires less attention. It never needs refinishing. Its colors go clear through to the burlap back and an occasional waxing keeps them fresh.

LEMON BUTTER

Mix one and a half cups of granulated sugar, the juice and rind of one lemon, one-fourth cup of fresh butter and three eggs. Boil all the ingredients gently in a saucepan, stirring constantly until the mixture is as thick as honey. Put it in jars and cover with a cloth or waxed paper which can be tied down when cold, but do not put wax on the top. This butter will keep for months if it is stored in a dry place.

ORANGE BUTTER

Beat to a cream one-fourth pound of butter, the yolks of three eggs, one cup of powdered sugar, the grated rind of one orange, and its juice. Cook the mixture over hot water, stirring all the time until thick.

DATE BUTTER

Mix one cup mashed dates, and one-half cup of butter with the oil squeezed out of the rind of a lemon. Mash these together into a paste. When using this butter spread it thickly on bread or crackers.

HAM BUTTER

¼ pound or ½ cup cooked ham
½ cup butter
Yolks of 2 hard-cooked eggs
Pepper

Grind the ham and pound smooth with the butter and the yolks of the hard-cooked eggs and season with pepper.

SHRIMP BUTTER

1 cup cooked shrimps
Salt
⅛ teaspoon cayenne
1 cup butter
About ¼ cup tarragon vinegar or lemon-juice

Pound the shrimps in a mortar with salt and cayenne. Add an equal portion of butter and moisten the mixture with the tarragon vinegar or lemon-juice.

PEANUT BUTTER AND FRUIT

¼ cup figs
¼ cup raisins
2 tablespoons light sirup
½ teaspoon salt
½ cup peanut butter

Wash figs and raisins and put through a food-chopper. Add salt, peanut butter, lemon-juice and sirup, and mix well.

PEANUT BUTTER AND ORANGE MARMALADE

½ cup peanut butter
¼ cup cream
½ cup orange marmalade

Mix peanut butter with cream or milk until it is smooth and light in color. Spread generously on thin slices of bread, and add a layer of orange marmalade. The marmalade may be mixed with the peanut butter, if preferred.

PEANUT BUTTER AND BANANA

½ cup peanut butter
¼ cup cream or hot water
½ cup banana pulp or 2 bananas
Lemon-juice

Mix the peanut butter with the cream until smooth and light in color, then combine with banana pulp and lemon-juice, or slice banana over layer of peanut butter on bread.

PEANUT BUTTER AND PICKLE

½ cup peanut butter
¼ cup hot water
½ cup chopped pickle

Cream peanut butter and water together and add chopped pickle.

PEANUT BUTTER AND ONION

1 cup peanut butter
¼ cup mayonnaise
1 small Bermuda or Spanish onion

Beat peanut butter, add mayonnaise and spread sandwiches. Slice onion in very thin slices and put a layer of these over mixture on bread.

PEACH BUTTER

2 quarts peach pulp
4 cups sugar
1 cup water

Pare, stone, slice and measure the fruit. Place it in the preserving-kettle with the water and heat it very slowly. When it is soft, pass the peaches through a fine sieve, return the pulp to the fire, add the sugar, and cook until thick and clear. Pack in hot, clean jars and seal.

EAT SUMMER'S FRUIT NEXT WINTER

The luscious fruits and vegetables of Spring and early Summer will soon be out of season. Preserve their deliciousness for next Winter. You can do it in so many ways.

Send for our booklet "Canning, Preserving and Jelly-Making." It tells you how to can, how to use the efficient cold-pack method, how to make the right sirups for preserves, how to use the pectin test for jelly; in fact, all you want to know about the processes of canning, preserving and jelly-making.

Carefully follow the directions given in it. With not half so much work as you think, you can line your shelves with jars of golden fruit in clear sirup, sparkling jellies, and smooth, flavorsome preserves—the kind you are proud to serve and glad to eat.

The booklet costs only twenty-five cents and will be sent to you promptly upon receipt of the money and your address by the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.

Hints from successful housewives

SAVE ALL THE STEAK

WHEN you buy a porterhouse steak, have the butcher cut off the long end piece, leaving the tissue. Have him put this section of the steak through the meat-grinder twice and then put it back in the steak, using the tissue to hold it in place. Every bit of the steak is tender, in fact it is all quite as tender as the tenderloin and looks very attractive when served.—Mrs. J. E. C., Washington, D.C.

SAVE HUNTING FOR A BODKIN

To save the work of running a ribbon in lingerie, each time it is laundered, fasten a piece of common twine to one end of the ribbon; then pull the ribbon out and leave the twine in. After the garment is laundered, fasten the ribbon to the twine, pulling it in as the twine is removed, and an otherwise slow job is quickly finished.—M. A. W., West Newton, Pa.

SAVE FOOD FROM GETTING COLD

Every woman who cooks on an oil-stove knows how difficult it is to keep food and plates warm. I have found that an old oven, placed on top of the one in which you are baking, makes a perfect warming-oven just right in size and temperature.—Mrs. A. P. O., Rogers, Ark.

EGG YOLKS CAN BE SAVED

I find that one or two tablespoons of salad oil poured over the yolks of eggs will protect them from the air and keep them soft. The yolks thus saved may be used for mayonnaise, muffins, cake, or for practically any purpose.—Mrs. R. J. A., Norfolk, Va.

SAVE TEARING LETTUCE LEAVES

In some varieties of lettuce the leaves grow so closely together that it is almost impossible to separate them without tearing them. By cutting the root end very closely, even cutting it out a little, and letting the cold water from the faucet run down into the the heart of the lettuce the leaves can be loosened without being torn. Mrs. B. H. F., South Orange, N. J.

SAVE BUYING CLAY FOR CHILDREN

A very simple but satisfactory molding clay may be made from one cup of flour, one cup of salt, one teaspoon of powdered alum, mixed with enough water to mold easily. By wrapping it in a damp cloth after the children are tired of playing with it the clay can be used again and again.—Mrs. F. P. B., Rushville, Mo.

DON'T BREAK THE BOOK'S BACK

A new book should not be used until it has been opened properly. To do this hold the book so the back is on the table and the covers and leaves are upright, take six or eight pages, first from the right and then from the left side, and press them down gently against the covers. Continue this until all the pages have been pressed down.—Mrs. F. D. B., Manhattan, Kans.

HOLDERS THAT SAVE BURNED HANDS

When making cloth holders for handling hot pans and dishes, use several thicknesses of cloth, sewing them together on three sides but leaving the fourth side open. The hand can then be slipped inside the holder and protected from the heat of the oven and from the top of the stove. Holders made in this way are also a great protection when boiling water is being poured from an uncovered kettle.—Mrs. B. I. C., Syracuse, N. Y.

MAKE MONEY ON GARDEN FLOWERS

Several Summers ago we found that our income left us no spending-money. So we studied to discover a way in which the income might be increased. One evening at a lodge meeting I noticed that the women who lived in apartments were eager for the flowers which had been used for decorations. An inspiration came to me which proved to be profitable. In my garden were several long rows of sweet peas and nasturtiums in full bloom. I made up several bouquets of these flowers and permitted my ten-year-old son to take them to the apartments to sell. In an hour he was back with an empty basket and two dollars in cash. That afternoon he made a second trip. By evening all the flowers were sold. For the remainder of the Summer the boy made two trips a week, following a regular route. In the Fall there were zinnias and marigolds—but never enough of any flower to meet the demand. The next year most of our garden was planted with flowers. Both the boy and I have a very tidy income from the flowers.—Mrs. R. J. S., Cambridge, Ohio.

A NEW BED FROM AN OLD ONE

Old brass beds which have become unsightly may be made most attractive by using a walnut finish. I had two such beds. I first gave them two coats of flat cream paint, and, when they were dry, covered them with a good walnut stain.—C. K., Chicago, Ill.

HOW TO MEET BILLS

My husband earns three hundred and twenty dollars a month, and I seemed to have no ready cash when the bills came in. Now I have a number of envelopes, each one labeled with one item as cash, electricity, rent, furniture, insurance, etc. I figure one-fourth of the monthly cost of these items, thus finding the weekly average. Each week I take out from my husband's wages the amount required for the various items for a week and place this amount in the envelopes. At the end of the month the money is ready and I no longer need to worry.—Mrs. L. A. S., Toledo, Ohio.

KEEPING THE MIXING-BOWL FROM SLIPPING

When beating ingredients in a bowl with one hand and adding material with the other, the bowl is inclined to slip around on a smooth table-top. This can be prevented by placing the bowl on a folded towel.—Mrs. C. G. W., Bell, Calif.

WHEN YOU PRICK YOUR FINGER

The pricking of a finger has resulted many times in blood spots on a delicate fabric. These may be perfectly removed from white fabric with peroxide.—Mrs. D. S. B., Greene, N. Y.

SAVE SNAPS FROM FLATTENING

I have found that if snaps are fastened before the garment is washed they usually are not injured by being put through the wringer.—Mrs. T. M., Rochester, Ind.

If you have discovered some clever little way to save time or labor or fuel or food or anything else connected with housekeeping, tell us about it—and if we can use it in these columns we will pay you five dollars for it. Write on only one side of the paper and address your letter to The "Savers" Editor, The Delineator, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y. (If you wish to have your suggestion returned in case we can not use it, please enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope.)

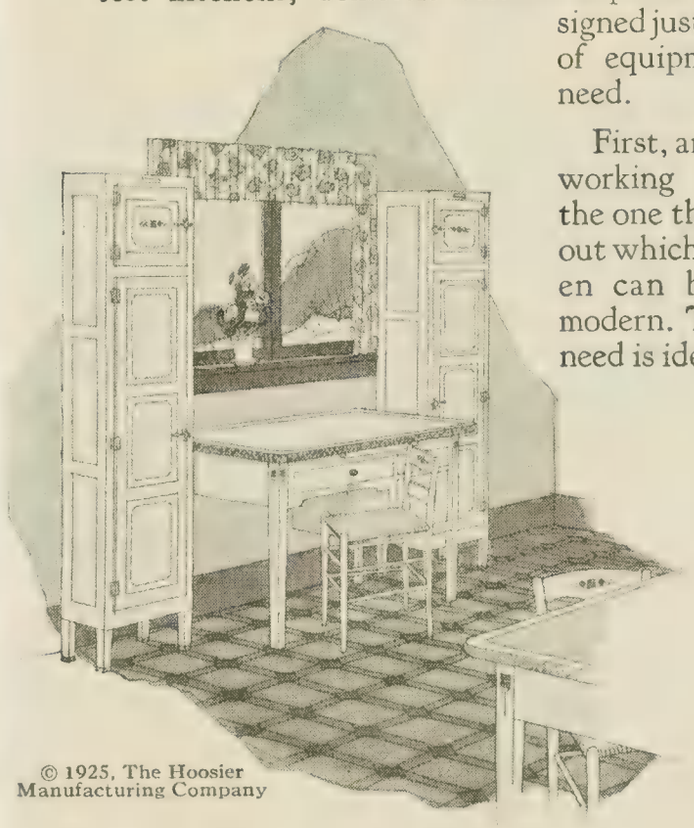
Your Kitchen—not just a place to work but a room of comfort and convenience

—with the improved 1925 Hoosier Highboy!

Somber dark brown calico or pretty, clean, colorful linen—which will a woman choose for a dress?



Somber dark brown kitchen or pretty, clean, colorful room—which will she choose for her work place?

A drudge's dress and a drudgery room have no interest for a woman nowadays. She must have beauty, cleanliness, convenience in everything.

Most of all she must have it in the kitchen. And fortunately she can have it—easily and inexpensively.

A Hoosier kitchen inviting, efficient, inexpensive

The Hoosier Manufacturing Company has made it possible for you to make this most important room a well-ordered, pleasant place to work. In the Hoosier test kitchens, domestic science experts have designed just the units of equipment you need.

© 1925, The Hoosier Manufacturing Company

Quite the most constructive step in kitchen efficiency since the first Hoosier cabinet was designed, are the Hoosier storage units. The broom unit holds all cleaning accessories and the shelf unit gives ample room for pots, pans and staple supplies

First, an efficient working center—the one thing without which no kitchen can be called modern. This great need is ideally filled by the Hoosier Highboy Cabinet. Every detail is scientifically planned and perfected to save time and work. Not in years of housekeeping can so many conveniences be assembled, and certainly not in one such capacious working center!

And it is such a handsome piece of furniture, too! Imposing in proportions, elegant in finish, yet dainty in decoration, the Highboy gives to the kitchen a planned, completely furnished look. You can have it in White or French Grey Enamel or Golden Oak.

With the Hoosier Highboy as the central working unit, movable cupboard units have been designed to complete the equipment. A roomy broom closet and a handy shelf cupboard for dishes and utensils give the storage which every kitchen needs, in addition to that afforded in the cabinet.

The Hoosier Breakfast Set of table and chairs adds cozy convenience. It is finished to match cabinet and units. The table has the regular Hoosier quality porceliron top; the chairs have cane seats.

With Hoosier equipment you can completely modernize your old kitchen with no remodeling, no tearing out or building in! And for new kitchens architects are installing it as the most complete, uniform equipment possible to get.

The Hoosier Easy Purchase Plan makes ownership easy!

Don't wait to enjoy the convenience of a Hoosier Highboy—you can have one now, easily and economically. The Hoosier store in your town will gladly tell you of a special purchase plan whereby a small down payment puts the cabinet in your kitchen now; the rest on convenient terms. See Hoosier Equipment; select what you need; then begin to enjoy it immediately through the Hoosier Easy Purchase Plan. Be sure to ask about it at the store or write us for details.

THE HOOSIER MANUFACTURING CO.

Restful Sleep and quiet nerves

A natural means to restful sleep—a quick restoration to your tired body

How to get the sound, natural sleep that keeps you young in looks and spirits

Approved by 20,000 foremost doctors. See what 3 days will do for you

No more wakeful nerves at night. No more logy mornings. No more afternoon let-downs.

Here is a natural means to sound, peaceful sleep. It brings quick restoration to your tired body. It soothes your frayed nerves. And as you sleep you are gaining strength.

In the morning you awaken, looking and feeling years younger. You are a new being, eager with the joy of life. With youthful energy to carry you buoyantly through the day.

Ovaltine brings sound, restful sleep quickly, naturally

A 3-day test will show you. We urge you to make this test. It is well worth while.

Luxurious Sleep That Restores

Taken at night, a cup of Ovaltine mixed with milk, brings sound restful sleep, quickly and naturally. This is why:

First—it combines in easily digestive form certain vitalizing and building-up food-essentials in which your daily fare is lacking. One cup of Ovaltine has more real food value than 12 cups of beef extract.

Second—Ovaltine has the power actually to digest 4 to 5 times its weight in other foods which may be in your stomach. Thus, a few minutes after drinking, Ovaltine is turning itself and all other foods into rich, red blood.

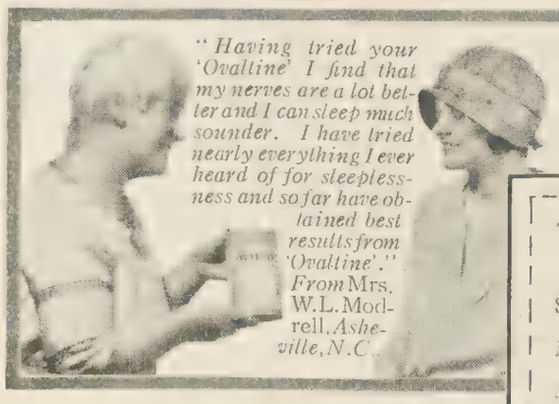
There is quick restoration for your tired mind and body. Frayed nerves are soothed. Restful sleep comes.

In the morning you awaken, looking and feeling years younger. You are a new being for a new day. You are alive with energy to carry you buoyantly through the day.

Hospitals and doctors recommend it

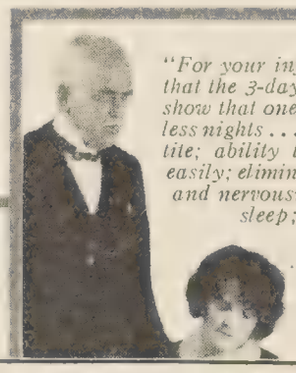
Ovaltine is a delightful pure food drink. It has been used in Switzerland for 30 years and is now in universal use in England and its colonies. During the great war Ovaltine was included as a standard war ration for invalid soldiers.

A few years ago Ovaltine was introduced into this country. Today it is used in hundreds of hospitals. More than 20,000 leading physicians know and recommend it not only as a restorative but also for nursing mothers, convalescents, invalids, backward children and the aged.



Many take a cup of Ovaltine two or three times a day for its natural stimulation. It's truly a "pick-up" drink.

A 3-day Test



Drug stores sell Ovaltine in 4 sizes for home use. But to let you try it we will send a 3-day introductory package for 10 cents to cover cost of packing and mailing. Just send in the coupon with 10 cents in stamps.

OVALTINE

Builds Brain, Nerves and Body

"Having tried your 'Ovaltine' I find that my nerves are a lot better and I can sleep much sounder. I have tried nearly everything I ever heard of for sleeplessness and so far have obtained best results from 'Ovaltine'." From Mrs. W. L. Modrell, Asheville, N. C.

"For your information I will say that the 3-day trial can proved to show that one can overcome sleepless nights . . . I have a better appetite; ability to concentrate more easily; elimination of tired feeling and nervousness; a better night's sleep; able to rise without hesitation for another day's work." Letter from Mr. Ernest W. Giese, Houston, Texas.

ASK THE DELINEATOR

We are glad to offer our readers the following services; and we hope they will have no hesitation in consulting our department experts on any personal or household problem. Be sure (1) to address your inquiry to THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y.; (2) to give us your return address; (3) to enclose the cost of the pamphlet or other literature (in each case a minimum amount fixed to cover cost of printing and postage)

Babies and Children—THE DELINEATOR offers mothers a unique program in child health. Besides the articles published every month there are four "Happy Baby Clubs" which mothers may join. These are under the direction of Dr. Henry L. K. Shaw and are told about every month on the Happy Child page.

In addition, THE DELINEATOR presents a series of pamphlets which were written during the time that the late Dr. L. Emmett Holt was director of the Happy Child Department. These pamphlets were prepared under the direction of this most eminent of child specialists and were written, some by him and others by his distinguished associates. They cost only ten cents each and treat the following subjects: "The Expectant Mother and the New Baby," "The General Care of the Baby," "Maternal Nursing," "Artificial Feeding," "Diet Problems of Childhood," "Early Childhood," "The Child's Teeth," "The School Child," "The Mental Health of the Child," "Three Dread Diseases of Childhood," "Play, Eyes and Movies" and "Correct Posture."

If you would like to have the first seven of these in durable and attractive book form, you should purchase "The Happy Baby," which costs one dollar.

Then there is the "Baby's Record Book," which has been proven most popular. It is nicely bound, and is very complete with charts on which to record the little one's growth and health, and blank pages for remarks and photographs. This costs one dollar.

Home-making—This department has a score of leaflets that will help you to systematize, simplify and improve your housekeeping. Write for a list of them. And remember that you can ask any question that troubles you concerning household management. Always send a self-addressed, stamped envelope for reply.

Building and Decoration—If you want to build, write for pictures of all Donn Barber's model houses, costing you only two cents for return postage. Then for one dollar you may order a print of floor-plans and elevations of the house you decide upon.

Ask Mrs. Sanders, the editor of this department, about furnishing and decorating (not more than five questions at one time, please). Be sure to give dimensions, exposure and full description of rooms—and a two-cent stamp for reply.

Special bulletins, "Good Floors," "Curtains and Draperies," "Walls, Woodwork and Ceilings," "Furnishing the Home," "How to Choose, Frame and Hang Your Pictures," "How to Know Good Furniture" and a new one, just prepared, called "Methods of Painting Furniture," may be had for twenty-five cents each.

Beauty—The beauty editor will answer personal questions and send complimentary folders on the care of skin, hands and hair, or lotions and cosmetics. Tell us which you want—and enclose postage at rate of two cents for two folders.

Health—This department has just published a booklet called "Reducing in Spots," by Dr. Lillian E. Shaw, who is a doctor as well as an expert in physical training. In addition to scientific exercises for reducing different parts of the body, this booklet includes a number of special exercises for correcting body faults. The price is twenty-five cents.

Etiquette—A new booklet called "Table Hospitality" gives explicit directions for setting the table for formal and informal meals and for entertaining with and without a maid. This is ten cents, and Mrs. John Cabot Kimberley will answer any personal quandary or send instructive leaflets on the various phases of etiquette, such as "Courtesies of To-day between Men and Women," "Introductions, Invitations and Replies," "Entertaining," "Travel," "House Weddings," "Etiquette at the Table," "Letter-Writing," "Calls and the Use of Cards." These cost nothing but the postage, which is estimated at two cents for two folders.

Entertainment—Do not hesitate to ask us about any entertainment that you may be planning. We have many interesting suggestions to offer you. Among the most timely are "A Perfect Circus," "A Class-Day Banquet" and "Will Shakespeare Class Day," newer than it sounds. Send only two-cent stamped, self-addressed envelope for reply.

TO BE OR NOT TO BE—THIN

By Flora Rose

Director, New York State College of Home Economics, Cornell University

You remember old Cæsar with his "Give me men that are fat." For the sake of your health and appearance, consider your weight, and don't be a "lean Cassius." If you are underweight read this article and then write to the Home-Making Department, THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and ask for the additional information we have prepared. We shall be glad to send you suggested menus, exercises, and rules for correct living if you want to increase your weight. But please send two cents to cover return postage

BEING too thin is one of the commonest difficulties brought to the door of the dietitian with a request for assistance. Often it is accompanied by the statement: "And I've drunk just quarts of milk trying to gain a few pounds."

Underweight is not by any means altogether a problem of diet. The person who is underweight is often one who is ambiguously described as "not being free to gain."

This may mean that there is some evident handicap which interferes equally with gaining or growing, such as diseased and enlarged tonsils, masses of adenoid tissue or infected teeth. Or there may be some obscure physical cause which can not be easily located. Sometimes a mental conflict of which the individual is unconscious, but which keeps him in a continual state of nervous tension, is to blame, or else some unrevealed focus of infection is responsible.

In any case the first thing to do if one be sufficiently underweight to be troubled by it, is to sit down with the situation and see if it be possible to determine the cause. Having done this, the next step is to go about removing the cause. Those who are underweight because of faulty food habits or faulty health habits are the only ones whom the dietitian is prepared to assist.

If underweight be due to faulty food habits, it may be ascribed to several things. For example, some underweights lack sufficient appetite to encourage them to eat as much food as is needed both to support activity and to increase weight. In this case, the solution may lie in selecting foods for their appetite-stimulating quality, thus building up a desire for larger quantities of food.

It is an interesting truth that with lack of appetite and a small consumption of food, goes a small stomach capacity for food. As appetite increases, and as the amount of food eaten each meal increases, the capacity of the stomach for food increases. This increased size of the stomach then reacts to increase the desire for food, because a full stomach gives its possessor real comfort.

With other underweights, the amount of activity may be out of all proportion to their structural ability to hold the food required to support that activity and at the same time

Few things are easier to make than good mayonnaise.

Wesson Oil and a fresh egg—beaten together and seasoned to taste—and you have a mayonnaise you'll be proud of!

Quickest results are obtained if the oil and egg are not too cold. The ordinary temperature of your kitchen is just right.

Break the egg in a bowl—

Add about a tablespoon of Wesson Oil.

Beat vigorously with an egg beater or a fork—until the oil and egg are thoroughly mixed. How long will that take? Perhaps while you count fifty—not as fast as you can count but as fast as you can beat.

Add another tablespoon of oil and beat again—vigorously. Two tablespoons and beat again. Two or three more and beat again.

Your mayonnaise will begin to thicken a little.

Then add Wesson Oil four or five tablespoons at a time, beating well after each addition—until your mayonnaise is as thick and stiff as you want it. The more oil you beat into it the thicker your mayonnaise will be—about two cupfuls is the usual amount. [Never add more than a quarter cupful of oil at any one time.]

After your mayonnaise is made, add seasoning. Mix a half teaspoon of salt, a teaspoon each of sugar and mustard, a generous pinch each of paprika and red pepper—add a tablespoon of lemon juice or vinegar and stir until the salt and sugar are dissolved—then pour into the mayonnaise and beat well.

increase the weight. This means that to increase the eating of food to the point where such activity can be maintained may prove impossible to accomplish. The advice to this group is to increase the time given to sleep or to physical relaxation and rest.

Then there are the underweights who have appetite and who are at work on the problem of trying to gain, but who do not know what foods to select as a basis for gaining weight. The directions to be given to this group will help to meet the needs of the others as well.

First—Stimulate the appetite by a judicious inclusion of foods which possess stimulating properties. Succulent vegetables are particularly good. Breads and breakfast food containing the outer layers and germ of the grain, and made with an abundance of yeast are also good; and soups are invaluable.

Secondly—Always supply the needed abundance of those foods that are required to maintain any individual at his best, before adding other foods. These are: a quart of milk a day for the child, and a pint for the adult; a serving of meat a day for the adult and older child; an egg or a piece of cheese a day; two vegetables a day, other than potatoes, one of these preferably a green vegetable and as often as possible served raw, as in the case of cabbage, lettuce, celery; two fruits a day, and one of these an orange or a tomato, a piece of grapefruit, or some lemon-juice; and breads and breakfast foods to include, in so far as practicable, the germ and outer layers of the cereal grains.

Thirdly—After the day's diet has been planned to include the foods mentioned under "secondly," then and only then should the problem of weight-gaining be considered. Now it is a safe plan to reinforce the diet in weight-gaining foods. This is where the person who has drunk quarts of milk a day, and failed to gain in weight, finds the explanation. Gains in weight, for those free to gain, are accomplished when the individual spends in his activities each day less energy than the food for that day has supplied. It is a balance problem.

Milk, valuable as it is, should not be too largely depended upon to bring up the day's food on this basis. It is too dilute an energy food. This becomes evident when we show that it would require about four quarts of milk a day to meet the energy-need of the average adult living an inactive life. So when adapting milk to a weight-gaining program, use it to the limit of its value—that is, up to but no more than, a quart a day for either child or adult. After that point has been reached, more concentrated foods should take its place.

With the right basic dietary of milk, fruit, vegetables, eggs, cheese, and meat well established, the way to gain in weight is to study each meal and to plan to hide in it increased amounts of foods which are concentrated, that is, which have high energy values.

For example, at breakfast eat fruit with a little added cream; butter the toast more generously than usual; eat an extra piece of toast; or include marmalade with the meal. At lunch eat an extra piece of bread well buttered. At the close of the meal eat a piece of candy, or better a tablespoon of salted nuts.

At dinner eat with meat some tart jelly or preserve in place of pickles. Have a dessert that combines fruit and cream. Eat an extra piece of bread well buttered. When the vegetables are cooked, season well with fat. This is one of the ways fat can be included without causing digestive upsets.

A little ingenuity will soon show how to increase energy values in meals almost without the consumer being conscious that this has been done.

When the underweight person begins to put on flesh, every effort should be made at the same time to insure the good quality of that flesh by a correct background diet, such as has already been described, by right habits of exercising out-of-doors, and by sufficient periods of rest.

A tablespoon of cod-liver oil a day is the best possible accompaniment to the foods suggested; since it will aid in making a normal disposition in the body of some of the substances supplied in the food. With slight modifications, these dietary directions will apply to children as well as to adults.

ASK US

Ask us anything you want to know about housekeeping and we will answer it personally. From our recent correspondence we publish the following questions and answers as being of general interest to all home-makers

QUESTION—My little girl, who is six years old, is underweight. I have just taken her to the doctor, who tells me she is perfectly well but that she is too active for the amount she eats. Her appetite is small. Can you tell me how to improve it?

Answer—There are two things for you to do. First, improve the appetite, and second, increase the rest periods of the child. The appetite may be stimulated by giving the child a glass of fruit-juice and a cracker in the middle of the morning and again in the middle of the afternoon. In addition to this, give her a carefully cooked green vegetable each day and a serving of some other vegetable. As far as possible, give her whole-wheat bread and whole-grain breakfast foods. Fruits, vegetables, whole grains and the yeast in bread are all appetite stimulating.

Question—Is the water in which vegetables are cooked any good?

Answer—In so far as possible, every bit of water in which vegetables have been cooked should be served with the vegetable or used in soups or gravies. This is because the minerals in vegetables soak out into the water in which they are cooked and an important nutrient is often poured down the drain. One of the ways to increase iron in the diet is to use the water in which vegetables have been cooked, or steam or bake the vegetable to prevent loss of iron.

Question—Why are starches and sugars fattening when they contain no fat?

Answer—This is because if more sugar or starch is eaten each day than is needed as fuel to keep the body warm or help it do its work, it is finally stored by the body as fat.

Question—How may I make my dark kitchen light and cheerful?

Answer—Two things need to be done to such a kitchen. First, it needs to have, if possible, more windows, or to have glass put in the upper part of the door, or to have the windows raised closer to the ceiling. Second, it needs to be painted with some color which will seem to bring light into the kitchen. White and cream color, with a little orange added, will do this.

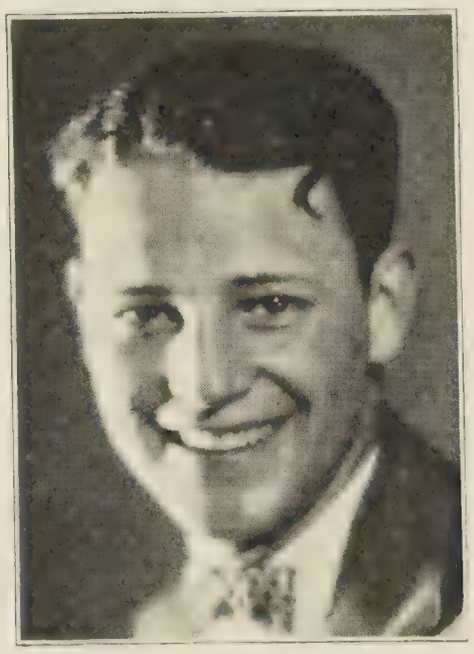
Question—Please give me a recipe for fresh blueberry muffins.

Answer—:

¼ cup fat
¼ cup sugar
2 eggs
1 cup milk
2 cups flour
4 teaspoons baking-powder
¼ teaspoon salt
1 cup blueberries

Cream fat and sugar. Add beaten eggs and milk. Add all but one-quarter cup of flour mixed and sifted with the baking-powder and salt. Mix the blueberries with the remaining flour and fold into the batter. Bake in small, well-greased gem-pans or in well-greased layer-cake or pie tins.

Question—How can I reheat rolls and biscuit and keep them from drying out?



Answer—Put them into a paper bag, fasten the bag and put it into a moderate oven (350 degrees to 400 degrees Fahrenheit) for ten or fifteen minutes or until the bag begins to get a little darker brown. The rolls or biscuit will be almost like fresh baked products.

Cloudy teeth—dull teeth

How to make them whiter—quickly

The new way world's dental authorities advise. What to do

THOSE whiter teeth that you envy. Don't think that they are beyond you. You can now lighten dull and dingy teeth—make them gleam and glisten.

Modern science has discovered a new way. A method different in formula, action and effect from any you have ever used. This offers you a test. Simply use the coupon; it brings free a 10-day tube.

Look for film on your teeth—that's the cause. How to combat it

Look at your teeth. If dull, cloudy, run your tongue across them. You will feel a film. That's the cause of the trouble. You must fight it.

Film is that viscous coat which you feel. It clings to teeth, gets into crevices and stays. It hides the natural luster of your teeth.

It also holds food substance which ferments and causes acid. In contact with teeth, this acid invites decay. Millions of germs breed in it. And they, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

So dingy teeth mean more than loss of good appearance. They may indicate danger, grave danger to your teeth.

New methods now that mean greater tooth beauty plus better protection from tooth troubles

Ordinary tooth pastes were unable to cope adequately with that film. Not one could effectively combat it. Harsh grit tended to injure the enamel. Soap and chalk were inadequate.

Now modern dental science has found new combatants. Their action is to curdle film and then harmlessly remove it. They are embodied in a new-type tooth paste called Pepsodent—a scientific method that is changing the tooth cleaning habits of some 50 different nations.

Don't you think it worth while to try it for 10 days; then to note results yourself?

Your Whole Appearance Depends Upon Your Hair

Without beautiful, well-kept hair, you can never be really attractive.

Soft, silky hair is the most ALLURING CHARM any woman can possess. It makes the plainest features appear soft and sweet.

Fortunately, beautiful hair is no longer a matter of luck. You, too, can have beautiful hair if you shampoo it properly.

PROPER shampooing is what makes your hair soft and silky. It brings out all the real life and lustre, all the natural wave and color and leaves it fresh-looking, glossy and bright.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why thousands of women, everywhere, now use Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product brings out all the real beauty of the hair and cannot possibly injure. It does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method.

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, wet the hair and scalp in clear, warm water. Then apply a little Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, give the hair a good rinsing. Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before. After the final washing, rinse the hair and scalp in at least two changes of clear, fresh, warm water. This is very important.

Just Notice the Difference

YOU will notice the difference in your hair even before it is dry, for it will be delightfully soft and silky. The entire mass, even while wet, will feel loose, fluffy and light to the touch and be so clean it will fairly squeak when you pull it through your fingers.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find your hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being much thicker and heavier than it really is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage.

You can get Mulsified cocoanut oil shampoo at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months.

BETTER HEALTH CLUBS FOR WOMEN

the hips or shoulders to sway from side to side. Every movement of the whole body should be straight forward.

Always keep the chest expanded forward, rather than upward, when walking. Be sure to take full deep breaths with each step, so that plenty of oxygen is taken into the lungs, and breathe with the mouth closed. The length of the walk should be gradually increased with each succeeding trip until it covers from eight to ten miles.

Although no other activity is quite so universally applicable as walking, there are many more strenuous sports from which excellent programs can be selected.

Golf and tennis appeal throughout the Spring, Summer and Fall. Any group of women can easily combine to form a tennis club, and provide interesting, healthful and stimulating exercise for six or seven months of the year, or all the year round in those kindly climes where there is no "closed season" for the brassie or racquet.

Most cities have municipal tennis-courts and many are now providing municipal golf-grounds. But almost any group of women can construct a tennis-court of their own. A thoroughly serviceable court is expensive, but its usefulness would soon compensate for the expense. For all-round use the concrete court is perhaps the best. Once built it requires practically no attention and is always in condition to be used; of course, other courts can be constructed at a smaller initial cost. They will, however, require much more attention to keep in condition. Furthermore, a considerable time is required for them to dry after a rain.

Precaution is necessary, when playing on concrete courts, not to blister the feet. To prevent this trouble, tennis players should wear heavy stockings; or if preferred a woolen sock covering only the foot can be worn under a light stocking. In addition it is wise to wear heavy rubber or crêpe-soled shoes.

Golf is an excellent game for women, since it combines wholesome outdoor exercise with pleasant social relations.

THE ideal Summer sport, in addition to golf and tennis, is swimming. Perhaps there is no sport more suited to a woman's needs than swimming. This activity calls into play every part of the body in such a way as to develop smooth rolling muscles. In addition, a brisk plunge serves as an ideal tonic to the circulatory system, especially if it be in salt water.

Canoeing and boating have an important part in Summer activities. Rowing is especially delightful in the evening under a Summer moon. Nothing is more beautiful than to glide silently across a star-mirrored lake in a still, graceful canoe.

Along with swimming and canoeing, go picnicking and beach excursions. Whenever possible these should be planned far away from the popular resorts where the commercial amusements and throngs of people crowd out any chance for wholesome activity.

When it is very hot and there is little desire for venturing into the sun, a lively interest can frequently be maintained in croquet. This game lends itself to warm weather, because it calls for only mild activity, and because it can usually be enjoyed in a cool spot under the shade of trees.

What is true of croquet is true also of archery and quoits. Many women become most enthusiastic over these ancient pastimes. They require but little equipment and afford splendid rivalry.

In the Summer volley ball is great fun out of doors on a plat of grass or on clean sand. The only equipment necessary is a volley ball, a net, two upright posts or trees to hold the net, and a level piece of ground. The playing space should be approximately thirty by sixty feet, but it may well be smaller. Normally a team consists of six players, but the game lends itself readily to varying numbers. Any number from three to ten can easily play on each team.

Perhaps the Winter months see a greater neglect of wholesome outdoor exercise than any other season. Yet there are many invigorating and delightful Winter exercises. In northern climates there is no better Winter sport than skating. It is one of the most ideal forms of exercise for women, and a pleasure one is never too old to enjoy. Figure skating, especially, combines grace, poise and skill.

Snow-shoeing and skiing are somewhat more strenuous, but are sports greatly enjoyed by women in some localities. One of the most active ski clubs in the country is in Denver, Colorado. The club has a membership of two hundred and fifty and owns ten acres of land and a complete club house. There are occasional public exhibitions, but most of the time the course is held for the enjoyment of the members. Both men and women belong, and skiing parties have become very popular. On a splendid hillside where snow is found from late October till March, are two take-offs for jumping, one for the beginner and one for the accomplished performer. As a result of this parent club several others have been formed in the vicinity of Denver, where nature specially favors this sport.

In Minneapolis the Municipal Play-ground Department has established thirty neighborhood skating-rinks, two toboggan slides, five official, lighted hockey-rinks, two ski slides, one official, speed skating-rink, and one official, figure skating-rink.

What Minneapolis has done other cities can do for activities suitable to their climates. All this will make the program of outdoor activity easier. But whether the municipality supplies the facilities or not, the club-women can themselves provide all they need for wholesome, pleasant and beneficial exercise.

IN ALL outdoor activities dress plays an important part—especially in Winter sport. Vivid blues and reds and yellows that everyday garb forbids have an important place in the dress for Winter sports. Also costumes of all white, or white with black trimming are appropriate and frequently very attractive. Colors, however, are also very popular. Full skirts of bright plaids are excellent with a white or colored sweater or jacket.

The blanket coat, white or gray or colored, is still the popular garment for the snow-shoer, with woolen toque and sash and mittens of some bright contrasting shade.

Skiers must keep clear of loose, flowing garments. A closely-woven wool sweater, knickers and a shirt coat are appropriate.

For any physical activity, Winter or Summer, all dress should be sufficiently loose to permit free play of all muscles. There should be no binding or cramping of any kind.

With skating and hiking, kodaking, snow-shoeing and skiing in the Winter; with golf, tennis, riding and hiking in the Fall; with swimming, picnicking, boating, croquet, archery, quoits, volley ball, tennis and golf in the Summer; with nature study, kodaking, golf, tennis and driving in the Spring—no club need lack for interesting programs for any time during the year.

There remain also a variety of programs that can be worked out in gymnasia, preferably under trained leaders. Formal calisthenics, folk-dancing, natural dancing, gymnastics, mass games, and many other activities known to any leader of gymnastic classes are well suited to the needs of women. Volley ball, basket-throwing, archery, keep-away and other competitive games can be employed to advantage. It is simpler, however, and more wholesome and better fun to follow the outdoor programs through their respective seasons.

My suggestion for getting a program started in this: At the next meeting of your club, find out which of the women enjoy the same sort of sport that you do. Get five or six to agree to spend an afternoon hiking or swimming or playing tennis with you. Make it a weekly affair. Go out of your way to enjoy the afternoon to the limit. Soon you will find others wanting to join you. Still others who may not be interested in your particular line of recreation will find that they, too, have kindred spirits, and it will not be long before they will form a group to enjoy some other set of activities. If you have enough enthusiasm and zest you will soon have your whole club doing something. Try it! You will add years to your life, color to your cheeks, vigor to your body and brain, and the beauty that comes with perfect health—to say nothing of doing the same for your friends, and of enjoying a glorious good time.

IDEAL BOILERS AND AMERICAN RADIATORS FOR EVERY HEATING NEED

¶ Many a woman has found herself in this distressing situation. Do you know how to avert it?

And the pity of it is it need never have happened

ALL her time and money and work gone for nothing! The dress was ruined—its pretty color faded and streaked in a single washing. If she had only made it of Everfast—it could even have been boiled, without fading it a particle.

For, Everfast fabrics are fast to washing and boiling, fast to the strongest soaps and washing powders, fast to sunlight, fast to perspiration, fast to everything. That is the tremendously satisfactory thing about Everfast—it is fast color under all conditions.

Reproduction of Everfast and ordinary wash fabrics before and after being boiled with washing soda. Note there is not the slightest change in the color of Everfast.

So sure are we of this, that every Everfast fabric is sold under the following guarantee:

If any Everfast Wash Fabric fades, for any reason whatsoever, we will refund through your dealer, not only the purchase price of the material, but all making costs of the garment as well.

And you have such lovely Everfast fabrics from which to choose! Exquisite voiles, linens, ginghams (plain and checked), suitings, poplins, broadcloths and other smart weaves, many exclusive to Everfast.

They are suitable for frocks and gowns of every kind and for every occasion—garden parties, teas, sports, street wear, house and porch dresses—and even for lingerie too. And they are just as appropriate for children's clothes, for dress-up, school or play.

You'll love the colors, of which there is a wide, wide range. Soft blues and browns and those of the deeper tones, gorgeous hues of yellow and gold, lavenders, orchids, rose and pink—and others too numerous to name.

Everfast Wash Fabrics cost but a trifle more than ordinary cotton materials. And yet how much more they give you! This year, make all your clothes of Everfast—the fabrics that will not fade. Your favorite store probably sells Everfast Wash Fabrics and ready-made apparel of Everfast. If not, write us and we will direct you to one who does.

Look for the name Everfast on the selvage. N. Erlanger, Blumgart & Co., Inc., 354 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

WHAT THE "DUCTLESS GLANDS" ARE

On the other hand, children who have very small or defective pituitary glands may develop in an entirely different way. They remain dwarflike in stature, have small heads, hands and feet, and show an excessive obesity. There is defective development of their generative organs, and the mind remains childlike even late in life.

TURNING to the suprarenal glands, it has been found that when they have been largely destroyed by tuberculosis or by tumor growth, the patients become of a bronze color and exhibit profound muscular weakness; moreover their blood pressure falls to a low level. This condition is known as "Addison's disease."

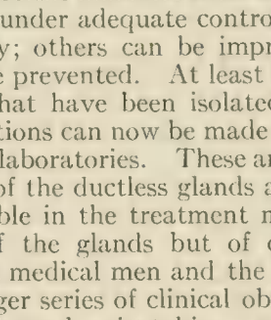
There are two parts to the suprarenal gland, namely (1) the marrow of the gland (which produces epinephrin or adrenalin, a substance that raises blood pressure by contracting the small arteries, but relaxes spasm of the bronchi and is accordingly a valuable remedy in asthma), and (2) the rind or outer covering of the gland, which has an entirely different function from that of the marrow of the gland.

Children with tumors of this rind of the suprarenal gland may become profoundly altered; thus, if the disease of the gland occurs before birth, changes in the organs take place that make it difficult for the layman to tell whether the child is a boy or a girl, but if the disease develop during infancy the child may undergo at the third or fourth year the maturing process that ordinarily occurs at the age of twelve or fourteen, a change known as "premature puberty."

Tumors of the outer covering of the gland occurring in later life are often accompanied by abnormal growth of hair over the body (hirsutism); the "whiskered woman" of the circus and the so-called "dog-faced man" are believed to have been examples of such disorder.

Space will not permit of a description of all the conditions now known to be associated with disorders of the several ductless glands in infancy and childhood, but it may merely be mentioned (1) that sudden death occurring during slight accidents or minor surgical operations is often due to the existence of an abnormal thymus gland; (2) that the spasm disease known as "tetany" (not "tetanus") occurs when there is insufficiency of the parathyroid glands; and (3) that the whole bodily and mental state of a person (or of an animal) is profoundly affected by excision of the sex glands or by destructive disease of the same in early life, as we know from the study of human eunuchs, and as every farmer has well learned, since the difference between the docile ox and the unruly bull depends upon early excision of these glands in the former and their undisturbed function in the latter.

ENOUGH has been said above, perhaps, to permit the layman entirely untrained in medicine to understand that gross disturbances of the glands under discussion may be of very grave significance for the developing child. No person acquainted with the facts just referred to can fail to be interested in the progress of knowledge in this domain. For in the growth of knowledge lies the hope, on one hand, of preventing such disturbances from occurring, and, on the other, of curing the patients or reducing their sufferings once they have occurred.



But thus far the methods of prevention of diseases of the ductless galnds, of their cure, and of bettering of the symptoms they produce, are far less advanced than we should like them to be. Many laymen seem to think that knowledge of the ductless glands is more definite than it really is. The idea has got abroad that almost any serious or obscure disease in a child may be due to a "disorder of a ductless gland" or to an "endocrine imbalance," and that if only the "guilty gland" can be detected and "suitable glandular therapy" be inaugurated, all will be well with the child!

The prevalence of this idea is exceedingly unfortunate, for in countless instances it has raised false hopes that later had to be shattered, causing intense disappointment to those who had been over-expectant. Physicians, and especially consultants, are ever being besieged by parents who bring epileptic or hopelessly feeble-minded children to them with a piteous appeal for "gland diagnosis" and remedial "gland intervention."

High-minded, conscientious physicians are doing what they can to educate the public to their limitations in this field and to protect anxious parents from exploitation by quacks and by ignorant, deluded, or unscrupulous vendors of endocrine products. Even in cases in which the maladies are really of endocrine origin, the treatment that can be successfully applied in the present state of medical knowledge is relatively limited.

Some endocrine maladies there are that can be brought under adequate control by scientific therapy; others can be improved, and some can be prevented. At least two active principles that have been isolated from internal secretions can now be made artificially in chemical laboratories. These and extracts from some of the ductless glands are exceedingly valuable in the treatment not only of disorders of the glands but of other maladies. But medical men and the laity must await a longer series of clinical observations, and of prolonged painstaking researches in experimental laboratories, before much success can be expected in either the prevention or cure of the majority of endocrine disorders. What is needed now is more money, and more well-trained scientists, for the prosecution of original research in this field.

Fame and the gratitude of mankind will be well deserved by the scientific inquirer who will make the discovery of another endocrine product or principle commensurate in importance with the discovery of pituitrin, of insulin, of epinephrin or of thyroxin. And the satisfaction to be derived from endowing scientific research, of building and equipping laboratories and of manning them with suitably trained investigators, should not be overlooked by those in a position to make large gifts for the benefit of mankind.

"I'm to frow the rice." He held up the bag. "Soon as it's all done, mammy says I kin frow the rice." And off he danced again down the garden path toward the front door.

"Soon as it's all done." The words echoed in Richard's ears as he followed Ellen up on the porch. He was too dazed, too completely lost in a whirl of emotion, to do more than follow.

JUST inside the doorway he paused, arrested by the sound of familiar voices. On the left, the parlors were already buzzing with guests, relatives for the most part, early assembled for the ceremony. But on the right the sitting-room was empty—since the ceremony was to be performed at its arched doorway—save for two men, whose voices had challenged Richard's attention. One was Blaise Drummond, with sleek black head and eyes too close together. Richard had not seen him since that day in Europe when he had given him Washington's formal instructions to return home at once. And with Drummond was Mardak, who had crossed the ocean, so he had informed the State Department the day before, to find this man Drummond and put certain questions to him.

Ellen it was who relieved the embarrassment of their recognition. She advanced to Blaise with the reminder that he must remember her brother, Richard. Then she awaited his flushed and uncomfortable presentation of Mardak.

"How very nice," she said cordially. "The relatives have been much disturbed that Blaise was so apparently friendless, not even a best man that he could call his own. Of

Prevent tooth decay below the gum-line

As the soil nourishes the tree roots, the gums nourish the teeth. And as the tree decays if you bare the roots, so do the teeth decay when gum shrinkage starts in. This condition—one of the first stages of Pyorrhea—is very common and something that ordinary tooth pastes are powerless to prevent. If not checked promptly, it will lead to loss of teeth and serious organic diseases.

Forhan's Checkmates Pyorrhea

If used in time and used consistently twice daily, Forhan's will prevent pyorrhea or check its progress. It will preserve the gums in their pink, normal, healthy condition, safeguard your health and keep your mouth clean, fresh and wholesome.

Forhan's is more than a tooth paste; it checks Pyorrhea. Thousands have found it beneficial for years. For your own sake ask for Forhan's For the Gums. All druggists, 35c and 60c in tubes.

course you are standing up with him, Mr. Mardak? I was about to offer him Richard."

And while Mardak was giving courteous if amused consent, Richard found time to wonder if Ellen realized the position she was forcing upon Drummond. It must have been apparent even to the casual onlooker that it was not a friendly conversation they had broken in upon. Well, whether Ellen suspected or not—and she was capable of just this sort of deviltry—she had not added to the groom's happiness.

"You two will have to change quickly," the girl continued. "And Blaise, you won't mind if they use your room? The house is overflowing, you know," she added in explanation to Richard and Mardak. "Perhaps you'll take them up?"

"Sorry," Drummond muttered, his voice thick with a disturbance that even Richard could not explain. "Can't go up just yet. Follow in a minute."

Ellen it was, therefore, who piloted them. And Richard, in the big, square, old-fashioned room up-stairs, let his fingers do the duties of them while his brain repeated that Celia, his just-discovered Celia, was marrying Blaise Drummond.

"Queer, meeting you thus," Mardak interrupted his thoughts. "I can't explain to myself your presence here."

Richard told him briefly of Ellen's connection with the affair.

"Yes." The man, now that Richard's attention was called to him, appeared to survey the room with curiosity of a sort scarcely needed for mere toilet matters. "Yes. If I were your sister, I would find means to delay the wedding, say, for an hour. In that time I think Miss Celia might wish to back out of marrying Drummond."

"Back out of marrying him?" Richard, swept by a sudden wild hope, turned to find Mardak systematically searching Drummond's bureau-drawers.

"Not," he murmured, "that there is any chance to find them here."

"Mardak," Richard spoke with enforced deliberation, a habit acquired in his diplomatic service, "what do you know about Drummond that could be used to delay this wedding?"

"Nothing." The other did not pause in his search. "Nothing yet. I merely hope."

"Of course I have been given to understand," this was going farther than he had a right to go, but Richard was playing for high stakes, and he must take some risks—for Celia. If he could get information definite enough to give him grounds for action—"I know that Drummond is officially dead, has been since that affair——"

"An affair," interrupted Mardak suavely, "of which we do not speak, my friend."

Richard was impatient of delicacies that spared a woman of high birth on one side of the ocean to sacrifice another, and that Celia, here at home. "But you said that within an hour——"

"I said what I said. I can not explain. But were I a friend to Miss Celia——"

And before Richard could question him further, Drummond entered the room.

"I fear we discommode the bridegroom." Without any pretext at concealing his activities, Mardak turned from the half-open bureau drawer. "You would assist us, perhaps? I seek—well, shall we say I seek a collar-button?"

"Yes?" Blaise Drummond raised eyebrows as politely expressionless as Mardak's own. The discomfiture of the meeting downstairs was gone. The man was now master of himself, apparently of the situation. Something, it would seem, had happened to give him renewed confidence in his position. And his bearing took from Richard the half-formed determination to attempt some sort of interference.

"I think I can supply you," continued Drummond, and moved toward the highboy, where he found and offered the collar-button.

"So." Mardak slammed the open drawer. "It was not here that I should have been looking." And he made no motion to take the offered article. "Your hands are dirty, my friend."

And again Richard saw Drummond lose his composure. What was there about soiled fingers to bring color to a man's cheeks? The affair was maddening, so near did he seem to the information necessary to save Celia from impending disaster.

"So they are." Drummond moved with deliberation to the old walnut washstand by the window. "I came up to wash them." And he began pouring water into the blue china bowl.

WHAT an impossible situation! Richard knew one overpowering impulse, to have a moment alone in which to organize his confused thoughts. Abruptly he left the room. At the staircase he paused. Then, to escape the chattering groups of girls and the crowd of older relatives already gathered importantly in the front hall, he made his way to the back stairs. Here he unexpectedly met Ellen, every rose-colored ruffle fluttering with haste. She paused at sight of him.

"Richard, are you ready?" she began. Then, "Why—you look like a ghost—what on earth—are you ill?"

He avoided her anxious dark eyes and tried desperately to summon a reassuring smile. "Not a bit of it. How much longer before the wedding?" He attempted a casual tone.

"About ten minutes. You'd better find a good place to see. The hall's filling up." Ellen continued on her way to Celia.

A place to see! It was the last thing Richard wanted. Must he witness the sacrilege of Celia's wedding to Blaise Drummond? Yet how to prevent it, how even to delay it until Mardak's hinted disclosures were ready? What he knew of the State Department's attitude toward the man he might not tell. That was a question of honor between nations. As Mardak had so definitely stated, it was a matter of which no man might speak. Moreover, he doubted if his information was definite enough to get action. It might have influenced Celia's decision, it would hardly stop a wedding ceremony. What, then, was to be done? Must he stand there, silent as a shadow, and watch the woman of his dreams condemn herself unknowing— It was unbearable.

He wandered outdoors, across the edge of the old garden and back to the mulberry-tree at the side of the house, the place where he had first seen Celia. It was very still. A subdued hum of voices floated out to him from the open side door, where the pointed leaves of the clematis vine clustered and twined up to the small balcony above. The daffodil sky was paling. Early twilight wrapped the garden softly, like gray gauze. The perfume of the dew-drenched lilacs, delicate yet poignantly sweet as remembered happiness, filled the air.

He could not endure it here. He hurried across the thick young grass and made his way stumblingly up the three steps into the side hall. To his momentary relief he found it quite unoccupied. The guests were sitting or standing either in the wide front hall or in the open doorways of the rooms facing the broad staircase down which the wedding-party would come. Every point of vantage was filled.

So, thankful for the semiobscurity of the candle-lit side passage, Richard took up his stand in the shadow of the curving stairs. Here he could at least watch Celia unobserved, here his own desperate unhappiness need not be revealed to the crowd.

FROM the depths of the parlor the musicians veered into the wedding-march. There began the vibrant whisperings that announce the entrance of a wedding-party, followed by the usual hushed silence. Richard, looking up, caught the first glimpse of her at the turn of the stairs, a drifting cloud of white, coming slowly, slowly, on her father's arm.

Already Drummond with Mardak beside him waited at the arched doorway of the sitting-room. Now she was crossing the platform, Ellen's rose-colored ruffles close behind her. Celia paused for a barely perceptible second. Did real or fancied reluctance make her lilting steps so slow? Now he could see plainly the sweep of dark lashes hiding her eyes. Not so would he have had her come to him, as if hesitant—doubtful. But she would never come to him. Celia—Celia. It was meant that she should. He knew it with the sureness of spiritual revelation.

The dangerous toast-and-coffee breakfast

THE meagre breakfast, hastily eaten, is becoming a national bad habit. We may not need the amount of food our ancestors ate. But we need more real nourishment. For in this age of intensive work we use up considerably more nervous energy. Therefore, if your appetite dictates a small breakfast, be sure the food you eat contains the vital elements of nourishment you must have.

A single serving of this tempting food contains more varied nourishment than many a hearty meal

NATURE demands that your body be supplied daily with a variety of food elements if it is to be properly nourished—but the modern diet rarely gives you all of them in sufficient quantities.

From an infinite number of foods, how can you select those which give you these vital elements? Unless you thoroughly understand foods and their values, it is an impossible task for you—and for millions of others. Realizing this, a man who understood food values originated Grape-Nuts.

This famous food is intentionally designed to supply vital food elements so often missing from the average modern diet. In Grape-Nuts you find the elements of vigorous good health: dextrins, maltose, and other carbohydrates for heat and energy; iron for the blood; phosphorus for the bones and teeth; proteins for muscle and body-building; and the essential Vitamin B—a builder of the appetite! Eaten with milk or cream, Grape-Nuts is an admirably balanced ration.

Grape-Nuts is an appetizing food—small, crisp kernels composed of two healthful grains, wheat and malted barley. The delicious flavors of these golden grains are brought out with a richness unmatched in any other food. That is why Grape-Nuts, with cream or whole milk, is a favorite breakfast dish in millions of American homes. Buy a package today.

Try this delicious food tomorrow morning. Two tablespoonfuls are ample for a serving. Taste the crisp, nut-like flavor. And know that this very crispness is beneficial to you, for it gives your teeth and gums exercise. Your dentist will tell you that exercise is necessary to keep teeth beautiful and healthy.

Even the way Grape-Nuts is prepared—by a special baking process—adds to the healthfulness of this delicious food by making it easy to digest.

Grape-Nuts is one of the Post Health Products, which include also Instant Postum, Postum Cereal, Post Toasties (Double-thick Corn Flakes), and Post's Bran Flakes.

A series of health breakfasts — with four servings of Grape-Nuts free!

Mail the coupon below and we will send you four individual packages of Grape-Nuts free—enough for four breakfasts. We will also send you "A Book of Better Breakfasts," containing menus for a series of delightful health breakfasts—and written by a former physical director of Cornell Medical College who is known as America's foremost conditioner of men and women. Follow these menus and form the habit of healthful breakfasts.

A word of five letters that means fifty-seven

When you think of pickles you think of Heinz, but when you think of Heinz do you think only of pickles?

Do you realize that it is the Heinz way of preparing foods that has made Heinz Pickles a great table delicacy? And that this Heinz way applies to all of the Fifty-seven Varieties of good things to eat?

Heinz Pickles are raised from seeds developed by Heinz and grown in favored localities under Heinz supervision. Heinz pickling plants are so located that the cucumbers are salted the day they are picked. The vinegar used is Heinz-made and the spices are blended by experts and ground in Heinz mills.

This care, this effort, this control of every process from seed to the final preparation and packing, is not peculiar to Heinz Pickles. It is the Heinz way of making each of the fifty-seven so that you can be assured of flavor, quality, and purity in every food you buy bearing the Heinz label.

And Mardak said he needed only one hour. Ten steps more and she would be at the foot of the stairs. Drummond—wanted in Washington, wanted in Europe.

She must not reach the bottom of that stairway. Anything to delay her! Before his eyes gleamed the silver shoes. He moved closer to the banisters. Eight more steps. Again, as if to mock his despair, the song echoed in his heart:

"Silver Shoon, did you steal from the moon?"

Such fairy feet, so slender, so small. Now they were poised for the next step. Now—now—swiftly, almost without conscious volition, his hand shot between the banisters, closed on the tiny, lifted heel of the slipper nearest him. A deft twitch and it was off, completely concealed in his pocket. Only the sharp edge of the rhinestone buckle pricking his palm convinced him that this was reality and not the maze of an incredible dream. He shrank back deeper into the shadows. Celia stopped in her descent, stood a moment absolutely still. The wedding was halted.

"Why—" For a moment Richard's heart misgave him, so surprised, so dismayed, so bewildered was Celia. The soft strains of the wedding-march continued to float up from the parlor below. The bridesmaids huddled down upon each other, startled at the break in the regularity of their march. Impatiently the dignified, white-haired father of the bride turned to her, feeling the tug on his arm, interrupted most unwillingly in his stately descent. Beneath the arch where the groom stood, attended by the sardonic, graceful Mardak, there was an answering stir of uneasiness. Richard saw the impatient, anxious glance which Drummond gave Celia.

And then his ears caught a signal that all was well. For Celia giggled. A small giggle, almost imperceptible, nervous perhaps—but was he imagining when he thought he caught a note of relief in it as well?

He glanced up at her, standing poised, one foot tucked up out of sight beneath the hem of her dress, one hand still on her father's arm, the other on the stair-rail to steady herself, unable to proceed, equally embarrassed to explain the cause of the delay. Did he fancy that her eyes met his in that instant? One thing only he knew. She had not taken that next downward step. For the moment at least the march was stayed, the groom waited, but the bride——

"My slipper," he heard her gasp. And again that catch of laughter in her throat. "I've lost my slipper."

Her father turned indignant eyes upon her.

"Celia! What is it?" Ellen, close behind her, was whispering. And again Richard's heart leaped, for Celia with dancing eyes announced:

"My slipper has fallen off! Did you ever hear anything so foolish? Some one will have to find it before the wedding can go on."

"What is it?" every upturned face in the waiting crowd seemed to echo.

"Richard"—it was Ellen who spied him—"look! Celia's slipper has dropped off. Do you see it?"

Richard bent to examine the floor with meticulous care. He scanned the stair-step. "It doesn't seem to be anywhere about," he murmured with apparent regret.

"It can't be lost!" Celia exclaimed, by this time speaking in her natural voice. "Why—it—can't be!"

Richard marveled that so simple an impulse should be so completely successful. He had thought that the only way to stop a wedding once started was to challenge the ceremony during that awesome moment when the minister said something about objectors speaking now or forever after holding their peace. But all one needed to do was to remove a bit of silver and rhinestone from a small, silk-clad foot, and the deed was done.

"Where is it?" Celia leaned far out over the banister. "It must be down there, Mr. Heath. Some one get a candle."

By this time it was evident to the watchers below that something had happened. The musicians improvised a phrase or two that would carry them back, and broke anew into the Lohengrin refrain. Mardak, with a whispered word to the obviously disturbed Drummond, moved to Richard's side.

"What is it?" he asked.

"One of my slippers is gone!" exclaimed Celia in a tone that carried above the strains of music.

"Slipper!" The exclamation came, not from Mardak, who had asked the question, but from Blaise Drummond. He left the minister to wait alone beneath the flower-decked arch while he mounted the stairs. "Slipper!" He spoke the word a second time from his place at her side, his hand on her arm, his color rising. "You can't have lost it!"

Celia looked at him curiously, and for answer extended a slim foot, slipperless.

"This is utterly absurd!" Drummond was on his knees, examining the steps, then peering over the banister at the floor below. A candle showed clearly that for a space about the stairs the polished floor was bare of any object so noticeable as a slipper.

"You can't have lost it!" He turned again to Celia, in his agitation gripping with tense fingers the arm he held.

A look of displeasure came into Celia's gray eyes, her chin lifted. "I have lost it," she said, low-voiced and calm. "And please do not hurt my arm." She moved beneath his touch as if to escape from him. "If you'll bring me another pair, Ellen?"

RICHARD had not thought of that. His heart sank. It was a simple matter for Ellen to run up-stairs and return with substitutes. He had made all this foolish fuss and had accomplished nothing.

"But I tell you you've got to find that slipper!" What was the matter with Drummond? Richard could see that he was trying to get control of himself, but the man's voice had an inflection of hysteria.

Celia was looking at him queerly, so was the whole breathless crowd. And so particularly was Mardak. There was a blazing regard in Mardak's eyes that drew Drummond's. For a moment they stood, the one on the stairs, the other below him, and beneath the look Drummond's face went from red to deadly white.

"Since the slipper seems of so much more importance to you than the wedding," said Celia, in low-toned scorn, "we'll abandon the latter and attend merely to the former. Everybody hunt."

A surge of whispering swept the curious guests, too distant to get the import of what was happening at the turn of the stairs.

With a royal wave of her hand, Celia seated herself on the step, her veil slipping back from the gleaming hair as if to free her from the thraldom which had been impending. "Go on down there and hunt," she bade Blaise Drummond.

Again Richard's heart knew the leap of joy that he had felt when the slipper came so easily into his grasp, when he heard her gasp and pause, when he knew that he had delayed the ceremony. If she meant to postpone the wedding until the slipper was found——

He turned recklessly to Mardak. "The wedding is held up, my friend. Can you make the break permanent?"

Mardak nodded, his eyes still on Drummond. "Yes," he said. "Yes. Just so soon as we find that slipper. Where do you think it is?"

Richard shrugged. This was something he was not likely to tell, not while the present confusion so well served his desires.

"Celia," he whispered. Through the banisters she looked at him. And in her eyes he caught the gleam of promise, of regret, of mystery that he had seen in the garden.

"It's rather a failure as a wedding, isn't it?" commented Celia with the dignity of one who has inadvertently had a dance interrupted. Richard thrilled with admiration. What a girl! She was calm, except for the hot anger in her cheeks.

"Ellen will be here in a moment with another pair," he began. "Then——"

"You don't really think I mean to go on with it?" She looked into his eyes, her own wide and dark. "When a man chooses between a slipper and a bride—he doesn't get both."

"You mean it?" Richard felt the blood pumping through his veins. "You are not going to marry him?"

"No, of course not. Would you?" And

There is the Caress of Soothing Almond in Princess Pat Complexion Powder

Not only does this New Ingredient give a softer, more clinging powder, but one that guards against coarse pores, blackheads and dryness

PRINCESS PAT Face Powder is a departure, something different. Every woman will want to try it because of newness alone. This natural curiosity can be gratified by sending for free sample. One of the things you will discover is that Princess Pat stays on as never a powder did before.

Now as to the New Ingredient which accounts for Princess Pat being so different. It is Almond, and it replaces the rice or cornstarch of familiar use in face powder. It has been possible with Almond to produce an entirely new degree of fineness. This, in turn, gives greater smoothness. These outward evidences of a delightful powder are noticeable immediately.

But of immensely greater importance is the beneficial effect of Princess Pat. Heretofore, women have not expected powder to improve the skin. It was not definitely made with that result in view.

How Princess Pat Powder Benefits the Skin

Here you have the idea which identifies Princess Pat—the idea of abandoning the starch formulas, handed down from grandmother's days, and finding in Nature's storehouse a new powder base! Almond suggested itself above all things else. It is good for the skin, in lotions and creams. Its many virtues are known to every woman. And now the difficult problem of using Almond for Princess Pat Powder is an accomplished fact. The new process is exclusive with Princess Pat. You will not find the Almond Base in any other powder.

A frequent cause of coarse pores and blackheads is eliminated by Princess Pat Powder. The greatest medical authorities have found that starchy substances in face powder swell in the pores under the influence of the skin's combined heat and moisture. Physicians prefer other than starchy powders for dusting skin surfaces when all possibility of irritation must be prevented.

Thus Princess Pat Face Powder—containing no starch—fulfills the latest requirements of science. It cannot, through fermentation, cause blackheads or roughened skin texture. The most tender skin gratefully accepts Princess Pat, no matter how often or freely it is used.

Thus Princess Pat Powder is to be preferred for two reasons. Its inimitable fineness and soft, velvety texture are a revelation as powder is ordinarily judged. And the presence of Almond aids materially in keeping the skin soft, pliant and flawless. Often coarse pores and blackheads are corrected with no more effort than a few weeks' use of Princess Pat Powder.

Hours making a perfect toilette

—only to let one neglected detail ruin the whole effect!

"She was stunning," said the man. "I thought I had never seen anyone more beautiful at first glimpse. Such dashing style and such good company, too! But—all wasted!"

"What happened?" asked the girl of herself. "He seemed so interested at the moment of meeting. I know I looked well and I certainly was up on my toes to entertain. Did I slip up somewhere?"

And the sad part of it always is that the man knows, the whole world knows—but the girl doesn't!

That is the dangerous thing about perspiration odor—the person afflicted so seldom realizes that she gives offense.

It is a physiological condition. You see, the perspiration glands under the arm are unusually active. Heat, excitement, nervousness affect them easily.

The hollow of the underarm and clothing prevent normal evaporation of moisture. This results in a disagreeable odor which is very noticeable to those about us but is hard to detect on ourselves.

Then those horrid "half-moons" of stain under the arms! What is uglier, more unsightly? And so ruinous, too, for the most expert dry cleaning cannot blot them out of blouses and lingerie.

Soap and water are not enough

Most women, and men, too, mean to be above reproach in personal cleanliness. And they are, so far as soap and water go.

But this repellent form of uncleanliness is something that cannot be washed away. The only thing that can cope with perspiration odor and moisture is a scientific corrective.

If women could only understand that the underarms must have regular, special care just the same as the teeth, the hair, the fingernails! If they could only realize that without this care they themselves are almost certain to offend in this thing they so criticise in others!

The underarm toilette of 3,000,000 people

There is one best way to do everything. 3,000,000 have found the one best and surest way to attain perfect personal daintiness is by regular use of Odorono, the underarm toilette.

Odorono is an antiseptic liquid formulated by a physician to correct both the evils of excessive perspiration. It is the original corrective for both perspiration odor and moisture.

Clear and clean, Odorono is just like a dainty toilet water to use. Put a little on the underarms just twice a week and you need bother with no other precautions! One application lasts for 3 days; daily bathing does not affect it.

Attention to the underarms takes so little time and effort and it means so much! This one little spot can undo all you have put into achieving a perfect toilette in outward appearance.

Get into the twice-a-week Odorono habit and enjoy perfect freedom from any trace of odor; from disagreeable moisture; clothing always dry and odorless with no taint or stain to ruin it. You can get Odorono at any toilet counter anywhere; 35c, 60c and $1 a bottle or sent by mail postpaid.

Send for dainty sample set of the complete underarm toilette

she smiled upon him. What a gallant, lovely thing she was!

"Then—" he paused, by a glance assuring himself that they were for the moment unobserved by the ever-shifting groups of inquisitive people—"the slipper is found." And he drew it from his pocket and handed it to her through the banisters.

Not for one moment did her steady regard falter. Though she took it, still she questioned him. And all that he had to say to her was in his eyes; he had stolen her slipper to break off the wedding. What would she do with him now?

Quietly she came to her feet. Shoe in hand, she stood looking down upon the confused mass of guests below her. "You needn't look further," she said. And though her voice was not raised, there was a sudden hush in the room. "Here it is."

WITH an exclamation Drummond sprang toward her, his hand extended.

Eyebrows raised, she looked at him. But Drummond's eyes were fastened on the glittering thing in her hand.

And in that moment Merry Stafford, holding fast to Ellen's hand, came stumbling step by step down upon them.

"Is it time to frow the rice?" his eager voice begged. In his fist was still clutched the grimy bag. "Mammy said I could. Here I am. I came to frow the rice."

Celia stooped to him, kissed him. "You're too soon, honey child. Or too late. We aren't going to have any rice-throwing tonight. I'm sorry," as the small face puckered in disappointment.

"Mammy said—" The baby fingers began plucking at the sparkling slipper-buckle. Instantly the child's attention was diverted and he stared up at Celia in quick excitement. "I got some of those!" he exclaimed proudly. "Mine are shiny, too."

"Those?" She looked from the slipper into the upraised eyes. "Slippers, you mean? Yes, dear, yours are shiny, too, nice and black and shiny."

But the little boy shook his head violently.

"Not shoes. Shiny stones." He plucked at the rhinestone buckle. "I digged 'em f'm out under the box-bush where that man hided 'em." And he pointed at Drummond.

Richard heard Mardak, again at his side, draw a quick breath.

"So that's it," he murmured in Richard's ear, and moved over to the staircase. "Come down here, youngster. Let me see your stones."

"No." Merry shook an obstinate golden head.

"We'll all come down," said Celia, putting on the slipper, and made the descent which was to have been so momentous. "Now, let's see what you have, Merry, boy." And she lifted him to the step that brought him level with her own eyes. Drummond, Richard noticed, was edging to the outer circle of the crowd. But Drummond was no concern of Richard. If Mardak was interested in his movements, he gave no sign.

"That man," reiterated Merry, digging deep into his small trousers pocket, "he comed out on the porch, all alone. An' he comed down the steps. An' he looked all 'round, but he didn't see me, 'cause I was hiding in the box-bush. An' he stooped down quick, an' he poked a hole in the dirt."

Richard remembered—as did Mardak, for they exchanged quick glances—the dirty fingers of the bridegroom.

"An' he took som'in' out of his pocket, an' he dropped 'em in the hole. An' he went into the house, fast as he could. An' I went an' poked in the hole and found 'em"

"'Em" turned out to be slipper-buckles the exact duplicates of those Celia was wearing.

"Why," Celia exclaimed, "how strange!"

"I think not," said Mardak. "May I see them?"

Celia, with one glance into his steady eyes, yielded him the buckles.

"May I ask where your buckles came from, Miss Celia?" he said, examining the stones with a lense pulled from his pocket.

"Why—" Celia's eyes sought Drummond, now on the outer edge of the circle. But he did not meet her gaze. "Why—they were a—wedding-present."

"From the groom?" Mardak's casual question was accompanied by a shifting of the glass to examine the second buckle.

"Yes." She looked from the buckles on her shoes to the ones in Mardak's hands. "He pinned them on for me himself."

"Pinned." Mardak paused, glanced from the buckles in his hand to the ones on Celia's slippers. "Easily exchanged, then," he mused. "Did the bridegroom have access to your slippers after my arrival?" A smile was curling his lips.

"Yes." Celia's bewilderment did not prevent an exchange of glances with Ellen. And Richard remembered the disappearance of the slippers earlier in the afternoon.

"Take these back, youngster." Mardak handed the buckles to Merry. "They're not what I'm looking for. Miss Celia," and his smile was brilliantly ingratiating, "I'll have to ask you to let me examine those." His gesture indicated the slipper-buckles she was wearing.

RICHARD saw Blaise Drummond slip out of a window that led to the porch.

"Do you want Drummond to escape?" he asked Mardak.

"Indeed, yes," murmured that gentleman. "I have associates outside waiting for him to make quite sure that he escapes. Also that he gets aboard the boat your Government has so kindly provided for his accommodation. It is meant that he shall not trouble either your country or mine again."

Celia turned to Ellen, taking from her the white slippers she had brought.

Richard, on one knee before her, was permitted to make the exchange. He handed the silver things to Mardak.

"Clever," he murmured after an instant's close scrutiny. "Clever. The rhinestone buckle he gives to his bride. But the duplicates, with the diamonds, he keeps. When he finds that he is traced, he pins the diamonds on the silver slippers. They will never be examined. But he must not be found with the others in his possession. So he buries them where the child finds them. Had that not happened, and had he not betrayed himself in his excitement over the loss of his bride's slipper, I think his trick would have succeeded. It would never have occurred to me to look for them there." And he tapped the buckles on the slippers.

"Diamonds!" Richard's eyes blazed. "I didn't know——"

"No." Mardak spoke in tones too low for any but Richard and Celia to catch. "Nobody knows. Not Washington. Not you. They go back to the princess before their loss casts its shadow upon her name."

Richard nodded in quick comprehension. That Drummond's intrigue in high circles had cost him Washington's confidence he had known; but that the foolish girl-princess had trusted him with jewels that were not hers to give he had not known. The stones must go back to Europe in Mardak's care, and secretly.

"These are mine, then?" Mardak bowed in courteous request to Celia.

"You need only the buckles'" Richard interposed quickly. And taking the slippers, he unpinned the glittering tokens of Drummond's treachery and handed them to Mardak. "These," and Richard smiled daringly at Celia, "I think are mine." And he tucked a silver trifle into each pocket.

"I am glad," Celia's color was high, and she spoke across Richard directly to Mardak, "that the matter has been so satisfactorily adjusted. Extend to your princess my congratulations on the skill and effectiveness of her agent." And without a glance for Richard she turned and went quickly up the stairs.

With her going, the room broke into a buzz of questions, of wonder, of dismay. What had it all been about? Few had caught the words, none their import. Outside sounded the purr of a departing motor.

Richard turned to satisfy the curiosity of those pressing close upon them.

"Most unfortunate," he said. "Yes, the man was a rascal, Mr. Mardak knew it, and Drummond ran away to escape exposure. You are all to be congratulated on finding him out in time." And, being diplomatically trained, he managed by his inflection to imply that it was the astuteness of the guests assembled that had brought about this fortunate turn of events.

Somehow he worked his way through the

She refused to become a "Cripple!"

Little chapters from the story of how the Arch Preserver Shoe changed the ideas of a Nation. Number 8.

"ALL that the women of my family ever talk about is how terribly their feet hurt," Mary B——, of New York, said one day shortly after her graduation from college.

"Aunt Jane can't dance because she can hardly stand up. Aunt Ethel can't entertain because it kills her to be on her feet more than an hour. And even you, Mother, won't go down town to luncheon with me because of your pesky old feet."

Her mother smiled a bit wistfully. "I guess weak feet run in our family, dear. All the B—— women have been troubled in the same way."

"All the B—— women!" There was defiance in Mary's voice. "Well, I can name one woman in this family who isn't going to have awful old feet. I refuse to be a 'cripple!'"

"Of course," replied her mother, "you can wear the ordinary health shoes, if you wish. They're so ugly, though. I'd rather have aches than to try to appear in them."

"No, I don't mean to do that. I don't believe it is necessary to suffer with your feet just because you insist on being well groomed. I believe there are correct shoes that are both stylish and healthful and that will keep my feet comfortable. And I intend to find them right now before I have a single ache. I'll try every shoe in the world until I do find them."

It was six years ago that Mary B——looked for and found the one shoe that felt best on her well feet and also satisfied her ideas about appearance.

She is twenty-eight now, well into the "foot suffering" age in her family. She is a young mother, too. But she is happy and healthy and enjoying perfect feet. She plays tennis and golf, dances, and often walks for miles through the country with her husband and young son.

She refused to be an old-young woman. She refused to wear "unsightly health" shoes. She proved that no woman in her family, in spite of tradition, need have a single foot ache or pain.

She found in the Arch Preserver Shoe the features which keep feet well, features which allow the feet to function normally, without strain or abuse.

She has learned how wonderfully the concealed, built-in arch bridge supports the feet, preventing any tendency to sag and weaken. She has learned how perfectly the inner sole, because it is flat, eliminates the pinching and "bunching" of the forepart of the foot. She knows that the blood-vessels, bones and nerves of the feet are not interfered with in any way in her Arch Preserver Shoes.

And finally, she has learned that because this shoe is fitted differently — from heel to ball — she never has to worry about getting a comfortable pair, or about "breaking them in."

She wears the Arch Preserver Shoe to all of her social functions, and she is pridefully upholding the traditions of the B—— family regarding the appearance of its women. In other words, she is living a normal, happy, healthy life, without a thought to her feet.

Instead of being held back by the old-time foot problem she is being constantly urged by her vigorous feet to do more, to take part in things. She has proved, too, that it is so much more satisfactory in young womanhood, or, at least, before foot troubles begin, to adopt the right shoe, the shoe that keeps feet well.

It might also be interesting to note that Mary's mother, grandmother and aunts are all wearing the Arch Preserver Shoe now.

Won't you write us for our special little booklet, "Use Your Feet?" It will tell you so many important things about your feet and the shoes you should wear. It costs you nothing, yet it may mean a great deal of happiness to you.

Smilin' thru his tears

BABIES were meant to be happy—to gurgle and chuckle and croon.

And when a wee mite cries and whimpers and is fretful and unhappy most of the time, you may be sure something is wrong—in all likelihood with his delicate, flower-like skin.

Yet keeping baby's skin comfortable is simply a matter of keeping it clean and well powdered, with the right kind of powder.

Because each snowy fleck of Mennen Borated Talcum is as porous as a little fairy sponge, it dries all hidden, inflaming moisture from the skin-folds. Every trace of bath-water, urine and perspiration is absorbed.

This soft, fragrant talcum also forms a smooth gossamer film over the helpless little body, saving it from the torment of friction—from the ceaseless rubbing of damp clothes and bedding and the chafing of baby's own skin-folds.

And Mennen's is made not only pure and healing but wonderfully antiseptic as well. It's just what an infant's skin needs to keep it free from infection—the infection that comes of trifling causes and often results so seriously.

After several dustings with this cooling, soothing powder baby will be smilin' thru his tears—skin all healed and comfortable and cheery disposition much in evidence.

Every problem of babyhood is discussed in the new Mennen Baby Book. Just use the coupon.

crowd, left them chattering behind, left Mardak to invent plausible explanations, and stepped outside into the moonlit night that was not Celia's wedding night. Away from all the confusion, he entered the quiet garden and found his retreat under the old mulberry.

FOR a man who had so promptly and effectually broken off a wedding and saved the girl of his heart he was in a remarkably restless and unhappy state of mind. What of Celia? How did she feel toward him? Would she not always identify him with the whole miserable debacle? One moment he hoped she might in the course of time forgive him. The next he was wretchedly sure that she would not.

His ability for clear and accurate conclusions, which had won praise from many older heads in the past, now completely deserted him. Since Celia had gone upstairs he dwelt in a black and formless void.

But the slight sound of a shutter pushed ajar above his head roused him at once. He looked up and became instantly aware that the garden was a place of silver enchantment.

"Celia," he said, "Celia," unconscious that he had spoken aloud.

She leaned farther over the vine-covered sill. "Did you call me to give back my slippers?" asked a magic voice.

The bridal veil no longer hid the bright hair. For the wedding-gown she had substituted a simple frock of leaf-green. Celia, the lady of his dreams.

"I did not know that I called you aloud," said Richard, coming to stand directly beneath the window, fearful lest she vanish, "but I think I have been calling you all my life. That is why— Oh, you must understand?" Did his incoherent earnestness touch her sympathy?

A light undercurrent of laughter rippled in her next words. "I understand that you have my slippers. Even without buckles I've a fancy for them."

Richard reached in his pocket. "I'll give you one," he said, somewhat breathlessly. "I think that's fair enough," and he balanced it, slender and shining, on the palm of his extended hand.

Celia rested her chin on one small palm, a provoking smile lifted the corners of her mouth. "Why one, pray? You would have me go a-limping through life?"

"No," Richard insisted with intense eagerness. "No. You shall have both when you claim mine with the proper formula. They are bewitched——"

"What makes you think so?"

"Chiefly," he answered, "because of your real name—which I alone know."

After a second's pause came more softly still from the window above him, "And what is—my—real name?"

"Miss Silver Shoon. What else could it be?" And he sang softly:

"Silver Shoon, when you dance on the dune,
Will you toss a moon-flake white
To a mortal in the night—
Silver Shoon, when you dance on the dune?"

He held the two gleaming shoes in his hand. "Will you claim them?" he finished daringly.

"Claim them?" The question was the merest echo.

"They must be danced in this night," he explained, not venturing to look up. "It is their due."

A quick-drawn breath, the music of faintest laughter. It was but a step from the window to the heavy trellis. A rustle of leaves—the glint of moonlight on her golden head— He came forward swiftly, but she stepped to the grass beside him, scarcely brushing his extended hand.

"And now, sir?"

Quickly he dropped to his knees, for the second time that evening holding the silver slippers for those slender feet.

"And so," she said, "as you wish."

Humming the air of the song, she began to dance within the boxwood circle, weaving many patterns on the dew-starred grass. Lovely and unreal she seemed, a moon-fay dancing in a magic ring. Richard stood spellbound, unable to move even when the swaying figure sank lightly before him in a final curtsy so profound that the bright head above her ruffled skirts of green bloomed at his feet like an enchanted flower.

Richard stirred from his trance, bent toward her, but she was gone, flitting across the lawn, back to her trellis, that fairy staircase to a magic casement.

He moved closer beneath her window.

"Are the slippers redeemed?" she queried. And then, kneeling on the window-seat, she managed to lean very far out indeed, so that her voice came hardly above a whisper. "Thank you—for—everything."

"My dearest—" breathed Richard. Above his head the shutters closed softly. There was silence in the garden, but emptiness no longer. The perfume of the white lilacs drifted in the air like incense. From the feathery fronds of the mimosa-tree came subdued stirring of wings.

THE INCREASING PURPOSE

then chaps like you and Andrew, chaps without a care or a tie in the world, come along and tell me that no doubt I'm content to live in it!" He gave a bitter and an ironic sound. "Ha! Well, I've got some fuss with the cellar door to see about. I'm the only person who ever can do anything in this enviable house. Excuse me for a bit."

Sim said, "Poor old Charles! I say, I am so sorry, old man," and, Charles making no response, "What's the cellar door fuss? Let me help. I'm a whaler at tinkering."

Charles was moving out of the room. "Not the least need, thanks. I know just what it is. Besides—" He gave a look that, as he intended, quite clearly signaled the difference between Sim's well-cut light tweeds and his own rather dingy clothes—"you'd only dirty that Bond Street suit of yours." He laughed meaningly. "You'll scarcely be able to spend so much on your tailor now you're one of the unemployed, Sim. No, you'd better go and make your bow to Alice. I heard her come in just now."

Sim gave no attention to look or laugh. "Did you? I never heard her."

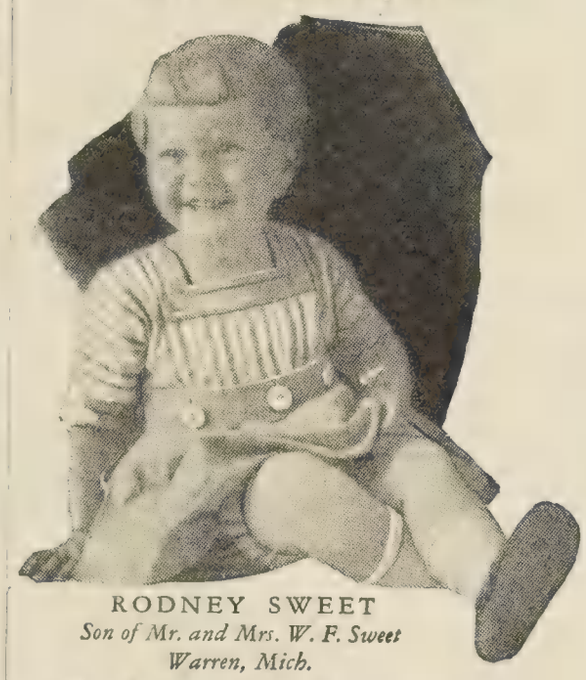
Charles said, his face all twisted: "There isn't a sound in this house I don't hear and know."

"Poor old Charles!"

Charles went off without reply.

He did not go to the troublesome cellar door. He went to the room which he called his study and sat down at the table. It was the only chair in the room he ever occupied, and his most common attitude in it was, as now, staring before him, at intervals pressing his eyes—his eyes always had a burning feeling, relieved by pressure—and fumbling his lips. He was glad, his thoughts went, that he had had a go at Sim about the house, but he was also sorry. He was glad because it riled him more than anything else in the world that "these chaps" should profess to think him lucky in living rent free; if they didn't realize what his life was it was right that they should be told and it was thoroughly satisfying to tell them, to tell them straight. But he was sorry because all this outburst and all his snarling at Sim in these very first moments of Sim's arrival were precisely what he had settled with himself this time not to do. This time! On every occasion of meeting one of his brothers, and particularly Sim, it always was "this time" that he was not going to be, as he knew was his habit, bearish; and always, immediately, bearish he was.

He pressed his eyes.



But it was their fault! It here was Sim's fault—from the very start. He had arranged, genially, for Sim to begin his visit to them on a Saturday, so that they could have the weekend together and he could go thoroughly into this extraordinary freak of Sim's retirement

Michigan's prize baby owes his health to
EAGLE BRAND

WHEN little Rodney Sweet was only nine days old he was left motherless, and for the first two years of his life had only the care of housekeepers and neighbors. For months the baby struggled along, making little gain, until someone finally took him and started him on Eagle Brand Condensed Milk.

This picture, taken at 2 1/2 years, tells the story. Rodney weighs 33 pounds—wears 6-year-old size clothing—and has, moreover, won first prize for health in the Michigan State Fair, with the enviable record of 99 3/10 per cent.

RODNEY SWEET
Son of Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Sweet

Prize winners everywhere raised on this baby food

EVERY year more Eagle Brand babies are awarded prizes for health and beauty in contests all over the country.

If you cannot nurse your baby you need have no fear about his healthy development. Eagle Brand provides safe, dependable nourishment in an easily digested form. It is more nearly like mother's milk than any other baby food.

For this reason Eagle Brand has become the accepted baby food everywhere—recommended by doctors, endorsed by mothers.

Read some of their interesting experiences with Eagle Brand—told in a new booklet, "What Other Mothers Say." "I Won't Be Home for Dinner To-night!"

How often does your husband say that?

Each time it happens you wonder, you worry. Is it really business that keeps him down-town? Is he tired of you and hungering for another woman's company?

Probably the only thing he is hungering for is food! Delicious, unusual dishes properly seasoned, delightfully served—the kind of food he gets at clubs and hotels, but not at home!

To-day there is no excuse for monotony in home cooking. The New Butterick Cook Book contains not only hundreds of recipes to suit every taste, but expert advice on serving, setting the table, buying foods, carving and scientific information on food values. No recipe can possibly fail if you follow the careful instructions given with each one in The New Butterick Cook Book.

from the army and discuss the future with him and help him. And how did Sim respond to these most brotherly intentions? Why, from the start, from the very minute the train came into the station, Sim riled him—utterly. He riled him by arriving first-class. He riled him by springing out of the carriage and greeting him in immensely good spirits. He riled him particularly by the marked elegance of his dress and the distinctive air he had about him. He riled him by his airy, free and easy ways—not offering to pay for the cab, giving his own instructions about taking his luggage to his room. He riled him particularly again by never, right up to this point, making the slightest reference to the real reason of his visit. He riled him by immediately, in his room, starting to unpack from very expensive-looking suit cases—and indeed it was this last, the trouser-press, the smell of good leather, the brisk opening of drawers and neat stowing away of fine raiment "as if he's come for life" that, when was thrown atop of them the riling remark about the house, had caused him to blaze up from his increasing bearishness. He was right thus to have burst out and let Sim have it straight.

And yet——

Sim had said, "Poor old Charles!" Sim had said, "I am so sorry, old man." He wanted that kind of thing, that kind of sympathy, that kind of tenderness, more than anything on earth. Why didn't he respond to it? Why in pity's name could he not have opened his arms to it and told Sim how desperately he wanted it, and how down-and-out he felt, how beset, how near the end of his tether? Why couldn't he?

And yet——

Why should he? Ten to one, a thousand to one, if he got up right now and went and broke down before Sim, a thousand to one Sim would say, "Well, anyway, old man, you do get your house for nothing."

He said aloud, "For nothing! My God!" He raised his eyes and stared up at the ceiling. From the room above came sounds the meaning of which, as of every single sound in the house, he could perfectly interpret. He said aloud, "Rent free! Freedom! My God!"

IN THAT room above the study of Charles was the man who owned the house and who gave Charles free occupation of the house.

This was a very old man, close on ninety. And he lay stretched upon a bed, incapable of movement, incapable of speech, capable only, astoundingly, of sustaining life month after month, year after year, and capable, further, of continuing the dominance that all his life he had asserted over all about him.

Sim now was by this old man's bed, come up with Alice, Charles's wife, to visit him; and standing at the foot, silent and uncomfortable after awkward attempts at greeting, gazed upon him and felt that dominance anew.

This very old man lying there was of great frame, but in flesh was so emaciated that each of his bones could be discerned through the skin. He lay always on his back, always along the precise center of the bed, always with the clothes precisely at the same alinement along his chest; his toes always were the same small promontory at the foot; his face always was the same graven and impassive effigy upon the pillow. It had the aspect, his face immutably set there, of a plaster cast displayed for exhibition; and the male attendant who ministered to him, by name Jule, a spare, olive-skinned man of about twenty-five, always gave Sim the impression of a dealer exhibiting a specimen which he knows perfectly well his visitors have no intention of purchasing.

He stood now, this Jule, impassive, close-lipped, having in marked degree the inscrutable reserve of a well-trained man-servant (but he was of superior station), facing Charles's wife across the bed and steadily regarding her. And it was noticeable that whenever she glanced up to his look he at once looked down toward his patient, then up to her again. The implication (to Charles's wife) was as of a message between the two and she the subject of it.

That very old man lying there, Alice and Jule on his either hand, Sim at his feet, had always been uncommunicative toward the members of his household; his eyes, in those days penetrative, commanding, always had been to those same persons the signals of his mind. He lay there now, and his eyes, moving slowly as it were upon the face of a tomb, were lusterless, having a dead, drowned look.

They brooded now on Sim.

Sim tried again.

"Hullo, Gand!"

His voice seemed to come back on him as though he spoke against a window of plate-glass through which no sound could penetrate. He looked at Alice. Alice had just looked up and now was looking down, fingering the quilt, a tinge of color on her cheeks. He looked at Jule. Jule, who had brought his eyes from Charles's patient up to Charles's wife, moved them to Sim, then back again toward his specimen upon the bed.

"Hullo, Gand!"

This stricken and speechless man whom he thus addressed was Sim's great-uncle. Always more in the relation to them of grandparent than uncle, he was called by the three brothers "Gand"—infancy's lisped attempt at "Grand." Jule always called him "Patient." Never "the patient," or "my patient."

Hesitatingly, a forced cheerfulness in it, Sim went on: "Hullo, Gand! Hullo! Are you glad to see me? I'm glad to see you, Gand, very glad indeed. I declare you are looking stronger, better. You are wonderful, aren't you? Good for years yet. I've come to stay with Charles and with Alice for a bit. I've chucked the service, you know. I've——"

He stopped. Old Gand, who fixedly had been regarding him, began with enormous slowness to turn away his eyes and to direct them toward Jule. There was in their deliberate motion a suggestion of contemptuous dismissal; there was in the manner of their going to his attendant a suggestion of confidence here of finding rest.

This in itself had a certain pathos, and the attendant seemed to respond to it. He gave to those dull and heavy-ladened eyes the shadow of a glimmer about the corners of his mouth; a look, as he passed it on to Sim and to Alice, that seemed to say, "I know—we know, you and I." Then, with that same kind of glimmer toward the visitors and a murmur to old Gand, "Back in two minutes," he silently moved across and left the room.

SIM said to Alice in a low voice, "Does he never talk, that chap?"

"Scarcely ever when any one is here. When he is alone, he talks to Gand a lot. We hear his voice. He tells him everything that goes on. I don't like it."

"I don't like him," Sim said. "Do you still call him Swiss Jule?"

She very slightly smiled. "We do. He got out of being conscripted on his papers, but I believe he's no more Swiss than I am. He hasn't the trace of an accent."

"Suits him somehow, though," Sim said, "the hiss sound about it goes well. He's got a snaky look, that gentleman." He looked at old Gand, whose eyes were now upon the door, waiting. "He's wonderfully devoted to old Gand, though, for all his manner."

Alice seemed to agree. "He never leaves him," she said.

Old Gand's eyes enormously slowly had come again to Sim. "Poor old Gand!" Sim said.

Alice was speaking now to old Gand. Swiss Jule reentered. Both sounds died in his ears. He was conscious alone of that great but incapable form and of those eyes which, dull and expressionless, still mysteriously were old Gand. Death in life. This wasted body, to all active purposes dead, had within it life; the ribs were bars; the frame a prison.

Sim had never loved this very old man, this power, this tyrant, now this shackled and incarcerated prisoner—as a child he had stood in fear of him, as a young man in awe of him, as an older man with no smallest sense whatever of attachment to him. There overwhelmed him now, standing before his prison bars, an infinite compassion for his plight. He had a longing, he almost gave way to it, to call out, "Gand, old Gand, can I help you? Can I do anything for you? Can I get in touch with you somehow? I must get to you, Gand. I never loved you, old Gand, but I am torn with love, with pity, for you now."

Why the Baby Powder must be carefully chosen

How should the infant's skin be cared for to prevent chafing?

FIRST, not too much nor too strong soap should be used; second, careful rinsing of the body; third, not too vigorous rubbing, either during or after the bath; fourth, the use of dusting powder in all the folds of the skin—under the arms, behind the ears, about the neck, in the groin, etc. This is of utmost importance.

L. EMMETT HOLT, M. D.
(America's standard baby authority)

ROSELEAVES are less easily fretted than a baby's skin! So soft and tender is it.

The leading baby doctors everywhere—and the intelligent young mothers they've trained and tutored to care for baby the wisest way—have known this fact for years.

They knew, too, that baby's health depends upon keeping that delicate skin of his in just perfect condition.

They knew that to keep his skin soft and smooth, sound and healthy, they must dust it with a baby powder carefully chosen for its absolute, antiseptic purity.

But there was no such powder.

So the doctors asked the house that already made over four hundred of the purest sterilized articles for the medical profession, to make such a baby powder as they wanted—a powder according to a formula the baby specialists united in approving.

When Johnson's Baby Powder was ready, the doctors everywhere told the mothers of young babies—and those mothers told each other—about this wonderful powder for baby's skin.

So over a million mothers of new babies are using Johnson's Baby Powder—selecting this above all other powders. Because they know how pure and right it is. Your own druggist always carries it.

Or you may try out this perfect baby powder and receive a little book on the care of baby's skin.

Johnson & Johnson, New Brunswick, N. J.

Please send me free, a small can of the baby powder made in your famous laboratories, and the little book—"The Faith of a Baby."

New Hair in 90 Days!

A way tested by 600,000 women

A written guarantee given by your own drug or department store

This is a direct offer to grow hair on your head. An offer backed by written guarantee, given by your own drug or department store.

If we fail, it costs you nothing.

More than 600,000 women have made this test in the last three years.

Actually grew hair for 91 out of every 100

Science has recently made amazing discoveries in hair treatment.

We have proved that while 4 in 7 are either bald or partly bald, at 40, only about nine in a hundred need ever be bald.

Hair roots seldom die from natural causes. They can be revived. We have proved this by regrowing hair on 91 heads in 100.

Highest authorities approve this new way.

Remember—it is guaranteed

The guarantee is positive, and promptly met. You are the judge. Your own drug or department store gives it with each 3-bottle purchase. Go today to any drug or department store, ask for the Van Ess Treatment.

We prefer not to ship by mail. Please order from your own druggist or department store.

Orders from outside U. S. A. will be filled direct from Van Ess Laboratories, 147 E. Kinzie St., Chicago, Ill. Foreign orders must enclose postal money-order at rate of $1.50 per bottle.

Note This New Way—

It massages the treatment directly into the follicles of the hair

You can see from illustration that Van Ess is not a "tonic." You do not rub it in with your fingers. Each package comes with a rubber massage cap, and the nipples are hollow. Just rub your head, and the nipples automatically feed lotion down into follicles of the scalp. It is very easy to apply. One minute each day is enough.

THE INCREASING PURPOSE

"Well, well," Charles's wife was saying, and was touching him and motioning departure, and he presently was outside the door and going down-stairs with her.

On the floor below where was the drawing-room, into which they turned, Alice said to him, "He's not changed much since you last saw him, do you think?"

He uttered absently the one word, "No."

Charles's wife looked at him curiously. "You've changed somehow, you know, Sim—a lot. Do you know you have? What is it?"

He aroused himself and laughed. "Why, I believe that, rather late in life, I've started to do a bit of thinking, Alice."

THE wife of Charles, who now was thirty-two, was pretty in a pale way. She was fond (she told herself) of Charles, but she was as passive toward Charles as Charles was toward her. She did not quarrel with him, she did not neglect him, but, as he her, she nothing active toward him, she merely accepted him. The case of those two people was, put in common words, that in the eight years of their married life the fires of love had burned out. They sat, as sit so many couples, on either side of a hearth where once had been a glowing blaze; where later had been waning light; where now were embers, almost cold; where soon, unless one stirred to tend the almost vanished warmth, ashes would be.

Alice, when she told herself that she was fond of Charles, might be thought thus to be stirring to kindle before it died away the final gleam. In fact, her gesture when she thus assured herself was rather that of one glancing at the fire and saying. "It will suffice; no need yet to attend to it." In fact, grown well-accustomed to this hearth and believing that what had gone on so long without attention always would go on, she was playing with other fire; and it was when this other fire sometimes alarmingly would blaze that, alarmed, she would look toward the blackening hearth and tell herself it yet had life. In fact, it was when the new attraction she was finding attracted her with sudden force that, dismayed a little, she would look toward Charles and tell herself she was fond of him.

Sim very early in his visit thought that he noticed a change in Alice since he had last seen her. There appeared to him frequently a certain nervousness in her manner, rather as though she were apprehensive of something. But when he thought he observed it, he could neither see nor imagine any reason for it. He kept thinking that he noticed it, nevertheless, both in her manner toward him (and they were excellent friends, he and Alice) and in her manner with Charles; and though Sim knew that Charles and Alice were far from being what is called a devoted couple, their relations always appeared to him ordinary enough.

On the third evening of his stay, sitting with her in her drawing-room, Charles just left to write some letters, he touched the matter.

"Alice, you told me the other day that you thought I had changed. Do you know, I think you have, somehow."

She flushed.

She held up the needlework on which she was engaged. The action was as though to examine it at arm's length; but she had felt herself flush. She knew it was the fire with which she was playing that thus had caused her cheeks to redden.

She lowered it and laughed. "Sim, that will never do. Didn't you tell me that the change in you is because you are now doing some thinking?"

Sim also laughed. "That doesn't catch me in the least," he said. "I say that you have changed. That's the observation of the heavy thinking directed upon you."

Alice averted her face. "Sim, for goodness sake don't! It's like being watched."

He said lightly: "That's all right. It is being watched."

"I mean being spied on."

Her tone was quick and nervous, a part of that very nervousness of manner which had made him think her changed, and he noticed it. "Oh, don't be a goose, Alice! As to spying, the position is already filled in this house."

She looked up. "You mean Swiss Jule?"

He nodded. "He always gives me the feeling of spying, spying to tell old Gand."

Alice said: "He does me. I'm sure of it." She laid down her work on her lap. "Oh, Sim, I'm awfully glad you've come. It's jolly to have you in the house."

He leaned over and patted her shoulder. "Nice Alice. It's nice to hear you say that."

She smiled up at him. "Tell me how I have changed, Sim."

"Oh, it's nothing. It's only fun."

"No, you wouldn't have said it for fun."

"Well, it's only fancy, then."

"What have you fancied?"

"Why, nothing at all. I don't know. It's hard to say. I tell you what—to make a shot at it. I remember two times in my life—once with old Gand when I was a kid, once with my adjutant when I was a subaltern—when I was desperately anxious that a certain subject should not come up in conversation. Whenever there was a pause, I dashed in with something to prevent it. Whenever there was talk and the talk getting warm, I dashed in with something to lead it away."

She said, "Well?"

"Well, I believe that is rather the kind of impression you've given me, of—of dodging some subject."

She breathed, "Oh, Sim!"

At her tone he turned to her quickly. "Why, Alice, what's up. Is anything up?"

She shook her head.

"There is, though. The way you spoke just now. What's the trouble? Tell me, Alice, old girl."

The door opened and Charles came in.

Charles said, "Sim, I've got Conrad Bryne on the phone. He's just rung up. Would you mind very much if he came in to-night for some more chess?"

"Not in the world, old man. Why should I?"

Charles seemed hesitant. "Well, we were playing last night and it seems rather rotten when you've just arrived——"

"What rot!" said Sim gaily. "Matter of fact, I'm very keen to take Alice on at picquet again to-night. Alice and I play picquet and no chess, you and this new doctor chap chess and no picquet—it's a kind of Jack Spratt and his wife. Fine arrangement, I call it. Have him in, by all means."

"Well, if you really feel like that. You agree, Alice?"

She said quietly, "Oh, yes."

"I'll tell him then," Charles said, and left.

CONRAD Bryne, the "new doctor chap" of Sim's phrase, was new since Sim's last visit to Charles's house. The doctor who always had attended old Gand had suffered a break down and had gone away for a year's rest and travel. Conrad Bryne had come, six months ago, to take his place. He had been in to dinner on the previous evening and in the course of it had made some joking remark to Alice in French. Alice had responded in French, and Charles also joining in, it then had been explained to Sim that (a fluent French speaker, and Charles and Alice fair but "rusty,") Conrad Bryne dined regularly once a week when, for the fun of the thing, only French was spoken. Bryne also, as the conversation then went on to show, was a great chess-player, as was Charles, and here, too, by the new doctor's aid, rustiness was being rubbed away. Sim had liked him, a youngish man of not more than thirty, dark, clean-shaven, with something of a navy air about him which was explained when he told Sim, chatting over the cigarets, that ever since he took his degree he had pursued his profession knocking about the world on liners as a ship's doctor. It seemed from the way he spoke that he had some private means and need not tie himself. This was his first home practise "and I'm rather enjoying a settled spell for a bit," he had said, "not too much to do and some good friends," and he had smiled across the table to Charles, who had nodded and smiled back.

Charles seemed indeed to have struck up quite a friendship with the new doctor, and when, returning to the telephone, he had left Sim with Alice again, it was on this fact that Sim, but not immediately, remarked. On the closing of the door his immediate words, resuming those which Charles's coming had interrupted, were, "Now, Alice, what were you saying just now when Charles came in?"

"No, no. It was nothing, Sim."

Straightest Hair Transformed to Naturally Curly

Permanent Wave Your Hair at Home with the Famous Nestle "LANOIL" Outfit

Two Friends Waving Each Other's Hair With the Nestle "LANOIL" Outfit

HOW does your hair look after the dance? Does it hang in woe-begone wisps and helpless strands, after an evening in a warm room, no matter how beautifully you crimped or curled it for the occasion? Yet with a single Nestle LANOIL Permanent Wave, how daintily those same wisps would cling to your forehead and at your throat in delightful ringlets, how entrancingly those lanky strands would wave and curl.

You do not need to endure the embarrassment of straight hair this summer. You do not need to have straight hair at all, if you make up your mind to have naturally curly hair. For, waiting for you is a little Home Outfit, which transforms the straightest hair that grows on woman or child into delightful waves, curls and ringlets that curl of themselves, and look even prettier when you shampoo them, or go out into rain, fog or mist.

LANOIL Waves Laugh at Moisture of All Kinds

Of course this sounds hard to believe—yet we are willing to let you prove its absolute truth at our cost. All we ask is that you send a letter, or the coupon below for a Home Outfit, enclosing its $15 purchase price, or, if you prefer, SEND NO MONEY and pay the postman when it arrives.

If after testing your charming waves, curls and ringlets for thirty days, you are not convinced that the Home Outfit is the most wonderful purchase you ever made, and the gentle LANOIL treatment the best thing you ever did for your hair, return the Outfit, and by return mail you will receive in full every cent of its $15 purchase price without any deduction whatever for our packing and mailing costs, use of the free trial supplies and the Outfit.

A Simple—yet Fascinating Procedure

In the privacy of your own home, this Outfit gives you the same famous LANOIL Process for which hundreds of women visit Mr. Nestle's great New York Establishments every day. A few pleasant hours' pastime any afternoon gives to your hair a natural curliness that you can be proud of forever—a curliness which will last you through strolls in the damp night air, through bathing at seashore or mountain side, through dancing of evenings, or working all day long in warm offices or at home.

Is your skin older than you are?

THE saying "A woman is as old as she looks" should be daily borne in mind by every woman who desires to retain the charm of youth. The skin is the first part of the body to show the marks of age, and no woman can look younger than her skin.

With a little care, however, it is easy to keep it as young as you are, or even a little younger. And the method is so simple—just daily cleansing with Resinol Soap.

Incredible as this may seem, it is true, because proper cleansing is the basis of all skin health and beauty, and Resinol Soap is unsurpassed as a cleansing agent. This enviable position is due largely to its absolute purity but especially to the Resinol properties it contains.

These soothing qualities enable the soft lather to sink deep into the pores of the skin and thoroughly cleanse them without injuring the delicate tissue or removing the natural oil so necessary to prevent dryness and wrinkles. One trial of Resinol Soap will indicate its pleasing effect and reveal its distinctive fragrance.

For special irritations, apply a touch of Resinol—that soothing ointment which doctors have prescribed for years in treating itching, burning, skin troubles. Excellent for the rashes and chafings of childhood and as a healing home remedy. At all druggists.

THE INCREASING PURPOSE

He playfully mocked her. "Yes, yes, it was something. You had something to say to me. You wouldn't have said 'Oh, Sim,' like that, if you had not."

She said entreatingly, "Please, nothing, Sim. Please—another subject."

He did not know how to take her, but he took the real entreaty in her tone and thought to banter it. He put his hand to his forehead, simulating deep thought. "Another subject! I never can raise one when I want to. Well, then, Bryne."

She stooped to gather some threads that had fallen on the carpet. "Yes, what of Doctor Bryne, Sim?" The stooping seemed to have caused her face to flush a little.

"Why, what I notice, and I'm glad, is that Charles seems to have taken a great liking to the man."

She assented very cordially. "He has. They're great friends." She then said, "Why are you glad, Sim?"

"Why, because I think it is good for old Charles to have a pal. He hasn't many."

She affirmed, "No, not many."

Sim was silent for a few moments. He then said, "He's rather a lonely bird, don't you think—Charles?"

She had been watching Sim while he sat silent. She now responded very quickly, "But Sim, I am very fond of Charles."

"Why, Alice, of course you are." The challenge in her words was so pronounced and yet was so uncalled for that he laughed at it as one laughs at the capricious indignation of a child. "Now, come, you can't pretend that I was suggesting——"

She said in the hurried tone in which one, having a charge to lay, skirts the direct issue: "No, no, I am sure you were not." Then came on the flank: "Not intentionally, Sim. All the same, in what you said, there is an implication. If Charles is lonely, if he strikes you as being lonely, am not I accused of—of neglect—of——"

"Alice!"

But she persisted, though, still skirting, she modified: "Well, well, of—of letting him be lonely?"

He laughed. "You are a goose, Alice; not a scrap in the world are you accused, not a crum. Old Charles all his life has had a bit of a sore head. I've always noticed it. So has Andrew. We've frequently laughed at it. Well, look, Alice, the funny thing with me is that the things I used to laugh at I don't laugh at now. They get me differently somehow." He smiled. "I'm doing a bit of thinking now, as I told you, and instead of laughing at them I think about them. Charles is an instance. I used to laugh at his sore head; now, somehow, I see him as lonely. That's what I meant when I used the word."

She smiled. "I like you, Sim, I like having you in the house."

He pantomimed a bow.

She said, "No, no, I'm not throwing bouquets at you. I just mean it, I just mean that there's something—something very clean about you, Sim."

His eyes in all this showed their familiar quizzing look. "Oh, I have a thorough good wash almost every day," he said.

She waved aside the banter. "Sim, if now you are going to think—going to be—what shall I say?—understanding, you will be more clean, more—helpful." She stopped. Then she said, "Sim, you couldn't, could you, stay here always?"

Her voice, with her question, had suddenly the note of appeal. Her question also was in itself surprising to him. His banter left him. "Always, Alice? By Jove, that's a long time."

"Sim, but I am serious." Her voice retained its note of appeal. "Hasn't Charles spoken to you about, now you've left the army, coming with him into the business?"

"In a way—yes, in a way."

"He will again. He'd like you to. He is fond of you, Sim—much fonder than of Andrew. Sim, if you did come into the business, you could live here. You haven't got a home now. This could be your home. Sim, it would make such a difference, having you here, to—to Charles."

She unmistakably was earnest. He said, "Alice, it's not a thing I could decide straight off, I mean coming into the business. I've only just given up the army. I want to look around a bit."

"Have you thought about it?"

"It's one of the possibilities, yes. But when I say look around a bit, there's more in making up my mind than—well, more than I can explain."

She said slowly, "I can see you will not."

"But I don't say that. It's a possibility. I might."

She shook her head. "Something tells me you won't."

Her words were a murmur as though, spoken to herself, they but echoed a certitude previously made to herself. She sat up then in her chair and on a new note said, "Sim."

He gave her his attention.

"That won't happen. I know it. There is something instead that I want from you."

He smiled, "The half of my kingdom, Alice."

"No, it's serious. I want a promise, Sim Just this." She stopped as though hesitant to propose it. Then she said, "I want you to promise me that if ever Charles wanted you, you would come to him immediately."

"You don't mean wanted me in the business——"

She shook her head.

"Just wanted to see me? Of course I promise. That's easy."

She said, "I've made it too easy. He might not ask you. I mean promise to come to him immediately if—if some trouble came on him—some big trouble."

Sim said, "Why, Alice, this does sound serious. Trouble? Is some trouble likely to? Old Charles——"

"Sim, I only want your promise."

"But, Alice, you must tell me. Trouble? Sickness, do you mean? Business? Is he ill? Worried?"

She brought her hands together in her lap and tightly clasped them. "No, no—nothing of that—nothing whatever. I said I had made this too easy. Now I have taken it too far. Listen, Sim. This is a chance to talk to you and perhaps I won't get another. Just only listen, Sim. I told you just now that I am very fond of Charles, didn't I?"

He nodded.

"Well, you know how it is about a man making his will—they say that when, putting it off, he does it at last, he feels immensely happy, satisfied that whatever may happen now he has left everything settled. Well, this—this is my will that I want to make. I'm not going to die, so far as I know, but I'm fond of Charles and I'd want to know—I've been thinking about it lately—I do want to feel, to know, that if ever he wanted help, was in bad trouble—like, just for example, anything happening to me—you would go to him at once." She stopped.

Sim said immediately. "Of course I promise, Alice."

She leaned back in her chair and faintly smiled at him, conveying to him precisely the simile she had drawn—that of a man relieved, made happy, assured, by having at last made his will.

He smiled return and said again, "Of course I promise, Alice." He got up and went over to her. "Now just fancy you worrying about old Charles and what he'll do if anything ever happens to you, like that!" He touched her face and she put up her hands and patted his hand. "You are a good little soul, you know. That's how I have always thought of you—one of the good ones."

She seemed to flinch. "Ah, don't say good."

"Real good."

She pressed his hand against her cheek. She said aloud, "But Sim, it has been serious, hasn't it? First, that you promise to remember always that I am fond of Charles; second, that if ever he should be in trouble—"

"Remembered by heart—promised by oath—Sim Paris, his mark."

He bent and made as it were a sign upon her forehead with his finger.

She caught her breath, "Oh, Sim!"

CHARLES'S wife that night scarcely exchanged words with Conrad Bryne. The young doctor, Charles's new friend, arrived while she was at picquet with Sim; and Charles, who had been looking on, went out to greet him and took him straight into the dining-room where was set out the chessboard. He left in a hurry, having a case to call in at before he went home, he said; no more than looked in on the picquet-players; announced that he would just take a peep at the patient upstairs; came down with," Dozing quietly, all well," and then with, "Well, I'll be round in the morning, Mrs. Paris," was gone.

The picquet had finished. Outside was the sound of the starting of the doctor's car, Charles with him. "Coming again to-morrow, is he?" said Sim. "He seems to attend old Gand much oftener than the other chap did. What was the old doctor's name?"

Alice was across the room, setting the cards in a drawer. "Blake," she said. She made no comment.

Charles came in.

Sim said, "Ah, old man, let's see—I'm coming up with you for a day in town when you go to office to-morrow. What hideous hour did you say?"

"Nine-five from the station, quarter to nine from here, eight-fifteen breakfast."

"Like a book! Right, I'll stagger down eight-fifteen on the tick. How did the chess go, Charles?"

Charles rubbed his hands together. He was more animated than was his wont. "I won. Two out of three."

"Good for you. He's a nice fellow, that doctor. I like him."

"Oh, he's a good fellow, yes. We're great friends."

"Attentive, too, at his job, I mean. Comes pretty well every day, doesn't he?"

"Every second day. Oh, yes; he's keen!"

"He must be. You'd have thought that, seeing old Gand quite O. K. just now, he wouldn't have wanted to come to-morrow."

Alice said, "Well, I'm going to bed. It's bedtime, I think."

SHE had heard the result of the chess. Nevertheless she asked it of Conrad Bryne when on the morrow he came to his patient. He was shown in to her in the morning-room. When the maid had closed the door, "I scarcely got a word with you last night," he said.

They had conventionally greeted at his entry. She now was standing facing him and at his remark she returned no words, but made with her hands a little outward gesture. "What would you?" it seemed to say.

He stood looking at her. Doctor Blake, who had not shown himself so attentive in visits here as his successor, always went his round punctiliously tail-coated and silk-hatted. Conrad Bryne, who had left a hard felt hat in the hall, wore a blue suit, the jacket cut reefer fashion, contributing perhaps to the navy air he had about him. He was strongly built, deep-chested, his arms long and their wrists and hands noticeably powerful. His face, with no soft contours, was of the chiseled sort, the eyes set deep, the mouth long and firmly chinned, his hair a little gray at the temples. He was to be noted, seen in repose, as the type that breathes deeply, giving, with strength of figure and of face and with steadiness of eye (as had he), the impression of much force of character, much strength of purpose. Nevertheless, though in repose now as he stood and looked upon the wife of Charles, his breathing was not deep, but quick; the expression of his mouth not firm, but emotional; of his eyes not calm, but speaking.

Her own eyes, fixed on his, were also speaking.

She took her breath on a sharp catch. It was as though the thoughts she read within his eyes, mingling with those she knew he read in hers, caused an emotion that, mounting, choked her. But her words, to cover perhaps a signal he might take from that catch at her breath, were conventional.

"Who won the chess?"

"He did."

Conrad Bryne paused and then he added, "He wouldn't have. I let him."

"Why did you let him?"

A space before she had answered a question of his, also relating to the previous evening, by gesture. It now was he who gestured and his motion was the same as hers had been, an outward turning of his hands. Hers, replying to why they had not talked, was "What would you?" and it was code, done in that swift understanding which those in the relations of these two have for "How can we speak when we are watched?" His now, replying to why had he let Charles win, was "How could I other?" and in the code-book she read, "I am terribly wronging that man—how can I bear to triumph over him?"

Again she caught her breath. Here was the fire with which she was playing—and she was at bottom too virtuous to be able to warm her desires at it without suffering pang for the man she was deceiving. The like infirmity was Conrad Bryne's. Here was the reason that brought him to this house—and he was at bottom too upright to be able to foster his passion for her without suffering pang for the man he was betraying.

Wrong—if falseness to honor may be called wrong in an age that holds right and wrong to be but arbitrary standards, self-determination to be the only principle of conduct—demands a bolder front than such.

"We had better go up-stairs," she said.

UP-STAIRS, "Patient is well this morning," Swiss Jule greets them.

Swiss Jule's voice—when he does speak—is entirely without tone, expressionless. He speaks—when he does speak—in no kind of exclamation or explanation, but in plain and undecorated statements; and he speaks them as if he were reciting from a paper bald announcements in which he personally has neither part nor interest. "Patient has been in conversation ever since breakfast."

"Not spoken, has he?" inquires Conrad Bryne.

Patient at rare intervals is known to make a few words (one of the reason's why Charles dare not ever leave the house on holiday), but the question is perfunctory. Yet the sailor in this doctor gives even his perfunctory remarks a sturdy ring; he knows what Alice and what Charles think of Swiss Jule; but for his own part he just takes Swiss Jule as one of the slow dull sort, and always has a fresh, encouraging way toward him. "Not spoken, has he?"

"Patient has not spoken."

"Understands as well as ever?"

"Patient perfectly understands."

"Maintains the interest?"

"Patient will listen by the hour."

"How you find things to say to him!" comes murmur of Charles's wife.

Conrad Bryne has crossed to the table where lies the nursing-chart and has taken it up and is deep in it. Charles's wife has met Swiss Jule's eyes, has felt the silence, and to break it has given the sound of a little laugh and of that murmured sentence. "How you find things to say to him!"

Swiss Jule smooths back a whisp of hair from Patient's brow and looking down addresses Patient. "There is plenty to say. Patient is interested in everything that goes on in the house, isn't Patient? Patient heard doctor's arrival and would know what kept him so long down-stairs, wouldn't Patient?"

Conrad Bryne has done with the chart and lays it down and comes toward them. "Eh, what's that?" says Conrad Bryne.

Swiss Jule's eyes with his question to Patient have lifted up to the eyes of Charles's wife (who averts hers). Then his eyes go to Conrad Bryne. "Patient is pleased, I am telling Mrs. Paris, by the greater frequency of your visits, doctor, than of Doctor Blake's. Patient would have me tell you that he has noticed it."

Conrad Bryne, the sailor, takes face-values and at the face-value of this is pleased and laughs. "More time on my hands, perhaps." He comes to the bed and smiles down genially on Patient. "Well, how are we feeling to-day? Pretty fine?"

Charles's wife, the woman, looks deeper than face-values, and looking deeper here seems in Swiss Jule's words to find that which causes tinge of color on her cheeks and makes her look away. Professional whispers now engage the doctor and the attendant.

Remotely crouched away behind those bars that are his wasted body, old Gand, not Patient, dimly is discernible by Charles's wife. Of what is he thinking while he has received those questions of Swiss Jule about the doctor's long delay down-stairs? What has Swiss Jule been saying to him? What to Swiss Jule have those eyes in reply been saying? Dimly within those clouded orbs of his the wife of Charles perceives him as of old she knew him, the power, the autocrat. His

ONLY ONE SALAD DRESSING WILL DO SO MANY THINGS

Let us send you the little book that describes 63 of Premier's uses —some for cold dishes, some for hot.

A DELICIOUS salad dressing? Of course! A million women will tell you nothing else makes salads so appetizing. And thousands of them will tell you, too, that Premier's usefulness only begins with salads.

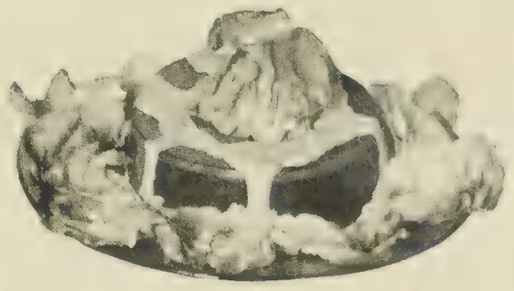
Baked potatoes, cauliflower, asparagus, croquettes, lobster Newburg, Welsh rarebits —not to speak of scores of other dishes— all take on new zest with a dash of Premier's flavor.



For the same flavor that made Premier the most widely used salad dressing in America is making it an essential ingredient in all sorts of dishes you have probably never associated with salad dressing at all.

Send for the Premier Book. It describes 63 ways of using Premier's piquant flavor in making old dishes new again. It gives plenty of answers to the question: "What new things can I give them?" We shall be glad to send it to you free, no matter where you live.

Yu-hoo!

The summer calls. It beckons you to the out-of-doors; to the shore; to the lakes and mountains. Sheer dress will reflect your freedom. But joy, and happiness, and love cannot be yours if you do not actually destroy that most offensive of all handicaps—

Superfluous Hair

IT'S OFF because IT'S OUT

The day of experimenting is past. You are too sensible to listen to flowery promises and to buy mystic preparations by mail—and then regret. With ZIP you take no chances, for as the N. Y. World says, it has been "officially decided to be effective."

My sincerest advice is that it is better to let your superfluous hair grow than to use pumice stone with fancy names and fancy handles. Any article which massages the skin tends to grow hair, just as massaging the scalp grows hair.

Quick as a wink you can free yourself of superfluous hair. And remember, you are not merely removing surface hair—you actually lift out the roots with the hairs, gently, painlessly, and harmlessly, and in this way destroy the growth. Use ZIP once and you will never resort to ordinary depilatories.

THE INCREASING PURPOSE

lower lip has fallen away from his teeth, and dimly in that sardonic, sulky twist it has she can perceive him as she has been told of him of old, the dragon and the mighty one. His eyes are moving. Slowly, laboriously they move from Swiss Jule, laboriously crawl along to Conrad Bryne and fix on him and settle there. What thinking?

Conrad Bryne, receiving Jule's report while he listens and questions, is touching old Gand here and there; inserts a finger down the neck of his sleeping-suit; rests fingers on his wrist; slightly raises a hand and lets it drop; touches the forehead; twists between finger and thumb a wisp of the grizzled hair; with the back of his knuckles nonchalantly presses up the corner of the drooping, sulky lip and lets it fall, sardonic, sulky, back again.

It is, as Sim had said to her, all rather horrible. Old Gand might be a corpse. But old Gand is not a corpse. Patient is a corpse—Patient receives these indignities mute, indifferent, imperturbable as death. Old Gand, no corpse though crouched unfathomably deep within a corpse, is here, is watching Conrad with those dull unfathomable orbs, is thinking—what?

A small shudder takes Alice. "The bedsore spot is healed," comes Jule's voice, and she is returned to that going on between the doctor and the nurse of him upon the bed.

"Will you care to look?"

The words are a question, but Swiss Jule's toneless voice delivers them void of interrogation, a toneless statement only; and to emit them his mouth, a thin dark line upon the olive face, seems scarcely to open, his lips do not appear to move at all.

"Will you care to look?"

"I'd better look," says Conrad Bryne.

Swiss Jule—salesman indifferently heaving up a specimen—puts his hands beneath Patient, and Conrad Bryne a hand on Patient's shoulder, and they roll him over, the mighty one, and strip his back, the autocrat, and point and peer and roll him back and pat him down again, the power and the driving force.

The back of his head is on the pillow again. His eyes, the wife of Charles observes and catches at her breath, again are awfully slowly moving. They have done with Conrad Bryne; discovered what? They now, laboriously and awfully slowly, are seeking (well she knows it) her. She would move, move her gaze or her station, but those eyes are old Gand's eyes, commanding her (she knows) to wait there; and as in a nightmare, leaden, incapable, terrified, she watches them most awfully slowly crawl toward her. They reach her, fix her, settle down upon her. She tries to smile. She can not. She is aware, perfectly aware though she can not see it, that Swiss Jule is looking at her, studying and perfectly well understanding the ordeal she is going through. The eyes are on her; knowing what?

She makes an effort; she puts out a hand between those eyes and hers and turns it this way and that as though examining something upon it; behind its shield she averts at last her gaze, and it is then Swiss Jule's look she meets, the look that has that glimmer at the corners of the mouth, and tonelessly he says to her, "Patient is wonderful, is he not? Patient understands everything that is going on."

IT IS over. They leave the room and come down-stairs.

The stairs in that big Victorian house were wide and they trod down together. "I dread that room," Alice said, and spoke the words on the emotional catch that was the setback of the strain she had been undergoing.

Conrad Bryne's hand hanging beside hers took hers and pressed it. "I know you do."

They went to the drawing-room. The door was ajar and he pressed it open for her and followed her in.

"I hate to hear you say there is anything you dread. I hate that in all the world there should be anything to give you unhappiness. That is how I think of you."

She averted her eyes. "He is a spy, that Jule."

"What can he possibly have to spy on?"

"He knows what there is between us."

He gave an exclamation, a sound as though control were leaving him. She was turned away from standing with him in the middle of the room. He put his hand about her elbow. "You say he knows what there is between us. By God," his voice was trembling, "by God he knows more than I do. What is there between us?"

She turned toward him and gave him swimming eyes.

"Oh, how can you ask?"

He said, his voice not trembling now but immensely deep, making within her chords to vibrate, "What has there ever been between us that any one might not see?"

"Oh, how can you ask?"

He said, "There has been nothing. Looks, thoughts, secret understandings, what has there been to see in these? There scarcely have been words that all the household might not hear. Only thoughts. Alice, I can go on, on thought alone, no longer."

HE CAUGHT her hands. "Alice, there shall be, there must be, things between us that others, by our fate, must not see; there shall, there must be, words between us that others may not hear. There shall and must be—now. I love you; I love you."

Alice gasped, "Oh, this is terrible."

But Conrad Bryne caught her to him, his arms about her, his face alight with adoration bent to hers, his voice impassioned. "Oh terrible only in the immensity of my love. I love you; I love you. I have fought against it. I have held out my hands to the things that stand between us, to what they call honor, to what they call right, and begged them to defeat me and overcome me. Alice, in the night, night upon night, I literally have stretched out my arms into the darkness and besought the powers of these things to stop my heart, to stop my love, to call upon everything that is sacred in me to join them and defeat me and help me tear you from my life and help me go away; and in the morning, always, I have gone to my beloved and my darling for one more look——"

"Oh, terrible!" her murmur came.

"And I have seen my lovely darling, seen my darling dear; and I have known that nothing in me is sacred, that nothing to me in all the world is sacred, but only she, but only you, beloved."

Her eyes were almost closed; her head hung slightly back; the weight almost of all her body was upon his arms; almost she seemed to faint.

He said, "Now, now. there have been things between us which others may not hear. My heart that would have burst within me otherwise is welling now on you, on you. Oh, Alice, how do these things happen? I had known you weeks. I thought nothing of you. There suddenly was a night here in this very room after dinner when I looked up and saw you with half the lamplight, half the shadow on your face. God, how do these things happen?"

"Why do they happen?" came her voice.

He cried with an intensity greater suddenly than yet his voice had had: "Because of love. Because love knows its own and seeks its own, and finds through every obstacle its own, and—Alice, listen to me."

He stopped. She was commanded, and she breathed, "Oh, what?"

"Open your eyes."

She opened them. As if her eyelids had been veils which lifted for the first time revealed her fully to him, he breathed, "Oh, Alice."

He said, "And it has happened because love through every obstacle must join its own."

He put his mouth on hers.

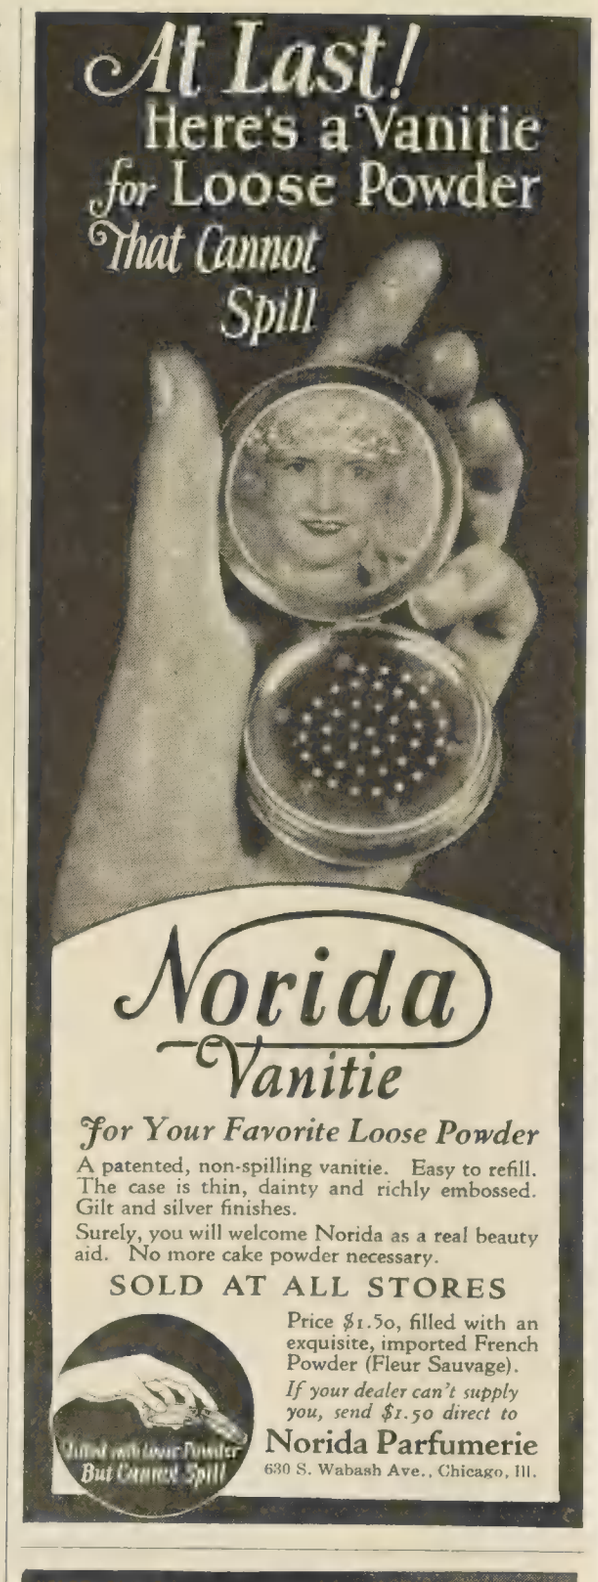
"Return my kiss."

He felt her lips just move.

"Say that you love me. I must hear it. Say 'I love you.' "

Her whisper came "I dare not."

"Say it."



She gave a broken sound. "I dare not say that I love you." She gave a sound of laugh that broke a sob or sob that broke a laugh. "I will say it in French."

"In French then."

Her hands while he held her had been upon his elbows. She puts her arms suddenly about him in clasp the equal of his own. She cried, with drawn-out bliss of utterance upon the intimate and passionate "thee":

"Je t'aime! Je t'aime!"

My Hands
Ever Soft and Young

By Edna Wallace Hopper

I am a stage star. I wash my hands 20 times a day in all sorts of water. You who wash dishes, clothes, etc., don't attack the skin as I do.

Yet my hands are soft and smooth. They form one of my chief attractions.

I spent 25 years to find a lotion which would do that. I tried numberless kinds—almost everything that experts submitted. But I have only lately found my ideal. Now I offer it to all women, as I do with every great help I have found. I supply it to all toilet counters under the name of Edna Wallace Hopper's Youth Hand Lotion. It is made in the laboratory which evolved it, exactly as I use it.

I ask you to try it. Apply it at night and see what a change comes by morning. Apply it whenever your hands touch water which may harden or dry or chap them. Use it to keep your hands looking as young and soft and tender as your face.

I will mail you a sample of my Youth Lotion free if you will send this coupon. Do that, for your own sake. Learn the best that I have found in many years of searching. Clip coupon now.

AS PIONEERS IN THE FIELD OF ORAL HYGIENE, WE BELIEVE THAT THE MAKERS OF LISTERINE ARE LOGICALLY QUALIFIED TO INTRODUCE THIS NEW AND DRASTIC NOTE INTO DENTIFRICE ADVERTISING. AND WE BELIEVE THAT A VERY DEFINITE PUBLIC BENEFIT WILL RESULT FROM THIS ENDEAVOR TO MAKE THE NATION PROPERLY CONSCIOUS OF THE DISEASE DANGERS THAT MAY RESULT FROM TOOTH ABSCESSES.—LAMBERT PHARMACAL COMPANY.

YOUR DENTIST MAY BE ABLE TO ADD MANY PRECIOUS YEARS TO YOUR LIFE—BETTER SEE HIM!

Hidden wells of poison

To all appearances she was the picture of health, yet a dental X-ray revealed hidden wells of poison that, neglected, might have cut short her life by many years

She was a beautiful girl. She had a host of friends and many suitors. To all appearances she was the picture of health. Rarely did even a slight illness interrupt her program of pleasure.

Suddenly one summer she started complaining of a rheumatic ailment. The trouble became more intense, and she finally sought the aid of a physician. His remedies did not help her.

So she changed doctors. And the first thing the new physician did was to send her to a dentist for an X-ray of her teeth and a report as to their condition. Outwardly they appeared all right. But the X-ray picture revealed several bad abscesses. These hidden wells of poison had been seeping their deadly bacteria into her system and had unquestionably caused the rheumatism.

Once attended to by her dentist, the rheumatic trouble disappeared. Neglected, they might have brought on many other ailments and, in fact, might have cut short her life by many years.

Do you realize this?

Do you know that, according to eminent dental authorities, 78 out of 100 adults today have tooth abscesses: that usually they do not know it themselves and that such abscesses may directly cause many dread diseases?

Among the diseases so caused are rheumatism and joint diseases; heart and kidney trouble; stomach and intestinal derangements; to say nothing of more minor disorders ranging from simple headaches to insomnia and nervous affections.

In spite of these grave dangers that lurk in tooth abscesses, relatively few people today ever think of visiting a dentist until pain drives them there. Whereas, only a good dentist can really place you on the safe side.

Protect yourself

You are probably like most other human beings; so while at this moment you realize all these dangers you, too, will very likely put off going to your dentist.

In the meanwhile, however, you owe it to yourself to take one simple precaution: There is a dentifrice that will do very much to keep your teeth and gums in a healthy condition. Consequently, more and more dentists are today recommending Listerine Tooth Paste.

Because Listerine Tooth Paste, and this tooth paste only, contains all of the antiseptic essential oils of Listerine, the safe antiseptic. These healing ingredients help keep the gums firm and healthy and discourage the breeding of disease bacteria in the mouth.

Quick results—and safe!

This is an age when people want quick results. Listerine Tooth Paste is so formulated that it cleans your teeth with a minimum of brushing, calling for much less effort than is ordinarily required.

Also, this paste cleans with absolute safety. The specially prepared cleanser it contains is just hard enough to discourage tartar formation, yet not hard enough to scratch or injure tooth enamel. And, of course, you know how precious tooth enamel is!

Finally, Listerine Tooth Paste is sold at a price that is fair—large tube 25 cents—the right price to pay for a good tooth paste. Try it. Enjoy really clean teeth. But don't forget the importance of seeing your dentist regularly.—Lambert Pharmacal Company, Saint Louis, U. S. A.

If your dentist has not already handed you our booklet on tooth abscesses and a sample of our dentifrice, you may have both of these by addressing a postal to the Lambert Pharmacal Co., Saint Louis.

Remove Cold Cream

this safe, economical way

IF you have ever had skin blemishes, enlarged pores or blackheads you know how unsightly they are. How they can ruin even the most perfect complexion.

This offers a new way to remove cold cream and cosmetics. A way known to America's most famous actresses—women who use heavy makeup constantly. Their problem was to keep their skins soft and lovely in spite of hard use.

This new way is Kleenex—a soft velvety absorbent made of Cellucotton. It is clean, sanitary, safe. It is economical—simply throw it away after using.

Even the cleanest towels or cloths may cause skin troubles—they may carry germs or bits of soap caustic to inflame the pores.

Kleenex, besides being safer, is more economical. You owe it to your skin at least to give it this simple care. Get Kleenex, today. There are about 200 sheets (size 6 by 7 inches) in a 25c box, enough for about a month. At all drug and department stores.

some of us pay for them—Amarias, what did you and Emeline come to see me about to-night? What was the real reason?"

Amarias was the picture of innocence, innocence hurt but forgiving.

"Why, just what I told you, Lettice," he declared. "We've been thinkin' about poor father, how much he thought of us all and how he would like to see the family—er—united again, as you might say. We've come to tell you we're sorry for the way we've treated you—if we have treated you that way—and ask you to do as we're goin' to do, let bygones be bygones. After all, we're all Peels."

"Yes, so we are. I realize that. Perhaps that is why I asked you what you came for. What was it, Amarias?"

"Why—why, nothin'. Nothin' except what I've said. And, because we're interested, as members of the family, to ask you what you planned doin', now that you've got the ten thousand and—and the—er—rest of it. Are you goin' to keep on with the shop?"

"Probably. I haven't decided yet."

"Um-hum. I see. Well, that's right. Take plenty of time and think it over."

"I shall."

"That's right, that's right— Er—how about the A B C houses? Goin' to keep those, are you? Or sell 'em?"

"I don't know. Do you know any one who might buy them?"

Mr. Peel shook his head. His wife was watching him intently, but he did not so much as glance at her.

"No-o," he said slowly. "No, I can't say as I do, exactly. They're all pretty well run down and ain't worth much. Of course that B house now, the one we all used to live in, you might dispose of that, perhaps. There was some talk of the town's buyin' it, but that may have blown over. You haven't heard anything along that line, have you, Lettice? Not that it makes any difference to us, of course. We're only interested on your account."

BEFORE she could answer there came another knock at the door. It was after nine o'clock, the rain and wind were as violent as ever, and the knock was a great surprise. Emeline started and looked at the clock.

"For mercy sakes, who's that?" she whispered. "Who else is comin' here, at this time of night? And such a night!"

Lettice was as surprised as the rest, but she rose and opened the door. A burst of wind-driven water entered and with it two bedraggled figures, the figures of Susanna and Abner Crusit. Amarias and Emeline stared at them and they—as soon as breath and clear vision returned—stared at Emeline and Amarias. Lettice looked at all four of her visitors. Her expression was at first one of great astonishment. Then it changed. Her lips twitched and, for an instant, she seemed on the point of bursting into a laugh. But she did not. When she spoke—and she was the first to speak—her tone was as casually cheerful as if the call was the most natural thing in the world.

"Good evening," she said. "How nice of you to come on such a stormy night! Give me your umbrella. Take off your wet things right away and sit down."

Mr. Crusit was holding the soaked umbrella and she took it from his unresisting fingers. Then she moved to assist his wife with her waterproof. Susanna was struggling hard to recover her composure. She glanced at Amarias and Emeline, frowned, swallowed, and managed to force a smile.

"It is an awful night," she admitted. "Good evening, Amarias. Good evening, Emeline. No, Lettice, I don't know as we would have come if we had realized how bad it was. But we thought of course you would be all alone, and——"

Her husband put in a word. He had been carefully schooled before leaving home, had rehearsed his lesson over and over again, and now he felt it time to begin the recitation.

"We cal'lated you'd be surprised to see us, Lettice," he announced. "We knew you would. But the fact is Susanna and I have been plannin' to come and see you ever since Father Peel died. We've been thinkin' things over and it seemed to us that——"

Susanna cut him short. Amarias and Emeline were pricking up their ears and she felt it high time to prevent further disclosures.

"There, there," she interrupted sharply. "Don't stand there preaching, with that sopping wet coat on."

"Eh? Why, Susanna, I was just goin' to say what you——"

"Take off that coat, I tell you. You can talk afterward. Thank you, Lettice. Oh, just hang it up anywhere where it won't drip— Well," turning to her brother, "I didn't expect to see you and Emeline here, Amarias. What started you out in such a rain-storm?"

Amarias looked hurt. "Lettice is my half-sister as well as yours," he said reprovingly. "Emeline and I knew that she was all alone—that is, we expected she would be, naturally—and we felt it our duty to come and see her. That was all. So we—er—we came."

Susanna nodded. "Yes, I see you've come," she observed. "Be still, Abner—It's the first time you've come for a long time, isn't it?"

Mr. Peel coughed. "It is—er—yes," he admitted. "But better late than never. Emeline and I have been tellin' Lettice that—we ought to please father by gettin' together again, lettin' bygones be bygones and startin' fresh. I told you that is what we came for, didn't I, Lettice?"

Lettice nodded.

"That is what you told me, Amarias," she answered gravely.

Mr. Crusit's mouth opened.

"Why, sho! That's odd," he exclaimed. "Susanna and I came here to say the very same thing. Didn't we, Susanna?"

"Why—why, yes, it was," she affirmed. "That was it, exactly. Abner and I have been thinking a great deal since poor father—er——"

"Passed on," suggested Emeline.

"Yes, that's it. We came to the conclusion that perhaps we hadn't acted exactly right to you, Lettice. Though," with a sudden dash of acidity, "we didn't suppose—we hadn't the least reason for supposing that anybody else felt the same way."

Lettice beamed upon them all. "But you see they did," she said. "This is a real family reunion, isn't it? Now we can chat about family affairs and enjoy ourselves."

Apparently they could, but nevertheless they did not. The talk which followed dealt with almost everything except the affairs of the members of the Peel family. There was a general air of restraint and embarrassment and, of the five, Lettice Booker seemed to be the only one who was enjoying the reunion. The time dragged and so did the conversation. Ten o'clock struck and so did eleven. Emeline stifled a yawn and glanced at the clock on the mantel, then appealingly at her husband. Abner Crusit's eyes shut and remained shut for minutes at a time. He, too, looked wistfully at his wife. But Susanna was as oblivious of the look as Amarias seemed to be of his wife's behavior. Neither of them made a move to go. At last, however, Emeline, in desperation, called attention to the hour.

"I—I don't suppose you noticed it, dearie," she said, addressing her husband, "but—but don't you think we ought to be startin' home pretty soon? Course we've all had such a nice sociable talk together that we haven't thought of the time, but it's most twelve o'clock."

Mr. Peel received this suggestion with a tightening of the lips and a venomous glance in her direction. But Mr. Crusit came promptly to the rescue.

"We've all got to be goin', I should say," he declared, taking care not to look at his wife as he did so. "Lettice must think we're planning to stay to breakfast. Come now, Susanna. Get on your things."

Mrs. Crusit's glance was a counterpart of her brother's. She and Amarias regarded each other defiantly. Lettice's smile was the essence of cordiality.

"Oh, don't hurry!" she begged. "Just think how long it has been since we were all together like this. And I am having such a good time. Aren't you?"

Emeline and Abner vowed that they were. Susanna and Amarias said nothing, but continued to look at each other. Then the former rose from her chair.

"We must go, of course," she said. "It is the middle of the night and we must all go. Get my waterproof, Abner. Amarias, you and Emeline will walk along with us. We're all going in the same direction. Come."

Amarias hesitated, but, as she made no move to don the waterproof which her husband was holding for her and it was obvious that she would not do so until he put on the coat which Emeline had ready for him, he also rose.

"I suppose we have got to be goin'," he admitted. "As you say, Susanna, we'll all four walk along together. Good night, Lettice. This has been a wonderful evenin'. I hope father knows about it. It would make him very happy."

Lettice nodded. "Yes, wouldn't it?" she said.

Susanna clasped her hand. "You'll come and see us, won't you, Lettice," she urged. "And, remember, if there is anything Abner and I can do to help you in any way—if you want advice about—well, business or anything—remember to call on us for it. Abner's a wonderful business man. Father always said so."

After the others had crossed the threshold Amarias, who had maneuvered into the position of rear-guard, breathed a word in his half-sister's ear.

"Lettice," he whispered hurriedly, "could you see me alone some time to-morrow? Not in the shop, you know, but here. I've got a little matter I want to talk with you about."

Lettice reflected.

"I generally shut up the shop for an hour at noon," she whispered in return. "I shall be alone here to-morrow between twelve and one."

"All right, I'll be here sharp at twelve. Don't tell anybody I'm comin'. And, Lettice, don't— Yes, yes, Emeline, here I am."

The door closed behind them. A moment later, however, it opened again and Mrs. Crusit slipped in.

"I declare if I didn't forget one of my rubbers," she explained. "Only put one of them on and not until I stepped right in a puddle did I find it out. Oh, and Lettice, there is a little something Abner and I want to talk over with you. Kind of private, just between you and us, so don't tell Amarias or anybody. Suppose Abner and I came around here early to-morrow morning before you opened the shop—could you see us right after breakfast—well, say, at half-past seven?"

"Certainly, Susanna."

"All right. We'll come then— Oh, is that you, Amarias? Yes, I've found my rubber. Good night, Lettice."

Her brother glanced sharply at her and at his half-sister, but Susanna gave him no opportunity to speak or question. She took his arm and pulled him away from the door. Lettice heard their footsteps splash away into the rainy darkness. Then she closed the door once more and smiled, a smile which broadened into a laugh. Then she sat down by the stove to think. It was after one when she rose to prepare for bed.

THE Crusits were prompt in keeping their appointment. As a matter of fact, it lacked ten minutes of the agreed-upon hour of seven-thirty when Lettice heard them coming up the walk to the back door. When she opened that door, they entered hurriedly and Susanna took pains to close it carefully behind them.

"I don't want anybody to see us here so early," she explained. "There has been talk enough about us Peels already and there is no sense in starting more. Lettice, Abner and I have come to talk over a little private business and we want it kept private. Abner, pull down that curtain."

Mr. Crusit, obedient as always, drew the window-shade down to the sill. His wife pulled a chair up to the table and sat down.

"Sit down, Lettice," she urged. "Abner, you sit down, too, and let me do the talking. Lettice, we've been thinking, Abner and I, about those three houses of ours—I mean of father's—yours they are now. What everybody calls the A B C houses. Have you decided yet what you are going to do with those houses?"

Lettice looked puzzled.

"Do with them?" she repeated. "Why, what do you mean?"

Abner opened his mouth, but his wife promptly closed it.

"Sshh!" she commanded. "Didn't I say I'd do the talking? Listen, Lettice. There is a story going around that the selectmen have dug up that old plan of theirs to buy the B house—the one we all used to live in, the one father lived and died in—and tear it down so that Cross Street can run through to Water Street. You've heard the story, I guess, haven't you?"

The look which accompanied the question was sharply scrutinizing, but Lettice gave no sign that she was aware of the scrutiny.

"Yes," she said calmly, "I've heard of it."

"I thought so. And hasn't Noah Didlow been here already to see you about buying the B house?"

"Yes. He came yesterday."

"I knew he did," triumphantly. "Somebody saw him go into your shop and that somebody told Abner, and I told Abner that was exactly what he came for. Lettice," anxiously, "you didn't sell that house to the town, did you?"

"No, Susanna."

"You didn't say you would sell it, did you?"

"No, Susanna."

"What did you say?"

"I said I would think it over. I said I hadn't made up my mind what to do with any of those houses yet. Why?"

"I'll tell you why in just a minute. My, I'm thankful you didn't agree to sell. But just tell me this first—how much did that Didlow man offer for the B house? You don't mind telling us, do you? It's all in the family."

Lettice smiled. "I don't mind at all," she replied. "He offered me two thousand dollars for it."

The Crusits looked at each other. Susanna shook her head.

"That's a lot of money for that old house," she declared. "And there isn't much land. Yes, that's a lot of money— But, Lettice, I'm awful glad you didn't sell. Why didn't you?"

"Because, as I say, I'm not sure what I want to do with those houses yet. Why are you so glad?"

"Oh, for a lot of reasons. I suppose most folks would say I was foolish and sentimental, but I can't bear—Abner and I can't bear—to think of that house going out of the Peel family. I lived there when I was a girl."

"Yes, we all lived there. Father and you and I—and Amarias."

MRS. CRUSIT noted the momentary hesitation before the name of her brother. She leaned forward.

"Amarias," she repeated. "Amarias hasn't been here since last night, has he?"

"Why, no. What makes you think he had?"

"Nothing, nothing. There isn't any reason why he should, of course. Lettice, don't sell that house to the town, will you?"

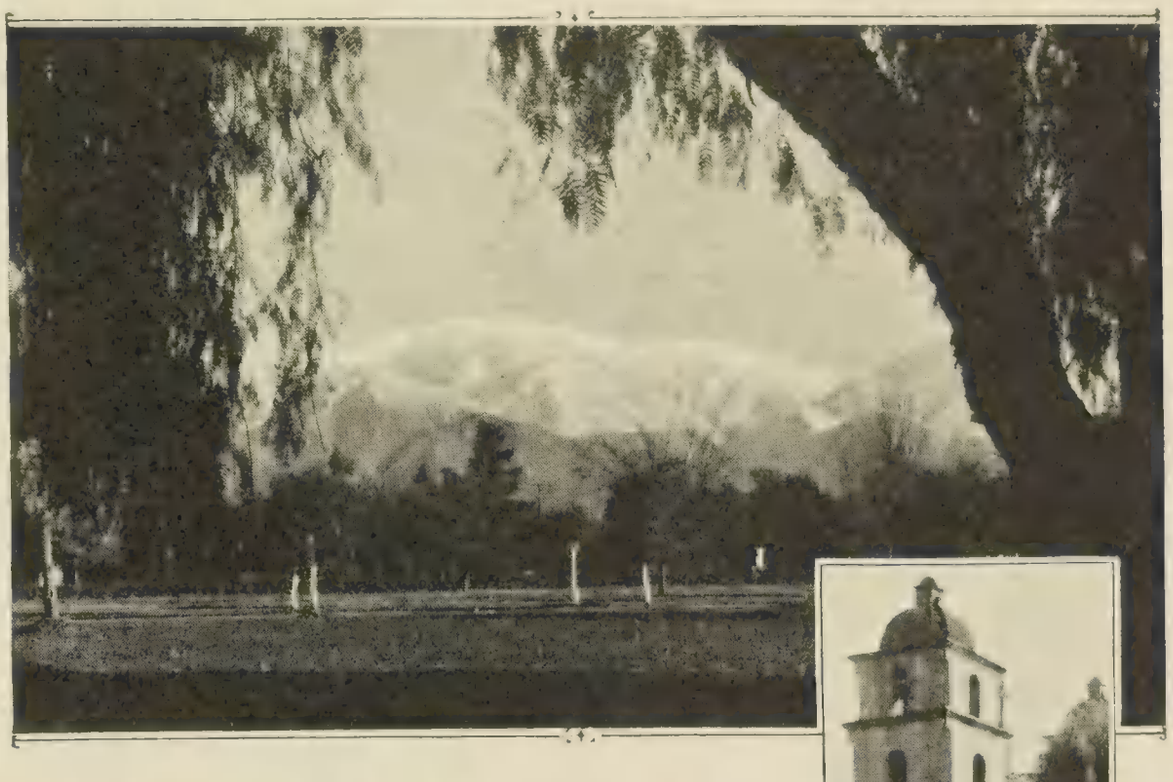
Lettice seemed to hesitate. "I don't know," she said. "I haven't a great deal of money and——"

"No, no, of course you haven't. We understand that, Abner and I. Don't we, Abner?"

"Sure thing," declared Mr. Crusit eagerly. "That's what we've been thinkin' about. We realize you might feel you'd ought to sell all three houses, and so——"

"Sshh! I'll tell her what we realized. Lettice, Abner and I have been thinking about your affairs, just as he says, and we could see how you might feel obliged to sell so as to have the money to live on. We don't blame you for that at all. But we can't bear to let the old house go out of the family, and so we've decided to do something to help you out. We can afford to, can't we, Abner?"

"Sure thing we can. You see, Lettice——"



"Hush! Yes, we can afford to. Abner's doing very well in his store and we've got some money to spare. Lettice, we'll buy that B house of you and we'll give you—yes, we'll give you just as much as the town would give. We will—and we'll pay cash, too."

If Lettice was not surprised, she certainly gave a good imitation of being so. Her surprise was gratifying—and reassuring.

"Why—why, Susanna," she exclaimed, "do you mean that you and Abner really want to buy father's old home—yourselves?"

Susanna nodded. "We mean just that,"

The Children's Greatest Summer

—let it be their next

THE routine of school, as well as that of business and household affairs, is wearing. A child's need of change is even greater than an adult's. That's why school vacations are so long. The more different that change the better for the child.

The greatest change this country offers lies in Southern California. The cool temperature there in summer will perhaps surprise you.

The U. S. Weather Bureau's forty-seven-year official record is as follows (average mean temperatures taken in a great central city in this section): June, 66 degrees; July, 70 degrees; August, 71 degrees; September, 69 degrees. You would sleep under blankets practically every night in a three-months' summer stay.

But it is the air, the mountains, valleys, orange groves, missions, ocean, desert—the endless variety—that give this land its charm.

Five thousand miles of perfect motor roads, or a net-work of trolley lines, take you through a lovely country to a myriad interesting points—all within 200 miles of the world's "wonder city," Los Angeles. Golf, bathing, fishing—all these sports are here at their best.

And you count on rainless days throughout the summer—no weather interruptions for your children's glorious playtime.

The sights they'll see, the observations they will make, the new impressions they will gain of Nature as it is in this unusual place will be invaluable to them.

And the railroad journey from the east gives an idea of the Great West that no geography can teach.

Make this a great "family trip" to Southern California this summer. The children never will forget it, nor will you.

Special low round-trip railroad rates from May 15 to October 31 make it easy to come now.

Ask your nearest railroad ticket agent for information, or mail coupon below to us. Send it today.

she affirmed. "Of course we don't really want to buy it—why should we?—but we will buy it rather than have it go out of the family. If you feel you've got to sell, we'll buy. You won't lose anything and the B house will belong to a Peel the same as it always has. That's what we mean. Now what do you say?"

Lettice said nothing at the moment. Then she slowly shook her head.

"It's awfully good of you, Susanna," she declared. "But I'm afraid I can't sell that house—not yet, at any rate."

Mrs. Crusit's expression changed.

"You can't!" she cried, her voice rising. "Why can't you? Don't you need the money?"

"Yes, I need it very much. But I can't—not yet, at any rate—make up my mind to sell the old home. Perhaps I may have to some day, but I sha'n't until I do have to. Not even to you."

"But—but we might—it is ridiculous, but we might give you a hundred dollars more than the town offers—just to help you that much, of course. There's no other reason."

"I know, and I thank you. But it isn't altogether a matter of price. Perhaps I am sentimental, too. No, I can't sell the B house—now."

"What will you do with it? If something isn't done pretty soon, it'll fall to pieces. So will the other two, as far as that goes. Now, Lettice dear, be reasonable. You are father's daughter, just as I am. You must use your common sense. That is what he would say."

"But he wouldn't sell when he was alive. No, Susanna, I shall keep the B house for a while. I may go and live in it myself. I have thought of that."

"Live in it! Live there all alone, when you're so snug and comfortable here?"

"I am snug enough, but as for the comfort— And father lived there alone."

"No, he didn't, he had a housekeeper."

Lettice smiled, a smile which later on the Crusits remembered.

"Well, perhaps I could find some one willing to live there with me," she said. "And, at any rate, I shall keep that house for a while. But I'll do this, Susanna, if it will please you and Abner. I will promise you not to sell the old home without giving you due notice. Then, if you still want to buy, you will have the chance."

THEY had to be contented with that, and, after all, it was a good deal. It blocked the town's bid and also Amarias's, should he be scheming as his sister believed him to be. Susanna sighed resignedly. Then she played the second best card in her hand. What was Lettice thinking of doing with the A and C houses, she asked.

"Of course you will get rid of them, at any rate," she said. "They'll only be white elephants on your hands and expensive ones, too. You intend to sell them, don't you?"

"Why, I might—if any one was foolish enough to buy them. That is, I might sell the A house, for that is empty. There is a tenant in the other."

Then followed a long, circuitous game in which Mrs. Crusit used all the skill she possessed. She spoke often of the Peel family, of her love for her dead father and of her desire to do anything in her power to make life easier for her half-sister. She and Abner were well-to-do, they could afford to make some sacrifices and wished to make them.

"Let us do this much for you, Lettice," she pleaded. "Let us take those other two houses off your hands. Of course we couldn't pay much, for they aren't really worth anything, but we'll pay a fair price."

"What do you think would be a fair price?"

"Well, I don't know. As I say, those two houses are falling to pieces, and I'm sure I don't know what we could do with them after we got them, but——"

And so on. At last it was divulged that the Crusits felt they might pay twelve hundred dollars each for the A and C houses. Lettice shook her head.

"I don't think I shall sell the C house," she said. "Some one—Mr. Crowell—lives there and, although the rent he pays isn't very much, it amounts to more than the interest I could get from twelve hundred dollars. In fact, it might be better business for me to keep both of them and see how things develop."

Susanna did not think so, neither did Abner. Besides, they had set their hearts—Susanna declared that she might as well own up to that—upon owning those houses, if not all three, then two, or even one.

It was after nine—long after the usual opening hour of the notion shop—when the visitors departed. A definite conclusion had been reached and a bargain made. Both conclusions and bargain were not entirely satisfactory to Mrs. Crusit and her husband, but they felt they had gained something. The B house Lettice had firmly refused to sell. She was quite as firm in her refusal to sell the C house. But the A house, the first one in the row was theirs. They were to pay her fourteen hundred dollars for it and the deeds were to be ready and the cash to be turned over at nine o'clock on Monday morning, two days later.

Susanna's emotion all but overcome her as she parted from her half-sister at the door.

"I'm so glad this has turned out as it has," she declared feelingly. "Abner and I have the satisfaction of knowing that we've helped you to get along a little easier, and now we are going to own at least one of the houses that father built with his own hands, as you might say. You'll keep the other two, for the present——"

"For the present—yes." Then, with the faint suspicion of a smile, she added: "I wonder what Amarias will say when he knows about it. He will be surprised, I guess."

Mrs. Crusit turned quickly. "I wouldn't say a word to him about it," she exclaimed. "I sha'n't and perhaps you hadn't better. He'll think we're foolish—he hasn't got a bit of sentiment—and he wouldn't understand. Suppose we don't tell him, not until after Monday, any way. Let's promise we won't. Shall we?"

Mrs. Booker promised. "I won't tell him," she said. "Good-by, Susanna. Good-by, Abner. Thank you very much for—for being so thoughtful of me and—so generous."

AS THEY passed out of the yard, Mr. Crusit voiced the doubt in his mind.

"Fourteen hundred is a whale of a price for that old shack of an A house," he mused. "It's more than anybody else would pay, by five hundred anyhow."

Susanna Crusit sniffed impatiently. "It's a thousand less than we can sell it for the minute Cross Street goes through to Water Street," she declared. "I only wish we could have bought the other two. Well, we've got back a little of our own that father cheated us out of, and we've got partway even with that Lettice woman. One of the best things we did was to get her to give us the refusal of the B house. That's a spike in Amarias's guns. He was planning to buy those houses, you mark my words. He'll have to give in that I'm just as much of a Peel as he is, when it comes to business and common sense."

Abner grinned. "You'd never think Lettice Booker was a Peel, would you?" he observed. "Just think of her not takin' fourteen hundred for the C house when she had the chance. Just because Farley Crowell's payin' her fifteen dollars a month for it. Ho, ho! Not much common sense about that."

Susanna's smile was at least a half sneer.

"Can't you see why that is?" she exclaimed. "I can. It's because he is Farley Crowell, that's why. She was head-over-heels in love with him in the old days and I presume likely she hasn't got all over it yet, even if he has turned out to be a good-for-nothin' and a cripple. I suppose she pities him. Well, I guess he needs all the pity he can get. From what I hear he isn't earning enough to pay even fifteen dollars a month very long. When he has to move, you and I will buy that house, too. Then'll we'll have another laugh at Amarias and that hateful Lettice."

Lettice was busy in the notion shop the rest of the forenoon. At twelve she closed and locked its door and went into her living-room at the rear. Amarias Peel was there already, waiting for her.

FARLEY CROWELL had finished his lonely supper on Monday evening and was sitting by the stove in the kitchen reading, or trying to read, the Boston morning paper. He had spent three miserable days since his call upon Lettice Booker. The depression of spirits which followed that call had lasted ever since, and he could not shake it off. The determination not to remain in the C house as her tenant was still firm. He would move out just as soon as he could, and if that move took him away from Wapatomac, so much the better.

But where he should go, and, if he went, by what means he could earn a living, these were questions still unanswered. He had built up a small business in Wapatomac, enough to supply his simple wants, and the prospect that the business might grow was not impossible. The Winters were certain to be dull enough, but the Summer visitors seemed to have taken a fancy to his toys and mills, and it was from them that the increased patronage might come. If he left Wapatomac, he would be obliged to start all over again, amid new surroundings and among strangers. Yet he was determined to go. It had been forced upon his realization, the fact that, if happiness, or something akin to it, was to be his, it must be looked for in some place where Lettice Peel—he never thought of her as Lettice Booker—was not, where he could not see her and meet her and talk with her almost daily.

This was foolish and crazily absurd, of course. She herself, in that very room, had reminded him of their ages, and had declared that the feeling of the old days between them was over and done with and could never be again. She was right—a thousand times right. It could not be; or, if it was—if on his part it was and always would be—he would never admit it. She should never know. Better, far better, to run away now, while he had a reasonable excuse for running.

His search for a way of escape was so far fruitless, but he must continue it. It had occurred to him that his former employers in New York might possibly have some sort of opening for him, and he considered writing them. Now, as he sat there by the stove, trying to read, but seeing nothing of the printed words before him, he reached the determination to write at once. He threw down the paper and rose to get pen, ink and paper. Then some one knocked at the door.

"Yes," he said. "I am here. Come in."

THE door opened and Lettice entered. He stood there, gazing at her. It was as if his thought had been an incantation and her spirit had answered the summons.

"Why—why, Lettice!" he exclaimed.

She smiled brightly. "I have surprised you, haven't I, Farley?" she said. "You didn't expect me, of course. You are alone, aren't you?"

He nodded. "Yes, yes, I am alone," he stammered. "I usually am at this time. Won't you sit down?"

She accepted the chair he offered. "Yes," she said, "I will. And I want you to sit down, too, for what I have come to talk about will take a good while. Why do you look so queer? Aren't you glad to see me?"

He took a chair at the other side of the table. "You know I am glad to see you, Lettice," he said gravely. "Of course you know it. But you know, too, that I am not altogether glad to see you here. It is early, and——"

"And you are afraid the neighbors may have seen me. When I came before, you were worried because it was so late. You care too much about what your neighbors see and say. I don't now, at all. I have a great deal to say, myself, and I want you to listen. It is no business of the neighbors whatever. It is just our own, Farley—yours and mine."

He shrugged, but he looked at her keenly. Her manner, so it seemed to him, was peculiar. Her tone was brisk and matter-of-fact enough, but underneath it there was, or so he imagined, a certain suppressed excitement. Her eyes sparkled and there was a smile at the corners of her lips. As she met his gaze, the color rose to her cheeks.

"What is it, Lettice?" he asked curiously. "Has anything happened?"

She smiled and nodded. "Yes," she said, "a lot has happened. I am going to tell you about it and you mustn't interrupt. Farley, I have sold the A house, the one at the other end of the row. My half-sister, Susanna Crusit, has bought it—she and her husband together, although he doesn't count."

He was surprised, and the surprise caused him to disobey orders so far as interrupting was concerned.

"Good!" he exclaimed. "I'm glad of it. I hope you got a good price."

"I think I did. Susanna paid me fourteen hundred dollars for it. And I have the money— Hush! That isn't all. I have the offer from the town for the B house, father's old home, the offer I told you of—two thousand dollars."

He nodded. "You did tell me of that," he said. "And you have decided to accept it?"

"I don't know whether I shall accept it or not. That remains to be seen. But there is more. Farley, you remember that, on Friday evening, when you came to see me, you told me you had definitely decided not to stay here in the C house as my tenant, but that you were going to move as soon as you found another place. You remember that?"

"Certainly I remember it. I meant it, Lettice."

"I know you did. And do you remember, too, that you asked me to promise if I had a chance to sell this house I must not let any thought of you stand in the way?"

He looked at her. "I remember that very well," he said, a trifle stiffly. "Have you had such a chance?"

She nodded. "I have had more than the chance," she declared. "I have sold the house—C house, this one here—to my brother, Amarias, for fifteen hundred dollars cash. The title passed this afternoon. What do you think of that?"

He thought much, but he said little. The fact that as shrewd a bargainer as Amarias Peel should pay fifteen hundred dollars for a tumbledown dwelling like the C house was amazing of itself, but her attitude—the cold-blooded manner in which she had announced it to him—was more amazing. And she had done it, had sold the roof over his head, without troubling to consult him, or warn him, without giving him a moment's notice. This was the Peel common sense with a vengeance. Yet he smiled.

"I think you have done well," he answered. "I congratulate you. I suppose it is part of the deal that I get out at once. Well, I will."

She shook her head. "No, it isn't," she said. "The agreement between Amarias and me is that you are to stay on here at the same rent for another year, if you wish to. That is all set down in writing, signed and sealed. Amarias agreed to that. I made him."

He shrugged. "I'm very much obliged to you both," he observed, "but I shall go at once. By the end of the week, or sooner."

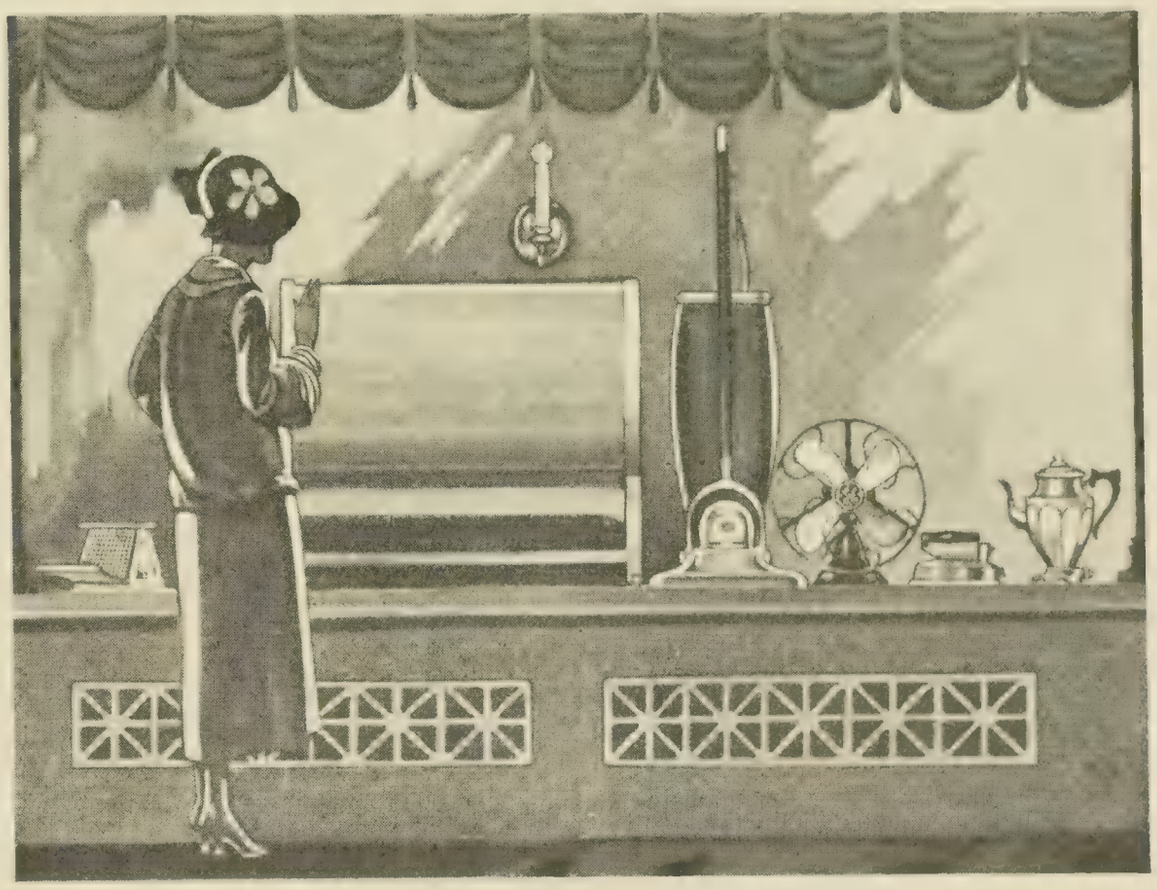
"Where will you go?"

"I don't know. That needn't trouble you, however."

AGAIN her manner changed. The cheerful eagerness, almost an air of triumph, which she had worn since she began telling of her fortunate trades, vanished, and she became grave.

"Farley," she began once more, "although I made that agreement with Amarias, I didn't expect you to be willing to stay here as his tenant. I knew you wouldn't want to do that, and—yes, I hoped you wouldn't. But will you consider another plan? One that—that I have been considering ever since Saturday, when Susanna and Amarias bought those houses of me? Yes, and before that, although my selling them has made it so much easier. Will you listen to the plan and—and consider it very carefully? Will you?"

He was silent for a moment. What she meant he could not imagine. And her tone and manner were very odd.



"I don't understand," he said.

"Of course you don't—yet. But you will let me explain, won't you? Farley, when we talked together Friday evening, you told me what you were making here from your painting and your toys and windmills. Eight hundred dollars, wasn't it?"

"Yes. That is about what I cleared last year. Why?"

"I'll tell you in a minute. First I want to tell you what I am making at the notion shop. Last year I made almost a thousand above expenses, rent and everything—Wait, please. Father left me ten thousand with interest at six per cent. I have the twenty-nine hundred from the sale of the A and C houses and Mr. Barnes thinks he can invest it for me at five or six per cent. and where it will be safe. If it is only five per cent., my income from the investments and the thousand I make from the shop will bring me in about seventeen hundred a year. That is the way I figure it."

She paused. Why she should tell him this was beyond his comprehension.

"Well," he observed, after an instant's hesitation, "that is not bad, is it? Did you expect more?"

"I never dared expect so much. Farley, do you remember how we used to talk about traveling? And we've talked of it since you came back here. We both said that we wished we might travel, we'd rather do it than anything else. It was the Grand Canyon we wanted to see most. I don't know why we picked that before anything else, but we did, didn't we?"

He smiled sadly.

"I believe we did," he admitted.

"You know we did. Well, I want to see it now just as much as ever. I want to go to the Grand Canyon."

Again she hesitated.

"Well," he said, "you can go now, can't you? I should think you could."

"Yes—yes, perhaps I might. But—but I don't want to go alone. Farley, I—I want you to go with me."

He leaned back in his chair, staring at her in complete bewilderment.

"Lettice!" he gasped. "Lettice, are you——"

"No, no, I am not crazy. I am as sane as I ever was in my life. And what I am going to say is the most sensible thing in the world, the only sensible thing for you and me—if—Farley, you and I used to care a great deal for each other. Tell me, do you still care? I—I think you do. Do you?"

He continued to stare and she met his gaze without faltering.

"Do you still care for me, Farley?" she asked again. "As you used to care?"

He drew a long breath. "Lettice," he faltered, "I—I— Oh, what are you saying?"

"I am asking you if you still care for me as you used to care. Because if you do, why shouldn't we be happy together?"

He put his hand to his forehead.

"Lettice," he demanded, "are you—are you proposing to—to marry me?"

IT WAS not precisely the way he would have phrased the question if his mind had been in anything but its present chaotic state. In spite of her earnestness she smiled.

"Why, yes," she replied. "I am. I am asking you to marry me, if you will. If you care for me as—as I care for you, as I have always cared. If you do care for me in that way, then the rest of it is common sense and nothing more."

This was too much. She must be insane.

"Common sense!" he cried. "Common sense for you to marry a good-for-nothing fellow like me! A cripple, without a cent—Oh, you are joking. What is all this? What——"

"Hush! It is just what I called it, common sense. Farley, you are alone in the world. So am I. Oh, yes; I have a half-brother and sister, but they don't care for me. They have always been jealous of me. They hate me and I know it. They bought those two houses of me because they believe that when the town buys the B house and the two streets come together they can sell them for ever so much more than they paid me. They think they have made a sharp bargain and have got the better of me besides. Oh," indignantly, "the hardest part of it all was to be obliged to keep still and not let them see I knew perfectly well what they were trying to do. Did they think that they were Peels and I wasn't? Do they suppose— But there, never mind them. They are nothing to me, nor I to them. I am alone in the world just as you are. Listen, Farley, please——"

He would have spoken, but she hurried on.

"It is just—well, almost a plain business proposition, this plan of mine," she continued. "You must work for your living, and so must I. I like my work in the shop. I can earn a thousand a year. Pretty soon, unless what every one says isn't true, you will be earning more than that. Then there is the income from my bonds and the rest. Don't you see, Farley? Why, we should be almost well-to-do. We could be comfortable and busy most of the year, and once in a while we could take a vacation and travel. Oh, there are so many places I want to see. Washington and the Mammoth Cave and California. And the Canyon. Oh, so many! And we could see them together, just you and I. Oh, Farley, think!"

But he had been trying to think and his thoughts centered upon only one point, the utter impossibility of it all.

"No, no, no!" he cried. "Lettice, you can't be serious. Even if—oh, do you suppose I could ever let you do such a wicked thing? Throw yourself away upon a chap like me, a failure, a wreck, a——"

"Stop! You mustn't talk that way."

"But it's true. And what do you think Wapatomac people would say? What——"

"Stop! You know I don't care what they say. They have said about every mean thing they can say already. What they say doesn't count at all. I mean to live my own life now and to be happy if I can. Farley, do you care for me?"

His answer was given without thought. If he had had time to think, he might have lied, perhaps.

"Care for you?" he groaned. "I have never cared for any one else—no, nor anything else. When I lost you—when I threw your love away by my own wicked foolishness—I threw my life with it. I deserved what I got, but—oh, don't ask me any more! I care for you, God knows I do, and always shall. But that is the very reason why I——"

"No, it isn't. It is just the reason why we must marry."

He shook his head.

"We can't! We can't!" he cried. "Think, Lettice. You can't have thought. Think of—well, of your father. What would he have said?"

TO HIS surprise she smiled. Her eyes were wet, but she was smiling. She took an envelope from the bosom of her dress.

"I am glad you asked that, dear," she said. "Here is the answer. After father died, he left this letter for me. I have read it, of course, and many times more than once. I want you to read it, too."

She handed it to him and Farley read:

MY DEAR LETTICE:

I am writing this because I am about through with my life voyage and I want you to know how I have come to feel on a certain matter. I have thought a sight of you all my life and I have tried hard—according to my lights—to make you happy. One time anyhow those lights must have been pretty darn dim, for I made a big mistake. Two mistakes, I guess likely you might call them, and I own up to making them, which is something I don't do very often. The owning up, I mean. One was in cutting you out with Farley Crowell, and the other was in influencing you to marry David Booker. Well, Booker is dead and a good job too. But this letter is about the other one—Farley Crowell. Lettice, I have been used to sizing up folks ever since I first went to sea and unless I am mighty mistaken again you think just as much of him as you ever did. And I should not wonder if he felt the same way to you. Well, Lettice, marry him if you want to and he wants to. He isn't much account as a business man and never will be, but he is honest and decent and he did fight for his country, which is more than a whole lot of cowardly swabs in Wapatomac did. My own son Amarias amongst them. All Amarias ever shot off in the war was his mouth. Why don't you and Farley get married, Lettice? You might as well. I have left you something to help pay the cost of passage, and if you don't want to sell the old home to the town you and he might live in it. And you would be happy, I calculate. I have always made brags about steering my course by common sense, but now that I am on my beam ends and in the breakers I have come to the conclusion that to get the most happiness out of life is the best kind of common sense. A lonesome voyage is a miserable one, and nobody knows that better than I have come to know it since your mother died. He may hold off on account of your having more money than he has. If you ever have the chance, you can tell him that it is my money and that I am just paying my debts, that is all. I was responsible for keeping you two apart. That was bad business and now it is up to me to pay for the mistake and pay what it costs. If he still says no, tell him not to be a fool.

Your loving father,
ELIPHALET PEEL.

Farley read the letter through to the end. He raised his eyes and met those of the woman he loved.

"So you see, Farley," she cried eagerly, "it is just common sense, isn't it? Father says so, and he knew. Farley, shall we go to the Grand Canyon together?"

THE PEEL TRAIT

He made one last appeal to reason. He was wavering, but he made it.

"Lettice," he said, "you—you can't really mean it. Why, when you first came to see me, in this very room, that night when you washed my supper dishes, you told me then that we could never be again the kind of friends we used to be. That was all over and done with, you said. And——"

She came swiftly around the table and put her fingers to his lips.

"Hush! Hush, dear!" she said. "I know I said that, but can't you understand why I said it? I said it because—oh, can't you see? That wasn't common sense—or the truth, either. It was like the make-believe you painted over in France. It was just camouflage."

AWAY back at the beginning of this tale of the Peel family mention was made of a conversation which took place at the post-office between Town Clerk Noah Didlow and Captain Ziba Bangs. A portion of this conversation was recorded and the fact of its interruption by the distribution of mail was recorded also. As was likewise said at the time, this conversation was resumed later on at Mrs. Salt's table. Captain Ziba, having finished his plate of fish chowder a good six spoonfuls ahead of every one else, asked Mr. Didlow a question.

"Noah," he observed, "you started to tell me last night up to the post-office somethin' about a letter your sister Sarah had got from Lettice Booker—Lettice Crowell, I should say. Don't know's I'll ever get used to callin' her by her new name. What did she say in the letter?"

Mr. Didlow coughed, glanced up and down the table to make sure that he had the attention of his fellow boarders, found that he had, and made answer.

"Well," he declared, "she said a good many things. She and her husband are havin' a pretty fine time, I judge. They went to the Grand Canyon first off, but they didn't stay there only a couple of days on account of the hotel bein' so expensive. They're in California—or was when she wrote—at a little boardin'-house in Los Angeles, I believe. Lettice says they're seein' all the sights—all of 'em that don't cost too much to see—and they are enjoying every minute of it. They're comin' back home from there, she says, so I cal'late they'll make Wapatomac in a month or so at the latest. Be some talk when they get here, I guess likely."

Mrs. Salt helped herself to the last biscuit on the plate, the biscuit which Solon Pepper had been regarding longingly.

"There can't be much more talk than there has been already," she snapped. "Nobody that I know of has been able yet to make out why she married that Crowell cripple. If he had money of his own, that would be one thing; but he hasn't. She's the one with the money. All he owns is the crutch he hops around on. If she had to have a man—and the land knows what any self-supportin' woman wants of one, anyway—why didn't she pick out a whole specimen, not a—a remnant?"

Miss Hercelia Ginn sighed. "She and he were old lovers," she suggested. "That was why, of course. It is just like something in a book, isn't it?"

Mr. Pepper put in a word. "I met Amarias yesterday," he observed with a chuckle. "I asked him what he was plannin' to do with that C house he bought of his sister. I was awful polite about it, but he glowered at me as if I'd called him names or somethin'. But I understand he tells other folks that he's perfectly satisfied with his bargain."

Mrs. Salt smiled acidly. "Susanna Crusit tells everybody she is more than satisfied with hers," she declared. "But I notice those thin lips of hers tighten up when she says it. She and Amarias don't speak nowadays, and the whole Sewin' Circle thinks it is on account of those houses. How in the world meek little Lettice Peel—or Booker—or Crowell—or whatever her name is at the minute—how she ever unloaded those good-for-nothin'

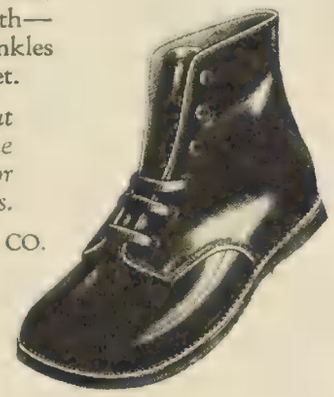
Keep These Active Little Feet Healthy

SIMPLEX Flexies, besides their appealing smart looks, and excellent wearing qualities, have something more to commend them to careful mothers.



These dainty little shoes are not only endorsed by many physicians specializing in the care of children's feet, but they are frequently prescribed by them.

For Simplex Flexies satisfy Nature's all-important demands. In them, the little foot rests squarely on the heel, the base of the great toe and the base of the little toe—just as it should. So pliable are Flexies soles that you can bend them backward with the fingers. And the linings are glove-smooth—no rough seams or wrinkles to torture the tender feet.

Ask your dealer about these healthful little shoes and write for Flexies Twin Books.

shanties onto those two smart ones I can't understand, I vow I can't And neither can anybody else. Why did they buy 'em—and pay such prices for 'em, too? Some folks pretend to say they bought 'em on spec, figurin' the property would go up when the town buys that B house. But the town hasn't bought it yet. And, so far as that goes, why didn't one or the other of them buy the B house, while they was about it?"

Noah Didlow looked wise.

"They didn't because she wouldn't sell it, that's the way I size it up," he observed. "And as for her puttin' anythin' over on them, they put it over on themselves, I cal'late. They're Peels—they saw the chance to make money by gettin' those houses of her cheap. They set the trap for her and she just let 'em walk into it."

Solon spoke again.

"I presume likely that's so," he agreed. "Anyhow, a good many folks seem to think 'tis. But what I can't see quite is how, if that was the way of it, she come to split 'em up, sell one house to one and one to the other. If there was liable to be a big profit in one, there'd be twice as much in two. That stands to reason. If she was willin' to sell at all—if she didn't care about makin' that profit herself and had rather have a bird in the hand than a flock of 'em out in the bushes—why didn't she let 'em both go to whichever came after 'em first? That puzzles me."

Captain Bangs volunteered an answer to the Pepper riddle.

"Accordin' to my notion," he said, "that was about the smartest move she made. If she had sold Amarias both of those houses, Susanna might have made trouble. Same way, only turn about, if she sold Susanna the pair. Now everthin' is divided up lovely. Amarias owns one and Susanna the other and Lettice the third. She hasn't shown any partiality. She's treated the whole family just alike. Each one of 'em owns one of their father's houses. Who could find fault with that? Amarias can't and Susanna can't. You've heard 'em say they're satisfied. They have to be—in public. Ho, ho, it's funny, because, as things stand now, the house that Lettice owns is the only one that's worth anythin', and if she really does decide to keep it and live in it, the others will be worth less every day. Think she will sell, Noah? What's the latest upshoots along that line in selectmen's meetin'?"

The town clerk shook his head. "There ain't any," he admitted. "We've raised our offer another two hundred, but she hasn't said 'yes' yet. She hasn't said 'no,' either.

"But," Captain Ziba continued questioning, "if she does sell to the town, those houses Amarias and Susanna bought may turn out to be good bargains, after all, mayn't they?"

"Why—yes, if she sold right away they might turn out so. But every day she holds off makes it more necessary for those other houses to be put in repair. Amarias and Susanna will have to spend money on 'em pretty soon or they'll lose everythin' but the land they stand on. And the land alone will never be worth more than the prices they paid, if that. As it is, they must pay taxes. Will she ever sell the B house? I don't know. The town wants that house as bad as it can want anythin', and the longer she holds out the more it will want it. She just knows she can afford to wait. She's sittin' pretty, as the boys say, and she's got Amarias and Susanna on toast. Hi, hum! You can't beat a Peel, can you?"

"You couldn't beat old Cap'n Eliphalet," vowed Solon. "Nobody used to think so, but it does look as if Lettice had more of his common sense than the rest of the family, a good deal more. What are you laughin' at, Cap'n Ziba?"

The captain finished his laugh.

"Why, I was just thinkin', that's all, Solon," he said. "Common sense, do you call it? Well, I'll give in right off that Lettice Crowell has plenty of sense. But I'll be everlastingly blessed if I'd say the kind of sense she's got is common!"

"Thirteen hundred dollars' damage. Not a single criminal tendency, but utterly irresponsible"—O schoene Tag——

The caressing warmth of the afternoon had given place to oppressive heat and now this dissolved in a crash of Spring thunder and in driving rain. The music had to cease, unable to compete with the elements. Windows were closed. There was auction for a while.

Katrina and the three men played. Violet, who hated cards, still sat at the piano, running her fingers softly over the keys. What pretty brown hands Katrina had! The knuckles still dimpled like a baby's——

Philip pulled himself up. He had become startlingly aware of a desire appearing unheralded out of forgotten recesses of his nature, a desire to— Impossible! He had not, he could not have desired to kiss that little dimpled fist. He had not kissed, he had not thought of kissing a woman's hand in twenty years. And Katrina was a child and he a husk. And he was, besides, a fool to imagine that in her eyes there was a light—understanding, sympathy, championship—for him. Moreover, he had to make up his mind what he was going to do with this "utterly irresponsible" and expensive son of his.

He had come to no decision by bedtime when he called Corliss into his room for a talk. The boy admitted the incident of the Ellsworth car, the unpermitted borrowing and the damage. But he fiercely questioned the amount of the claim. And anyway, the accident had not been his fault, his and Venner's, at all. Quite the contrary. No lights, no guarding rails, over into the creek——

"It's a miracle you're alive, you two boys," his father interrupted. His anger had been short-lived. He was only grateful that he had him, whole and sound and straight-limbed.

"We'll finish this up in the morning, my boy," he said. "I am not going to town early." And then the troubling recollection of Katrina Blakelock's hands stirred him. He wanted to speak of them, of her; he wanted, absurdly, to say her name——

"Nice girl, that Katrina Blakelock." He spoke casually, lighting a cigaret.

"Well," answered Corliss indifferently, "she isn't solid ivory from the neck north, but I didn't think her such a ball of fire."

Philip, who had heard without rage that an escapade of his son had just cost him thirteen hundred dollars, grew wrathful. He pounced upon the boy's figures of speech so hard that he departed dazed at the fierceness of his father's guardianship of pure English.

The rain, gusty and variable, kept on, though thunder and lightning had ceased. Philip found that rain blew in each window he tried to open. He could never sleep in a closed room. But he did, by and by, and it was to dream, not of his perplexities, but of his mother, strong, capable, hard-working. He saw her hands busy over a vegetable basket. And waking, soothed and sustained by the old childish sense of safety, he thought once more of Katrina's hands, the brown vigor of them, the dimpled softness of them; the promise of competence in their fingertips, the promise, too, of tenderness.

CORLISS was restless after the talk with his father. It was too indefinite—what was the old man going to do? And it was absurd to expect him to be tremulously grateful for finding himself alive and unmaimed. Anything else would have been an outrage. But when all the pow-wowing was over, what was going to be forced upon him? About schools, work, a career?

He tried for a while to sleep, but with the rain dashing against the windows so that he could not open them he found sleep impossible. He punched his pillows, kicked the blanket off on to the floor, tossed about. By and by he turned on the lights again and got up to look for something to read. He found a blue and gilt "Ivanhoe." With it in hand he went back to bed, ignoring a rule of his aunt's that had forbidden him to read there, and that had, as an aid to enforcement, refused him a bedside lamp. The side-lights by the bureau were remote and inadequate. He took a branched candlestick from the mantel-piece, lit its three dusty and hitherto untouched bayberry candles and settled himself. He smoked as he read, considering that he had long outgrown the prohibition against cigarets in bed, and not caring particularly whether he had or not.

His taste for reading was not strong. He dozed, dreamed, started awake. It was quiet now, the rain over. But he was too drowsy to get up to open a window. He read again, and by and by "Ivanhoe" slid from his loosening grip and fell upon the blanket on the floor. He slept, young and beautiful in the soft candlelight, with dark lashes on his cheeks, with sensitive brow, with his customary look of peevish rebellion gone from his features. And by and by one of the bayberry candles toppled gently down upon the open "Ivanhoe"——

PHILIP awoke again from a new, troubled dream, about what he did not remember. He felt heavy, inclined to drop back into sleep—into stupor. But below the impulse something kept urging him to wake—wake wholly and fully. He struggled, threw off a weight and then sat erect in bed, his senses suddenly alert. The room was full of smoke. He started for a window—recalled sharply that to let in a draft might set the place in a blaze. He jerked on trousers and coat, filled a sponge with water in the bathroom, soaked a great Turkish towel. Then he made for the hall.

Smoke, smoke everywhere. He pounded on a door across the hall. Doctor Wade, staggering and gasping, emerged. At the new current of air the room behind him was suddenly ablaze.

He slammed the door. In spite of smoke that filled their lungs, that blinded their eyes, they ran the length of the hall. Philip entered Violet's room, carried her, dragged her out, delivering her almost inert body to Wade, who bore it on down the stairs.

"An alarm, an alarm!" Philip shouted after him. Then he was fiercely forbidding the servants to come down or to jump. "The engines will be here in a minute with the ladders, hose—you are safe——"

Again he was back, pounding on Corliss's door, opening it, seeing with horror that the fire, with a leisurely, selective air, had burned all along one side of the room. But the bed, though obscure in smoke, was not yet ignited. He caught up a rug from before the bureau. He dragged his son, half suffocated, out in it, delivered him, too, to Wade. And then, oblivious of scorch, of blisters, of pain, he was at the next door—Katrina Blakelock's. The sponge was wet again, and he held it to her face as he carried her through the burning caldron that the second-story hall had become to the front window. Unconsciously he must have heard the clangor of the fire bells, the rush of the engines, for he seemed to be expecting the fireman's helmeted head that faced him on the other side of the glass.

"Stand back!" the man shouted to him, and he stood back while the broad window crashed in. And he was saying thickly to the girl over and over—or was he merely thinking it?—"I wanted to come to you first, my dear, my dear, but I made myself do it this way—I made myself do it this way—not you first—not you any more than myself first——"

Then he felt himself falling back upon the floor.

IT WAS to a peaceful sense of accomplishment that he came to himself in the Rivermead Hospital. He had had something to do—he did not at first recall what it had been—and he had done it. Oh, yes, he did recall. But had he done it? He stirred and was conscious of an immense pain in his right arm. Then in his left one also.

At the faint sound of his moving there appeared from behind a screen one of those starched and smiling young women designed before time was to be trained nurses. As he tried to meet her eyes, he was aware of bandages on his head. He spoke—croaked—"Everybody? Everything?" She answered, beaming: "All right, every one of them. You and Doctor Wade had really saved them all before the engines got there. But the firemen were some use—they saved the house. Only the second story was badly gutted."

"How long ago?" again he whispered. And irritably: "Matter with my voice?"

"The night before last. A paralysis of the bronchial passages from smoke. It'll come back. Don't worry. And you aren't going to have pneumonia. You got off with a simple concussion and some burns. There's some one wants to see you—two minutes."

To Bob or Not To Bob When Gray Hair Comes

"IF I ONLY DARED." Many women hesitate because of doubt as to how it will look. Certainly it is convenient and comfortable. If the contour of face and head permit, the short hair vogue is charming and youthful. But gray, faded, or bleached hair, unfortunately, is emphasized by the bob, shingle or pompadour. Brownatone overcomes the handicap. In a moment's time, with no troublesome mixing, no day-after-day treatment, those shorn locks can be becomingly tinted in natural shades from lightest blonde to deep brown or black.

Brownatone has brought the look of youth to millions. You can prove it to your own satisfaction. Send for Trial Bottle and test it on the tip ends of your hair. You'll be pleasantly amazed at the result. Specify shade wanted—"Light blonde to medium brown," or "Dark brown to black." All dealers sell Brownatone in two sizes—50c and $1.50—under the guarantee of the manufacturer. "Harmless—uniform—permanent—quick—satisfactory." Hesitate no longer. Tint away those gray locks that make you unhappy.

FIRE! FIRE!

Corliss had been waiting outside the door, it seemed, for some thirty-six hours. He was a new Corliss, humbled, shocked into manhood. He glanced furtively around, saw that no one was looking, and stooped and kissed the bandaged head, crying unashamed.

"If you hadn't been Johnny-on-the-spot, sir—but you were. You always are, dad!"

"Always Johnny-on-the-spot?" He mumbled it. He took it into consideration. In spite of aching muscles and throbbing temples and patches of blistered flesh, he had a feeling of comfort and assurance that he had not known in years. It was true. He had been Johnny-on-the-spot. Fit for the task. Disciplined. That was what Wade had been, too—seasoned, tried, competent. Two good old husks. He thought about it comfortably, and dozed off again.

When next he awoke, he said to the nurse in a tone more easy to control:

"I want a message sent to my office. Right away. What's that? Been here, sent messages, have they? All right, but I want a message sent to them just the same. Tell Mr. Henning I have decided to buy in. He will understand. Oh, is that you, Violet, my dear?"

It was—Violet in tears of gratitude, of contrition, Violet begging forgiveness for Corliss and his lighted candles. "It's all right," he told her. "We've come to an understanding, Corliss and I." Of course that was true—they hadn't needed any words for it. "He's going to work this Summer. Everything settled. But tell me about Miss Blakelock, about Katrina——"

"She's down in the waiting-room. She wants— But Corliss at work? But what can he do, Phil?"

"Lots of things. I want to see her, Vi."

Violet went, and Katrina came in. She sat down beside the bed. Her auburn eyes looked at him without Violet's sheen of tears, without Violet's pity—but with what look was it?

He remembered something suddenly.

"I thought you were sailing for Europe yesterday?"

"I am not going. I canceled my sailing."

"Why?"

The ruthless young determination of her face wavered, failed. Color flowered over her, up to the line of her bright hair, down to the neck of her blue linen frock. But she did not lower her eyes.

"I—I—I didn't want to go." She stuttered it, inarticulate, but with defiant gaze.

"Why?"

Blushing and angry and subdued, she looked at his bandaged head and did not see the bandages; she looked at his burned eyebrows and did not see the scars.

"That," she said inadequately, "is not any of your business."

The childishness seemed perfectly to satisfy him.

"I want to kiss your hands," he said. "Will you please come near and let me? I dreamed about them——"

But it was her lips, shy and bold, that she pressed to his.

He tried, with his maimed arms, to hold her away, to push her off.

"You mustn't. I am old, you are young. I love you, my dear, but there are years and years before you——"

"They're no good to me except with you. The only thing I was afraid of was that you might not have fallen in love, too. It seemed—presumptuous—to hope it. But if it is true—if you have——"

"I have. But——"

"Then the only thing is to make sure we don't lose one, not a single one, of the days that are left."

He tried to fight against the gladness of her look, its pride, its promise. But he could not.

"We'll be poor as the dickens for a while," he said, surrendering. "Poor as the dickens. I'm starting fresh. At my age. A husk——"

"A husk!" she bantered. Her face was soft and gay and tender. "You mean a husky——"

The best present—for the bride is one that will be useful and helpful. She will appreciate a Bissell. Her mother has used one for as many years as she can remember. She knows it is efficient, indispensable in keeping her rugs clean and speckless.

She knows it saves time and back-breaking effort. She knows how well it picks up dirt, lint, crumbs, threads—the inevitable litter of a busy day, keeping down the dust and saving dusting.

And it will give her a "homey" feeling, for the Bissell Sweeper has always been a familiar "first aid" to good housekeeping in her old home.

Equipped with smooth-running "Cyco" Ball Bearings the Bissell does much to take the drudgery out of the housework. "Cyco" Ball Bearing Bissells at around $6. Other grades for less. Play-size (toy) Bissells for a few dimes. At furniture, hardware, housefurnishing and department stores. Booklet on request.

A GARDEN SETTING

be no rare horticultural varieties, but only the common plants known and loved for centuries. Daffodils, narcissi, primroses, peonies, violets, English ivy, eglantine—all these are woven into the history of our race.

Again, the school garden is no place for annuals, but only for the hardy plants and bulbs that, once set out, come up year after year. We do too little of hardy gardening with children, too much of the transitory sort. They get the impression that a garden is something which begins in the Spring and ends in the Autumn, dead and done for.

Also, the shrubs, besides giving a succession of bloom, should be of those sorts from which branches can be cut for indoor forcing, so that the plot may be rich in subjects for botanical experimentation.

A varied planting, such as I have suggested, will familiarize the child with the ordinary gardening operations—the pruning of roses, the planting of shrub and root, the setting of bulbs, the dividing of plants in the Autumn.

One of the interesting secondary effects of school-yard planting is that the children invariably carry their gardening enthusiasm and skill home and apply it there.

NOW let us turn our attention to a consideration of the community playground for children and the possibility of beautifying it.

As a rule it is quite barren of shade; it affords no opportunity for playing the quiet games little folk have loved for centuries; not any chance for a child who is tired to sit and rest and watch the others. It is a mistake to offer children only violent play in the hot sun. Even country children prefer to play in the shade in the hottest part of the day; and city children less used to the sun require the shade.

In the case of one playground I know about, the trees are set close against the fence, thus taking almost nothing from the play space. Their roots go underneath, their branches over the children's heads. These trees are at the north side, affording some protection and giving the birds a place in which to build their nests. Along one side of the playground is a long pergola. This is separated by a wire screen from the rest of the playground. Here are swings for the smaller children; here are low tables and benches, where little girls may play "tea-party" and dolls may entertain. Here is the ring for marbles; here, on warm days, a teacher may take a class.

Next the pergola is the roofed-over, out-of-doors work-bench, where, on a misty day, kindergarten tots can hammer and nail at their houses. Here bigger boys, after school, can manufacture their scooters from one-time roller-skates, if forbidden the joy of hammering at home. They can also make all sorts of playground equipment. Modern children are as vitally in need of this constructive play as they are of more violent exercise.

An interesting feature of one playground I have in mind is its miniature farm. This is separated by a white painted picket-fence from the playground proper; and its little house, which is really a tool-house for the boys, is built to represent the home of an early settler. It has a lilac bush at one corner and a sweetbrier bush at the other. A tiny grape trellis of juvenile manufacture is at one side. Beyond the house is the "orchard" of dwarf trees. In the farm are grown what field crops are possible in the scheme of the school year. In the kitchen garden are early-maturing crops—radishes, lettuce, beets, onion sets.

The space at one side of the 'farmhouse" is given over to the children's individual plots. Alongside the fence are flowering shrubs chosen to give a succession of bloom or fruiting interest.

The playground is for the children, as is the school. If it be possible to make both, while serving the purpose of education, attractive and delightful to look upon, by all means let us do so.

6111—10321—A circular apron, long in front, makes this slip-over one-piece dress suitable for large figures also. The embroidery is smart. Work in one-stitch. The dress fits the hip closely and has a separate one-piece slip with or without sleeves. Use flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, crêpe faille, crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin with crêpe de Chine slip to match or in flesh color; crêpe roma or Georgette with a satin, silk crêpe or heavy crêpe de Chine slip, etc.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 39-inch crêpe satin. Lower edge 44½ inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

6112—Graduated tucks imitate the style of crosswise-running designs and double cross themselves with a jabot. Make this one-piece slip-over dress of plain Georgette, plain crêpe de Chine or plain chiffon voile, all of one material or with contrasting for jabot and collar. Lower edge 46½ inches.

36 bust requires 3⅞ yards 39-inch Georgette (cut crosswise and pieced under tucks).

The dress is for ladies 33 to 42 bust, also misses.

6095—A square neck sets this slip-over one-piece dress apart as "different." Make it of prints in cotton crêpe of good weight, cotton broadcloth, cotton shantung, linen-finished cottons, heavy crêpe de Chine or shantung with plain to match, or use these materials plain with collar, etc., in contrast; or striped with plain to match; or use plaid linen, plaid cotton crêpe of good weight or gingham with plain, etc. The lower edge is straight.

36 bust requires 3⅛ yards 35-inch cotton print. Lower edge 46 inches.

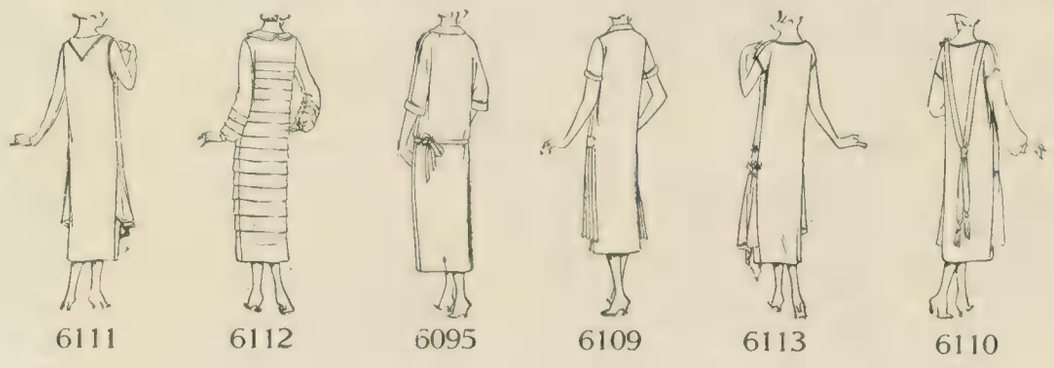
The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6109—The plaited straight apron front gives the rather "dressy" look to this one-piece frock which slips on over the head. The frock is close fitting at the hipline and may have a body lining. It is attractive made of flat crêpe, Canton crêpe, heavy crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin with contrasting or all of one material; or use prints in heavy crêpe de Chine, radium, silk crêpe or crêpe satin or foulards with plain to match.

36 bust requires 3⅞ yards 39-inch crêpe de Chine. Lower edge 44 inches.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 48 bust, also misses.

6113—Another new and smart type of apron in a season of them is draped and has handmade flowers grouped above it on a slip-over one-piece frock which fits the hipline closely. Use crêpe roma, Georgette, crêpe de Chine or crêpe satin entirely, except for ribbon flowers to harmonize or with lace apron, or use foulards, etc. Lower edge 44 inches.



36 bust requires 3 yards 39-inch Georgette, and 1⅛ yard 24-inch lace flouncing.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 46 bust.

6110—Printed flowers on the silk and handmade flowers on the shoulder decorate this simple one-piece slip-over frock with its gathered straight apron front. It fits the hipline closely and may have a body lining. Use printed crêpe de Chine or Georgette, crêpe roma, crêpe satin, with plain to match or plain crêpe de Chine or Georgette, etc., with lace edging, banding and flowers in contrast; foulards with Georgette to match, etc.

36 bust requires 3½ yards 40-inch printed silk. Lower edge 44 inches.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5925—5952—The lovely new borders are best suited to simple slip-over one-piece frocks. Use wide borders in heavy silks or cottons, novelty crêpe satin, novelty faille and satin or half-and-half crêpe satin; printed Bayadere designs, satin, with plain, etc. The hat has a six-gored crown. Lower edge 45 inches.

36 bust and 22-inch head measure require 1¾ yard 56-inch bordered silk for dress and ½ yard 35-inch silk for hat.

The dress is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses; hat for ladies, misses and girls.

5832—A scarf may accompany this one-piece slip-over dress, suitable for 54-inch wide bordered prints, crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, Georgette, chiffon, chiffon voile, cotton voile, cotton Georgette, or cotton crêpe, printed with plain to match; or use soft satin, silk crêpe and heavy crêpe de Chine. It may have a body lining. The straight lower edge measures 53 inches.

36 bust requires 2¼ yards 54-inch bordered silk.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5967—A one-piece slip-over frock is made of silk or heavy cotton borders or printed crosswise designs; heavy crêpe de Chine, or silk crêpe, printed or embroidered; printed radium, novelty crêpe satin, novelty faille and satin or printed heavy cottons; or crêpe satin with embroidery. The lower edge is straight.

36 bust requires 1⅝ yard 56-inch bordered silk. Lower edge 44 inches.

It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5998—Here is a belted dress that is suitable for borders in heavy silk crêpe, crêpe satin, etc. The crêpe de Chine tie matches the border. Or use crosswise designs, novelty faille and satin, novelty crêpe satin, printed crêpe de Chine or printed silk crêpe with plain matching tie; or use plain silk crêpe, faille silk, satin, flannel, etc. This one-piece slip-over dress has a straight lower edge.

36 bust requires 2 yards 56-inch bordered flannel. Lower edge 45 inches.

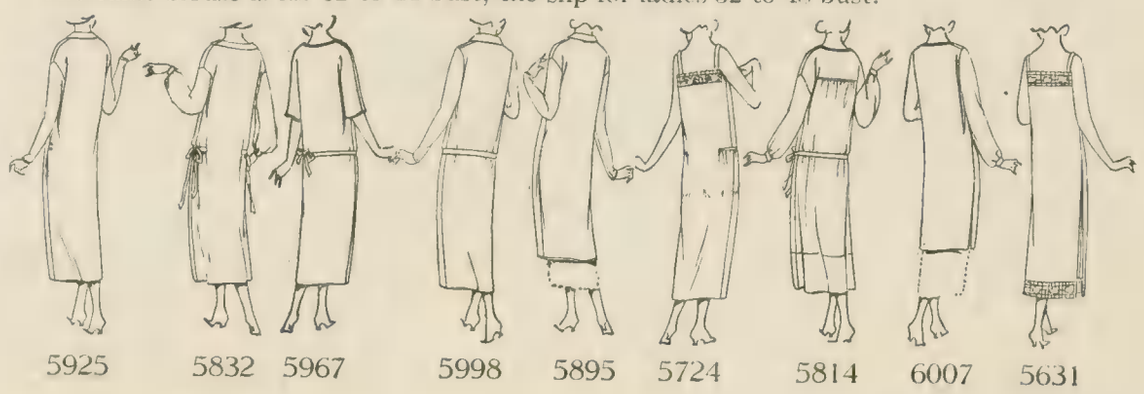
It is for ladies 33 to 44 bust, also misses.

5895—5724—The slip-over tunic blouse attracts borders in silks, cotton voiles and cotton crêpes; prints in crosswise designs, crêpe de Chine, silk crêpe, shantung, etc. It may be longer and it is worn over a costume slip with a three-inch or deep shadow-proof hem. The lower edges are straight. Lower edge of slip 44 inches.

36 bust requires 1¾ yard 40-inch bordered silk with slip of 2⅝ yards 35-inch plain silk.

The tunic blouse is for 32 to 44 bust, the slip for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

5814—A frame for lovely half-and-half prints in 34-inch width is made by the plain matching yoke in one with a short sleeve, and the straight band lengthening the skirt. This slip-over one-piece dress has a straight lower edge.



36 bust requires 1¾ yard 34-inch half-and-half prints and 1⅝ yards 35-inch plain for yoke and band. Lower edge 54 inches.

The dress is for ladies 32 to 44 bust.

6007—5631—This slip-over tunic blouse of novelty faille and satin, ribbed silks, etc., may be made longer. It has a straight lower edge and is worn with a costume slip.

36 bust requires 2⅛ yards 44-inch bordered silk (for shorter length) and 2⅝ yards 35 or 39 inch material for slip. Lower edge of slip with plaits drawn out 54½ ins.

The tunic blouse is for 32 to 44 bust, the slip for ladies 32 to 48 bust.

This X-Ray shows tooth socket destruction by pyorrhea

Beautiful Teeth

must have this double protection

PROTECTION against decay above the gum line and protection against pyorrhea underneath the gums—this is the double safeguard that white, lovely teeth need today. Through the aid of the X-Ray, dental science has discovered how quickly the infection of pyorrhea spreads to the root sockets which support your teeth. Pyorrhea must be checked—if the teeth are to be saved.

Pyorrhocide Powder is the dentifrice recommended by dentists for its double protection to teeth and gums. Its cleansing powers keep your teeth shining white. Its tonic and stimulating qualities—correct bleeding gums strengthen tender gums harden soft gums

ITS effectiveness in helping to restore, as well as maintain gum health is due largely to its medication with Dentinol, a healing agent used by the dental profession in the treatment of pyorrhea.

Use Pyorrhocide Powder daily—see your dentist regularly—and you can avoid pyorrhea. The economical dollar package contains six months' supply. At all druggists. Send for free sample and booklet on causes and prevention of pyorrhea.

At forty how old will your skin look?

Beauty—the charm of a youthful, smooth, clear skin is not a matter of age but of skin health. If you are in your twenties, begin at once the daily use of Ingram's Milkweed Cream. Then your skin at forty will still be young looking—healthy—firm.

If you are older, the nourishing and renewing properties of Ingram's Milkweed Cream will soften your skin, give it new vitality and smooth out the tiny lines of tiredness.

Cleanses, Protects, Corrects.

Ingram's Milkweed Cream is more than a thorough cleanser, more than a protection and powder base. It combines certain remedial properties which correct roughness, tan, freckles, blemishes, blackheads and such imperfections. The purpose of these nourishing, beautifying properties is not to cover up defects, but to correct them.

Make This Convincing Test.

There is a booklet "Health Hints" wrapped around each jar of Ingram's Milkweed Cream which every woman should read. It tells you the most effective way to use Ingram's Milkweed Cream, how to use it in treating the common troubles of your skin. This booklet is written by specialists to make sure that you get from Ingram's Milkweed Cream the fullest possible benefit.

Go to your druggist today and buy a jar of Ingram's Milkweed Cream in the fifty cent or economical dollar size. Begin its use at once. The improvement that will come to your complexion in just a few days will surprise you.

Something NEW for BOBBED HAIR

There is a tremendous difference in bobs. Some are wonderfully attractive and becoming, while others, well—which kind is yours?

I wish you could picture the becoming kind I have in mind—the sort that makes men turn to admire. I can't tell you what the color is, but it's full of those tiny dancing lights that somehow suggest auburn, yet which are really no more actual color than sunlight is. It's only when the head is moved that you catch the auburn suggestion—the fleeting glint of gold.

You have no idea how much your bob can be improved with the "tiny tint" Golden Glint Shampoo will give it. If you want a bob like that I have in mind, buy a package and see for yourself. At all drug stores, or send 25c direct to J. W. KOBI CO., 670 Rainier Ave., Seattle, Wn.

Coming! The Biggest Show on Earth

Every Summer morning for years past when the world's biggest circus had spread its acres of white canvas and settled for a breathing space before the noon parade, an industrious young woman might be seen on almost any part of the lot diligently pounding a small portable typewriter. With something of the performer's disregard of curious observers and the artist's gift for sustained concentration, she could carry on regardless—whether in a comparatively quiet corner of the menagerie, in the shadow of the calliope or on one of the huge star-spangled tubs that serve the performing elephants for footstools. Out of such an atmosphere came "Little Texas," a novel of circus life written in such intervals as its author could seize between performances. No wonder it has all the romance and glamour of the world under the big top, that in it are packed the color, the movement, the thrill of adventurous living, the very sights and sounds and scents of the circus. But to return to the lady with the portable typewriter. For convenience she had slipped into the habit of storing the machine—of all places!—in a bear's cage, where it was easily accessible at times when it would be inconvenient to open the company baggage. The arrangement worked admirably until friend Bruin discovered that the small black case made an acceptable seat from which to review the line-up of visitors. For some time thereafter the dismayed author left him in undisputed possession of his squatter's rights. That explains how "Little Texas" came to be written in part with a pencil. Dixie Willson is the author, and when her novel begins in next month's DELINEATOR we are confident you will agree that she has made the most of a treasure-trove of fascinating material gathered at first hand from her own experiences and observations as a circus rider.

From a Blue-Ribbon Canner

Grateful acknowledgment of the aid supplied by our service editors is not uncommon in this office. It is fortunate, too, for nothing is so stimulating to our best endeavor as tangible evidence that our efforts are appreciated. As a rule we refrain from printing mere letters of thanks or congratulation that serve no other purpose than to show that we receive bouquets from all sides as part of the daily correspondence routine. In the instance here mentioned we are tempted to depart from custom because the Kentucky woman who wrote the following letter has received public recognition of her skill in home-making. If we were given to the habit of pointing a moral we should say that DELINEATOR articles of value to so competent a home-maker can not fail to be helpful to less skilful or fortunate readers. "I am greatly interested in fine cooking, and have had lots of help from your pages. I won more blue ribbons at our last fair than any other woman exhibitor, took premiums in the baking contests, as well as in needlework, and won the silver trophy given for the highest number of premiums in the fruit contests (jellies, preserves, pickles, etc.). This was a surprise to me, as I did not know I was in the contest; I had only entered fruit twice, and the ones who try for the cup try to enter nearly all of the sixty classes. I was tied with the lady who won last year, the first tie in the history of the fair. I sent down sixteen jars and won nine blue and two red ribbons. The competition was closer than ever this year, and I am going to try to make it closer next year, as I have acquired so much confidence and have learned more about fruit."

From Darkest Africa

Wembo Nyama is the euphonious name of a far-off settlement in the Belgian Congo whence came one of the first enrolments in THE DELINEATOR'S Baby Clubs. The subscriber, a missionary working among the black natives of the tropical rubber forests, enclosed a remittance sufficient to cover her membership for three years in all four clubs. So far this member holds the record for distance from headquarters, but the enrolments from points in between continue to pile up in encouraging numbers. Just as a reminder, we add for the benefit of the mother or expectant mother who may have missed earlier announcements that there are four DELINEATOR Baby Clubs—one for expectant mothers; a second for mothers of infants; a third for mothers of two-to-six-year-olds; and a fourth for mothers of school children. Fuller details are given in connection with Doctor Barker's article on another page.

Etching by Paul Roche

FREE TO TEACHERS—Each of the first five hundred teachers who writes to THE DELINEATOR may have a large copy of this exquisite dry-point etching of Sir James M. Barrie, to use as a prize in English composition. No reward could be more suitable for that youngster who writes so well and who loves books and their authors

Edited with Willing Hands and a Mean Pencil by a Mere Man

IF WE are ever to get anywhere with our task of improving the minds, morals and manners of the never-sufficiently-praised sex, it is evident that we shall have to dispel an unfortunate impression now prevalent in some quarters. From various signs and portents it appears that our humble and well-intentioned self is atrociously misrepresented as a sort of combination of Jack-the-Giant-Killer, Bull Montana and whoever your favorite Candy Poisoner may be. ◈◈◈ For example, in an otherwise delightful letter from a Tulsa, Oklahoma, lady who tells us that she is seventy-two years old, we are suffused with chagrin when we read: "Please, if you answer, let it not be sarcastic, for I am just recovering from a nervous breakdown and could not stand harsh words" ◈◈◈ The opening of a new five-and-ten-cent and one-dollar store in Brooklyn, New York, brought bargain-hunting women in such numbers that nineteen police patrolmen, two mounted policemen and twelve firemen had to be called to preserve order. When the doors opened, five thousand shoppers tried to rush the main entrance at the same time, with the result that ten of them fainted and five thousand dollars' worth of mirrors, plate glass and fragile merchandise was destroyed ◈◈◈ A Michigan woman who advertised for a husband in one of the matrimonial journals received a reply from her first husband. She turned him down because his references were unsatisfactory ◈◈◈ The most tactful lady of our acquaintance had the misfortune to be the daughter of a gentleman who was hanged. Thereafter she referred to him as "having died suddenly upon the platform at a large public meeting" ◈◈◈ Now that women who blush are as scarce as hen's teeth, a University of Chicago professor has discovered all there is to know about the habit. "Blushing occurs," he explains, "when the area of reserve has been penetrated and is the result of a sense of social responsibility." He adds that there are women who never blush, but then, neither do very young children nor idiots, and for the same reason—because they have no sense of right and wrong ◈◈◈ One of the accountants we employ to check up statistical information about the never-sufficiently-praised sex observes that a woman's stock of words is smaller than the ordinary man's, but that the turnover is greater ◈◈◈ A foreign fad of the moment that we hope will stay in the smart European watering-places where it is reported as flourishing is a woven-hair riding-crop. The swanky young blood collects the tresses of some favored lady when she gets her hair bobbed and struts about the boulevards dangling a whip that looks like the watch-chains you see in daguerreotype albums ◈◈◈ In Murray's Dictionary we find that the verb "to shingle," as applied to human hair, was originated by an American barber back in 1857. In that year he advertised, "I warrant I can shingle hair better than any one in the town" ◈◈◈ The prize for the best yarn reported this month goes to a Syracuse, Nebraska, woman. Five years ago she lost a ring in the woods near her home ◈◈◈ Recently her husband bagged a flock of prairie chickens near the Wyoming border, five hundred miles away. In dressing one of the chickens the lady found her lost ring, plainly identified by her initials ◈◈◈ If you know a better one, please write ◈◈◈ The following official notice has been observed posted in coaches of Netherlands trains passing the German frontier: "In accordance with the styles of the last few years, which demand more and more that the clothing of women leave uncovered more than the head, neck and hands, many women employees are wearing dresses which, especially where men and women are occupied in the same room, are not conducive to the proper progress of work. We can not suffer this condition to go on. Women must be more simply dressed during the hours of service. Therefore, we request that all such employees be compelled to wear in service a simple, untransparent dress closed at the neck and with sleeves reaching to the wrist." ◈◈◈ For the benefit of the sweet girl graduate, crop of 1925, we suggest: (1) that she read and ponder the following quotation from that famous American educator, William James: "The final aim of education is to teach us to know a good man when we see one"; (2) that she mention the DELINEATOR when writing to advertisers.

One easy turn of the Lorain Red Wheel gives you a choice of any measured and controlled oven heat for any kind of oven cooking or baking.

Unless the Regulator has a Red Wheel it is NOT a LORAIN

Lorain Oven Canned Fruits Look Better, Taste Better

When the now famous Lorain Oven Heat Regulator was invented to eliminate baking-failures and enable women to cook Whole Meals in the self-regulating oven while miles away, it was decided to find a way in which the magic of the Red Wheel could be used to make home canning easy, efficient and economical.

This has been accomplished and thousands upon thousands of happy owners of Lorain-equipped Gas Ranges now can all their fruits and tomatoes in the oven.

With the Lorain Oven Method of Canning you do not have to stand over a hot stove and stir and watch. You don't have to lift hot, filled jars out of boiling water, or move large, heavy utensils about. You don't have to watch the gas flame to maintain a certain steam pressure, or for fear that the water-bath will boil too hard. TheLorain Regulator watches the gas flame and regulates it automatically, better even than you can.

The Lorain Oven Canning Method is economical because you don't have to buy any expensive canning equipment. The fruits are all canned right in the jars without wastage, and the process prevents wastage of gas. With the Lorain Method the house does not get all steamed up, and the stove-top is kept clear for other cooking such as preparation of meals. And, best of all, the Lorain Oven Canning Method retains the color, firmness and flavor of the fresh fruit.

Wherever gas is available you'll find a gas company, department store, hardware, furniture or stove dealer that sells these famous Red Wheel Gas Ranges with self-regulating ovens. These agents will gladly demonstrate any of the features mentioned in this advertisement. Go soon and ask for full information. But, no matter what kind of a stove you use, write for a free copy of our 1925 Oven Canning Chart. You'll find it interesting as well as instructive.

NORTHAM WARREN
Originator of Cutex, the most used manicure in the world

NORTHAM WARREN revolutionized the manicuring habits of the world! Through the Cutex manicure, he made it possible for everyone to have lovely nails. Now he has perfected—as the new finish for the manicure—Cutex Liquid Polish. A finish so perfect that in Paris, the home of sophisticated toiletries, more of this American product is sold than any other liquid polish.

A single drop of the thin liquid spreads smoothly over each nail, leaving it gleaming with rosy lights. And the nails stay that way for days. Just before a fresh manicure, a new application of wet polish wiped off, removes the old. See the special offer below.

Spreads smoother and more evenly
Lasts a whole week. Won't peel off
Gives a deep natural brilliance
Is just the correct rose color
Needs no separate polish remover

THE MAN WITH A COUNTRY

ONCE the cross was a sacred symbol to a multitude. It is still sacred, but there is also a multitude following it mechanically, thoughtlessly, even sometimes with the contempt that comes from long familiarity.

We had a United States Commissioner of Education a few years ago who in a public speech in Boston referred to American sentiment about the flag as "cheap sentimentality" and described the banner as a "painted rag."

Without faith there is no life. Empires, republics, individuals, drop into oblivion when reverence dies. Those of us who watched the return of the American army after the Armistice saw tears spring into the eyes of strong, rough men when they came in sight of the harbor and the flags of their land unfurled.

EDWARD Everett Hale, in "The Man Without a Country," told a story that has moved millions of people by the fictionized history of a man who once scorned the emblem of his native land.

Deep in the hearts of most of us there is a strong sentiment about the flag. There is a real reverence for it. If it were not so, the ruin of Russia would be upon us. But America is not without her patriots—her quiet, loyal servers. For instance:

For a generation Dr. W. J. Spillman has worked in the office of Farm Management in the Department of Agriculture in Washington, D. C. That is a dull-sounding place, but on the painstaking investigations which are directed within its walls depend many important things. For instance, whether you and I and others shall have plenty to eat, or whether our national crops shall be devoured by insects or destroyed by disease. So important, indeed, are these quiet researches, and so great is the ability of this one of the department chiefs who carries them on, that from time to time big corporations and colleges have offered him rewards to leave the service of the people and his meager salary.

One day one of his associates noticed that whenever these temptations of material advancement came to Doctor Spillman he would raise his eyes, look thoughtfully out of his window for a few moments, and then give his positive and final refusal. Through his window he could see the Stars and Stripes flying above the south wing of the House of Representatives.

BEHIND the long years of service to his Government lies a great American story:

In the early days of the Western land-grants, a few brave men and women went out and faced the hardships of pioneer life. Among these were the father and mother of Doctor Spillman. For twenty-five years they lived ninety miles from the nearest railroad, twelve miles from the nearest village. Their home was a log cabin, the children's clothes were made by their mother, and at her knee they received their early schooling.

Three things Mother Spillman had brought with her and treasured through all the ups and downs of the pioneer life—a box of books, including the Bible, a workbasket, and an American flag.

It was a battle-flag, anointed by sacrifice. It hung over the fireplace in that little cabin. To Mrs. Spillman it was an altar-cloth, a sacred thing. It was the emblem of free men. It stood for ideals and protection. It meant that into the world had come a creed next to her religion, even a part of her religion; it taught that life was cheap to yield if the yielding insured to posterity liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

And so through all the years of work and struggle those boys were taught to pray, to revere the flag, and to look forward some day to serving it. That and the winning of a college education their mother left with them as two of their chief aims in life.

The hardships of a pioneer's existence finally broke the father, and when Doctor Spillman was seven years old death suddenly came to the cabin.

Twelve miles from the village, a mile from a neighbor, and death in the house! The neighbors, with the aid of the Spillman boys, constructed a crude coffin, and then, folding the sacred battle-flag around their beloved, they marked the last resting spot of the patriot.

The college years that followed were hard, for they had to be earned by physical labor; but always spurring on those two boys was the early teaching of the mother who believed in the obligation of service.

At last hard work, earnest study and a keen mind brought the young Westerner an expert knowledge for which the world of business was willing to pay well in dollars and cents.

But the people, in their laboratories in Washington, needed just his kind of mind and just such expert knowledge, though they could pay for it only the meager salary of a government employee. So there he sat, year after year, in the old Agriculture Building, serving his country in the way Fate had chosen for him. Through his window he could see the sacred banner which flutters day by day over a more or less clay-footed group of politicians who do much talking about the Stars and Stripes.

A WOMAN OF FORTY

When by the mirror I must pass
I see a strange face in the glass
As though another, suddenly,
Usurped the space where I should be
And looked at me with listless eyes,
Too dull to judge or criticise,
With that unseeing look one meets
From any stranger in the streets.

I wish a ghost would come some day
And brush that woman's face away,
And show me one I used to know
In many mirrors, long ago,
A face that only looked to see
If all Love said of it could be;
Young eyes, young lips that know no ruth,
The vital, eager face of youth.

I would go softly out and close the door,
And never look at mirrors any more.

THEODOSIA GARRISON

WOMEN PATRIOTS

WOMAN'S patriotism is as old as the nation. From the days of the Pilgrim Mothers each generation has seen its women serving in some big way. In the historical records of our country there are many chapters showing the proud position the weaker sex has taken and worthily held.

Out of their determination to make their service most effective various patriotic organizations have grown, and to these great numbers of American women are eligible. THE DELINEATOR undertook, in February, to collect the data for a booklet which would be an authoritative guide to those of its readers who wished to participate in the work of such societies, telling them what were the history, aims and membership requirements of each, and where the national headquarters were located.

This proved an unexpectedly difficult piece of work, since no complete list had ever been compiled, and the sources of information were scattered from coast to coast. However, the booklet has now been finished, and will be mailed to any one wishing it, for twenty-five cents—a sum which does not nearly cover the cost of the printing and research.

Due also to the unexpected delay in getting the necessary data, several of the largest and most active of the women's patriotic organizations were not listed in the February announcement. Among these was the National Women's Relief Corps, to which Clara Barton, Susan B. Anthony, Frances Willard, Lucy Webb Hayes and many other women prominent in the Civil War period and the years that followed it belonged; also the Daughters of Veterans, and the Ladies of the G. A. R.

The women's organizations of the Revolutionary period and those of the Civil War have preserved some of the most priceless records of our history. They have marked the location of important events with tablets or monuments, and have restored or protected historic buildings. We feel that every woman who is entitled to belong to one of our country's many patriotic societies should do so. It is for the honor of her children and the strengthening of the Republic.

THE REVOLUTION IN OUR MEALS

"ALMOST sinful feast again!" writes John Adams in his diary, after dining with Major Powell during the Constitutional Convention in 1787. "Everything which could delight the eye or allure the taste—curds and creams, jellies, sweetmeats of various sorts, twenty sorts of tarts, pork, trifles, floating islands, whipped sillibub, etc."

Such fascinating references to famous dinners and quaint dishes can be found on page after page of Adams's diary and in other diaries and histories of the days of the Revolution.

Washington, according to George Washington Custis's "Recollections and Memoirs of Washington," entertained at dinner every Thursday while he lived at Mount Vernon. His dining hour was four o'clock, and he waited no longer than five minutes after four for his visitors to arrive. When the lagging guests did come, after the President was already at table, he said only, "Gentlemen (or sir) we are too punctual for you. I have a cook who never asks if the company has come, but whether the hour has come."

SINCE we are not the first President and General of the United States, we could not, perhaps, emulate Washington's punctual dinner habit without offending our guests. But wouldn't it be a quaint idea to make the Fourth this year a Revolutionary Celebration complete in other details and imitate the meals and customs of our forefathers?

Invite your friends to a "Revolutionary Party" and serve what Adams called "a most genteel dinner." It is surprising to realize how delectable such a dinner can be made, in addition to its historical interest.

The Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR has prepared an interesting little leaflet which will help you introduce the unusual into your Fourth of July celebration. It gives several early American menus and the necessary recipes, and describes some of the customs that you can adopt for your dinner.

A two-cent stamp for postage will bring it to you. Write to the Home-Making Department of THE DELINEATOR, Butterick Building, New York, N. Y., and ask for "Revolutionary Menus."

Are we producing Character?

A challenge for the Fourth of July

By HARRY EMERSON FOSDICK

Drawings by Clara Elsene Peck

BEFORE the great fireplace of a Puritan house, such as was built in Massachusetts in the seventeenth century, this message is being written. To a modern American this old-time room seems rugged and simple, bare and plain. To be sure, the weathered wood of beam and furniture is beautiful; the shapely outlines of chairs and tables and the carving on old-fashioned chests charm the eye. Yet one marvels at the grateful enthusiasm with which in 1654, in his "Wonder-Working Providence of Zion's Saviour in New England," Edward Johnson spoke of such simple homes: "Further the Lord hath been pleased to turn all the wigwams, huts and hovels the English dwelt in at their first coming, into orderly, fair and well-built houses, well furnished many of them."

No longer do such ancient rooms look out on forests haunted by the fear of Indians. No longer are they the scenes of animated arguments on the state of the Colony, or of rejoicing over the arrival of belated English packets. No longer must their owners wrest a living from farmland so stony that one could cross it without touching ground; on which, as an old Puritan said, if they could not raise crops, they could at least raise men.

For this room now is safely housed in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in the city of New York. It looks out upon Fifth Avenue and a long line of palatial residences. Past it thunders the traffic of the metropolis. Around it grows the wealthiest civilization that history has known.

Strange contrast! On the anniversary of the nation's birthday a message well may come from this old room with its bare yet beautiful simplicities, set so significantly in the midst of our richest and most populous city.

As one sits here before the fireplace the room seems to grow vocal as though proud of what it has stood for in the nation's history. One feels this simple kitchen, unabashed by the magnificence around it, wanting to speak to huge, luxurious New York and to the country that it represents. And this is what the old room seems to say:

"Whatever we may have lacked in those departed days, we did produce character. From homes like this there did come sturdy men and women. It was the glory of the new land with its hardships and discipline that it reared strong personalities. Has the emphasis shifted? With all your new abilities you are producing things. No nation ever produced so many things. In all that invention can devise, skill make, energy multiply, salesmanship market, you are the wonder of history, and you are growing rich producing things. Yet a nation's life, like a man's, does not consist in the abundance of the things that it possesses. Let a Puritan home, set now by strange adventure on the world's wealthiest avenue, cry to this new luxurious America: With all your power to produce things, beware lest your interest slip away from those forces in the national life that produce character."

THE NEW LAND, WITH ITS FIRM DISCIPLINE, REARED STRONG PERSONALITIES

A NATION'S HOME LIFE IS THE GARDEN OF ITS MANHOOD

AN INDUSTRIAL SYSTEM SHOULD CREATE NOT ONLY WEALTH BUT PERSONALITY

I thought I heard the old room say that.

History is clear about one truth: The final test of any institution or civilization is the quality of personality that it produces. Any land or organization, let it create whatever else it may, if it fail to create character is committing suicide. Long ago Jesus stated that law in succinct and telling form: "Whosoever would be first among you, shall be servant of all." That is to say, nothing is really great except in so far as it helps personality.

How simple that sounds! How brief the formula is! So Newton's formula of gravitation—bodies attract each other directly as their mass and inversely as the square of their distances—is brief and simple. Yet mankind lived on this planet many millenniums without guessing it, and when once seen that simple statement organized the whole universe into coherent and understandable order. Such also is Jesus formula of abiding greatness. Ages had passed and had not seen it. But He did see it. He precipitated it into a phrase. It is the law of gravitation in the moral universe: No abiding greatness in man or institution except in usefulness to personality.

When He said that, Rome was mistress of the world. She seemed very great. Set on her seven hills, she whistled to the nations like a shepherd to his dogs and they obeyed. Moreover, Rome had been really great; she had produced men. But imperial luxury and decay already had set in. Still Rome was resplendent, but she was not producing men. Strange that far off in one corner of the empire One whom they so despised that they crucified Him should have summed up the law by which the empire fell; "nothing truly great except to serve, to produce great personality."

Is America in the future going to meet this test? Is that going to be true of her which long ago a Hebrew psalmist sang, who knew where the real worth of a nation lies, "Of Zion it shall be said, This one and that one was born in her?" Then to some neglected factors in our nation's life we must attend with a deeper and more intelligent devotion than we are showing now.

Let us look to our homes! A nation's home life is the garden of its manhood. There are the roots of our character and the sustenance of our quality. No people ever can rise above the level of its homes.

The president of one of our greatest colleges recently has said that behind every case of serious discipline with which he dealt in his student body, in the preceding year, he found a wrecked home. We never can cure this evil of ruined family life by merely tinkering with symptoms like divorce. The source of the trouble lies deeper. Too many people seek marriage as a means primarily of selfish happiness. They measure marriage alike in prospect and in their estimation of its success or failure by the test of personal pleasure only, and real homes can not be built upon that basis. Some of us had fathers and mothers who were happy. They weathered the storms, bore the burdens, faced the problems, rejoiced in the privileges of life together. They were very happy, but it was largely because they were not thinking primarily

How to escape the commonplace troubles that soft food brings to gums

THERE is no doubt that gum troubles are due to soft and creamy food. There is no doubt that this food of yours takes from your gums the exercise that nature counted upon to keep the blood within their walls in healthy circulation.

These facts are known. They are attested by highest authority.

But, since your food fails as a stimulator of the gingival tissue, is there anything which will help to repair the lack and to keep your gums in a sound and healthy condition?

Yes, there is. Massage. Ipana Tooth Paste. With these aids, you can, in just a minute or two a day, build the health of your gums when and while you brush your teeth.

Modern food, soft and creamy, deprives the gums of wholesome stimulation

Repairing the damage that soft food does

"We can safely infer," says an eminent British authority, "that inefficient mastication is a potent cause of pyorrhea; and the chief cause of inefficient mastication being the eating of soft foods, we must also conclude that the latter practice is chiefly responsible for the disease in question."

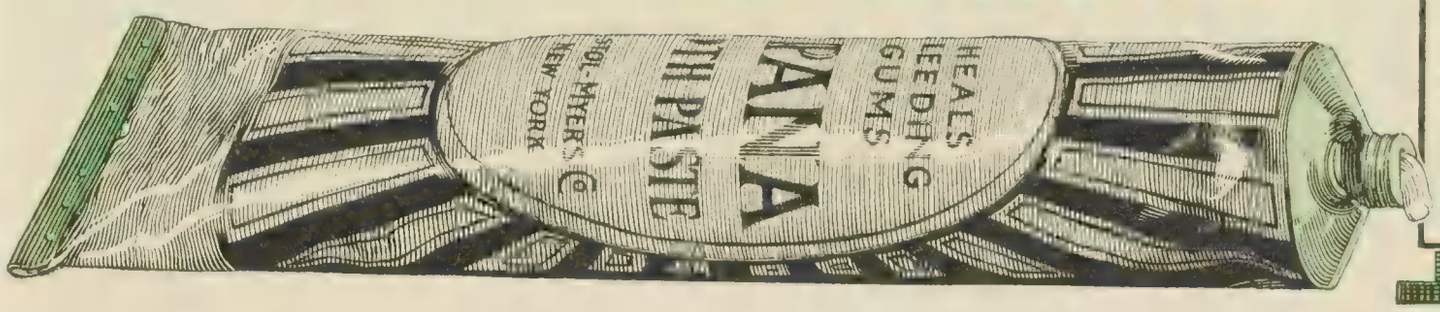
You must care for your gums as well as your teeth

Today, dentists are thoroughly awake to the importance of proper care of the gums. At home as well as abroad, dental opinion checks on this point: that if we are to keep our gums in health, stimulation and massage of the gums must be made a part of the daily care we give our teeth. Important as it is to keep the enamel of our teeth clean and white, that alone is not enough.

The simplest and best way to care for your gums is through massage and the use of Ipana Tooth Paste. As you clean your teeth, pass your brush gently but firmly over your gums toward your teeth, not away from them. In addition, many practitioners order a finger massage of the gums with Ipana after the regular brushing with Ipana.

How massage with Ipana helps to build sound gums

For, because of its tonic effect, Ipana helps the massage. This it can do because of the presence of ziratol, an antiseptic hemostatic known and used by dentists throughout the country. It is ziratol that gives Ipana its remarkable power to tone and to strengthen weak, undernourished gum tissue.



Ipana is an aid to the dentist, not a substitute for him. Ask him about its properties, its fine cleansing power, its delicious taste. Then switch to it for one month. See for yourself how good, how effective, it really is.

Get a tube of Ipana today

Despite the coupon on this page, the best thing to do is to get a large tube at your nearest drug store. The ten-day tube can only start the good work. A full-size tube, which will last for a hundred brushings, will show you the start of firmer, harder, healthier gums and a clean, sweet and wholesome mouth. . . . . .

Perhaps your own toothbrush seldom "shows pink"—perhaps it never does. Still, the best time to fight gum troubles is before they start. You can build no better foundation for the health—present and future—of your gums and teeth than to brush them twice daily with this delicious dentifrice.

Is this what happens to your lovely silk things?

Even after one or two wearings, while not obviously soiled, a silk garment which comes into contact with the skin has in it enough perspiration acid to injure its delicate fibres and colors. And hamper-dampness keeps the acid moist and active.

If only everyone realized how quickly silk things are faded, streaked —yes, actually destroyed— when allowed to lie huddled in the hamper with soiled linens and other household laundry, surely a lovely silk blouse would never find its way there!

This simple method protects delicate fabrics

A quick tubbing in Ivory suds as soon as possible after wearing will prevent acid action and premature wear by perfect cleansing.

THIS takes but a few minutes, and Ivory cannot hurt fabrics or colors, no matter how often they are washed, provided they can stand the touch of pure water. Yet think what it means if you take care of your silk things this way!

They wear longer. You have the luxury of fresh garments daily. You can manage beautifully on a very few fine garments. They come out unstained and unfaded. They are entirely free from soapy odor. They are safe from the dangers of carelessness.

If it were not for the purity and gentleness of Ivory you might think twice before subjecting your fragile garments, or even your hands, to such frequent tubbings. But with Ivory, you don't have to worry, for millions of women use Ivory on their faces, and a soap fine enough for your face is fine enough for the most delicate garments.

Here comes a circus!

LITTLE TEXAS

By DIXIE WILLSON

ONE June afternoon when the air was full of wild-flower dust and sleepy sunshine, the plump conductor of a passenger train in southern Missouri sat by the open door of the last coach, watching the railroad track unwind behind the moving train like a long gray ribbon across the fields.

The windows were open, the warm wind blowing through, and dusty patches of sunshine crisscrossed over dusty red-velvet seats. It was a lazy afternoon. Most of the passengers were dozing—in the drawing-room car, where wealthy gentlemen ride, iced-tea was being served—but here in the last coach everybody was just very warm and very tired.

The conductor's blue cap was pushed back from a hot bald forehead, a damp handkerchief was tucked inside his collar and a drooping Black-eyed Susan in his buttonhole looked like just another small passenger as warm and tired as the rest.

He had almost begun to doze himself when he was conscious of a childish voice over his shoulder.

"Can't we give your flower a drink, Mr. Conductor? It's so thirsty!"

LITTLE TEXAS HERSELF

Drawings by Gerald Leake

THE little somebody had a pretty way of speaking—an odd little accent at the end of the words—and what Mr. Conductor saw when he looked down was a mass of short, tumbled, sunny-brown curls, wide, wistful, gray eyes, a childishly beautiful face with a sweet serious something about it you wouldn't forget.

He had noticed her considering his buttonhole before. He had noticed her stubby shoes and faded little dress and the rather shabby young man with her, who seemed too large for his clothes.

"All right, little girl," he laughed, "we'll keep the daisy healthy," and he went to the drinking-tank, and came back with the limp flower hanging its head out of a water-filled bottle.

"There, how's that?" he wanted to know, and stood it in the shady corner of her window.

She smiled shyly up at him, and the young man with her smiled too.

"That'll settle her mind a lot," he said to the conductor. "She worries about everything that don't look just satisfied."

The conductor sat down beside them.

"Going far?" he asked.

"St. Louis—that's all," said the boy. "She was promised she'd have a grandpa when she was twelve, and that was yesterday, so we're going to find him, ain't we, little Texas?"

He poked her small nose with the end of his finger.

"Yes, we are," the child said confidingly. "I've been waiting so long to be twelve years old, till I could find my grandad! And the most fun of it," she said, leaning forward and putting one little hand on the conductor's plump knee, "is that he doesn't know he's even got a granddaughter at all! But I know just exactly what I'm going to say when I find him," she smiled, with pretty mischief in her eyes. "I'm going to say, 'Grandad, you old scamp, give Texas a kiss!' "

The boy winked up at the conductor.

"She's got it all fixed," he said. "She's made up her mind to have him just like she wants him!"

"And he's in St. Louis—this grandfather?" the conductor wanted to know.

"Well, we think so," the boy told him. "We don't know for sure, but we've got a card to his lawyer from ten years ago, saying his name is Kingsley Fitzgerald, and saying her dad was his son. Of course, a lot can 'a' happened in ten years, but we're pretty mighty sure we're goin' to find a grandfather there—ain't we, honey?" and he folded her warm fingers into his.

"You see, mother and I want a grandfather very much," the little girl explained, her eyes even more wistful for a minute, "because he'd be a relation and we haven't any relation. So Joe's going to find him the minute we get there, aren't you, Joe?"

The big boy she called Joe drew a card from his pocket and held it so the conductor could see.

"I am, if this'll do it," he said. "That's her grandfather's name written on it," he explained, "Kingsley Fitzgerald. It's her name, too, but we call her just Texas!"

"Kingsley Fitzgerald," the conductor repeated thoughtfully, "Fitzgerald—" Then suddenly he got up.

"Well I vum!" he said. "Excuse me a minute."

TEXAS watched him hurry down the aisle toward the forward car.

"My goodness, how fast he went away!" she said, "and aren't fat people fat when they hurry, Joe! It will be nice if grandpa's fat and smiley like the conductor, won't it? I wonder what my grandpa's like! I wonder what he'll think when he knows he's got a grandchild!"

Joe drew her tumbled head against his shoulder.

"Well, if he's fat, little Texas, or if he isn't," the big boy said, "I don't know. But I do know he's the luckiest grandpa in this old wide world!"

In the drawing-room car, where the iced-tea glasses were clinking, was a certain iron-gray gentleman, tall, with thin twitching lips, a close-cropped gray mustache and deep-set steel-gray eyes. His hands were slim, with long aristocratic fingers. His shoulders were straight, determined shoulders, and what the conductor had suddenly remembered was that on this gentleman's bag were important-looking letters that said "Kingsley Fitzgerald," and that his ticket had read to St. Louis.

The plump conductor stood in the doorway a minute, looking the gentleman up and down, then he straightened his cap, cleared his throat and approached him.

"Are you Kingsley Fitzgerald of St. Louis?" he asked.

"I am," the old gentleman answered bruskly.

"Have you a granddaughter?" the conductor asked again.

Mr. Fitzgerald looked up, very evidently annoyed.

"No," he said icily. "No indeed!"

"Have you a son?" the conductor went on.

"My son is—dead," Mr. Fitzgerald replied curtly.

But the conductor persisted.

"Your son's daughter," he said, "is on this train going to St. Louis after you."

Mr. Fitzgerald rose with a short word under his breath.

"What—what are you trying to say?" he asked.

Those stern eyes almost made the conductor forget what he was trying to say, but he repeated to Mr. Fitzgerald what Joe and Texas had told him.

"I never was aware that my son had a daughter," the old gentleman said. "Is she—what does she look like? Who is the person with her?"

"The young man didn't say who he was," the conductor replied, "but the little girl mentioned a mother as her only relation. She's twelve years old, she said, and not very well off, I should think, by the looks of it."

The distinguished-appearing old gentleman tapped his fingers against the back of the seat.

"So that's it!" he said. "That's the idea! Yes, I understand. They need money—so they intend to present themselves to my lawyer and find me!"

He drew his thin lips down at the corners.

"Well," he said, "I shall simply arrange that it will be impossible for me to be found. I appreciate your information that has prepared me."

The plump conductor thought of that eager face—those wistful gray eyes.

"You might walk through the car and take a look at the little one," he suggested.

Mr. Fitzgerald hesitated a moment, then reached for his ebony stick.

"Yes, I shall," he said briefly. "I can make up my mind, when I see her, whether I choose to acknowledge her or not. If I do, I shall speak to her at once; but if I deem it better to have her lose track of me entirely, I shall pass her and say nothing, and trust you to do the same."

He bowed slightly and preceded the conductor into the last coach, where the dusty patches of sunshine crisscrossed over dusty red-velvet seats.

Joe had made a rag doll from his blue pocket handkerchief and Texas, one foot curled under her, her head cuddled against his shoulder, was absorbed in watching nose and mouth appear in red pencil lines.

Mr. Kingsley Fitzgerald went slowly down the aisle to the open door at the end of the train, looked out at that ribbon of track for a moment, then shifted his gaze to the sunny-haired child.

Little Texas glanced up at him. His gray eyes, deep and stern, met her gray eyes, wide and wistful, for just one second, then he turned away, passed directly by, and went back into the drawing-room car where wealthy gentlemen ride.

THAT June day was circus day in the little town of Three Trees, Arkansas. The town had been alive since early morning, with folks out waiting for the balloons and the flags and the music, with every one crowding down over the bridge to the flats where The Great Melbourne Circus was showing.

Almost before sunrise the canvas tents were up, the wagons rumbling through town with seats and poles and animal cages, and by ten o'clock, when parade was ready to start with its flash of banners and spangled horses, the streets of the whole place had turned into a holiday.

In a little gray house at the end of the town a little gray lady in a faded black bonnet was sitting by a window filled with morning-glory vines and purple blossoms, rocking nervously back and forth.

She held a letter in her fingers, a worn yellow letter, and now and then, when she looked at it, tears came up in her eyes. The shades were drawn against the sun, the little room was spotlessly clean, with its strips of rag carpet and painted wooden furniture.

"You see, Car'line," the little old lady was saying to a woman who sat on the floor with a sleeping baby in her arms, "you see, I haven't any place that's home to me. Your house here is just right for your family without counting me in, and I haven't any money to pay for what I eat, so I want to go out, Car'line, and work for my keep like other folks."

"But Lucy, why don't you write Jason?" the woman on the floor said. "He's been waiting all his life."

A blush came into the faded old cheeks at mention of Jason.

"No, Car'line," she answered. "When I was pretty and young, I took Sunny Bill instead of Jason, and it isn't right I should go to Jason now, just because I'm old, without any folks and without any home. Jason hasn't heard a thing about me for years. He's most likely forgotten all about me by now. Most likely he wouldn't even want to hear from me again!"

"Oh, yes, he would, Lucy; it would make him awfully happy," the woman on the floor said, leaning back against the wall. "Jason's gone without anybody just because he couldn't have you."

But the little old lady shook her head.

"No, Car'line," she said. "I wouldn't ask Jason to take me now. It'd seem almost like charity. I'll just go and work, and where Bill always worked is where I want to work, so I'll do like he told me to. The parade will come by at eleven o'clock, and I'll follow it back to the circus grounds, and find Papa Saunders like Bill said I would."

The woman on the floor shifted the baby from one arm to the other.

"You're right welcome to stay here as long as you want to," she said kindly. "I can't think of you gettin' work in a circus, hardly!"

"Yes, it does seem kind o' queer, me trying to do that," the little old lady smiled, "but Bill always said I could if ever I'd say the word, and I've been thinking that having it come right here to town is sort of like it's coming on purpose to give me the chance! Seems that God kind of knows how much I want a home somewhere, and He's sending——"

THE flare of a brass band broke into her sentence. She started from her chair and hurried to the open door, the woman following her, the baby waking with wide eyes, as down the street with glitter and glare, with velvet and scarlet, came the circus parade.

The little old lady watched as it flared by, her heart fluttering half with joy, half with fear.

As long back as she could remember, her husband, Sunny Bill, had told her about the folks in the circus—the long cars they lived in, the big cook-tent they ate in, the happy days they spent together in green meadows under blue sky, those mornings of parade up the long main streets of little towns. Sunny Bill had been a tumbling clown for forty years in the circus ring.

Every Summer he had left Lucy in their cozy cottage, had written her from every town, and had come laughing home again early every November, to take care of the Winter wood and cover up their little garden, till one January day he had gone to sleep—just hadn't wakened up again—and she had been left alone. Then things had happened as things do—the cottage was lost—and the money gone—and for six long years in her all-alone hours it had seemed to the little gray widow that all she'd ask of life was if somehow, somewhere, she could be part of that meadow and blue sky Sunny Bill had loved so long.

Bill had left her a letter to give Papa Saunders, the big circus manager. She had counted six summers pass, not daring to do it—but now, with The Great Melbourne Circus in the very town of Three Trees, Arkansas, it seemed to Mrs. Sunny Bill it had come on purpose to give her her chance.

"Isn't the parade beautiful," the old lady whispered, her faded eyes sparkling.

Car'line swung the baby against her shoulder to the beat of the music, while the elephants shunk-shunked out of sight, and the calliope wheezed by. When the spangle of the flags flashed away down the street, the little old lady turned to Car'line, her lips trembling.

"Well," she said, "I guess it's time to go now. You've been good to keep me. If—if Papa Saunders isn't there any more, maybe I'll have to come back—but Bill wanted me to try, so—so good-by, Car'line. Take good care of the baby."

The woman watched her out of sight in the crowd that surged gaily after the parade. A little old lady in a faded old bonnet!

"Poor soul," Car'line said to herself as she joggled the baby to sleep again. "Wonder what she thinks they're ever goin' to do with an old lady like her in a circus! Poor soul!"

THROUGH the streets full of squealing whistles and bobbing balloons the little old lady crowded along with the rest, over the bridge, down the hill, to where the circus tents had come up like magic in a glitter of flags and bands playing. The crowd stopped in front of the side show, and the little old lady, clutching her letter against her dress, stopped too. A little brown boy, with a leopard skin over bare brown legs, beat four drums at once, while a man with a wide tan hat and gold watch-chain called out the wonders that for one dime could be found inside.

"We have here," he shouted, "Miss Tiny! Miss Tiny! The little lady so small I can bring her out of my silk hat!"

And out of the hat on his arm, with a flourish, he lifted somebody like a doll come to life, a tiny, sweet, dimpling, pink, fluffy-haired somebody, with a laugh like the sound of a little silver bell.

"She measures twenty-nine inches from the tip of her head to the soles of her feet! She can stand in the palm of my hand," the man shouted, as he turned her around, while she hung to his ear and some one in the crowd offered to buy her for a thousand dollars.

Every one was in raptures over Miss Tiny, when the second attraction appeared on the platform—Eddie the Rubber Man.

"The strangest person alive!" the man shouted. "He has baffled and mystified the scientists of three nations, and is being shown in this country for the first and last time! Watch him! Watch him!"

Whereupon Rubber Eddie doubled himself into a ball of head, hands and feet that rolled down the platform and bounced back into the tent, while the man with the tan hat made room for Exhibition Number Three.

The people stepped back from the platform a little at the appearance of Exhibition Number Three, for the man who came out where Rubber Eddie had rolled in was eight feet six inches tall and weighed three hundred pounds.

"Pictured on the banner at your left, and here on the stage," the tan-hat man called with a gesture, "you see Captain Gordon, the modern Her-cu-les! The man who stands head and shoulders above any other inhabitant on the face of the globe, and makes the ordinary human being seem like a pigmy!"

A startled gasp came from the crowd as the man with the tan hat dropped Miss Tiny into the giant's great arms! He might have crushed her with just the closing of his hands around her, but the man with the tan hat could have told, had he wanted to, that the two were such chums the show folks called them "The Twins." It seemed one never went out without the other. Captain Gordon carried Tiny everywhere on his arm in a market-basket, brought her a box of chocolates every day, and then held her in her basket half an hour at a time while she fed his candy to the horses in the pad-room.

The little old lady in the faded black bonnet put fifty cents up to the window of the ticket-wagon in a quick, half-frightened way, and surged along with the people into the menagerie.

The lions with their fat paws like overgrown kittens, tigers, swaying white bears, the brown velvet seals, men

DIANA and the HOUSE of HATE

A new style Ghost story

By EVERETT YOUNG

"YOU DEAD-GAME LITTLE SPORT! YOU BRICK!" GEORGE SAID BROKENLY

THE heat bore down, muffling, breathless, not even relieved by their close proximity to the Potomac. Ahead of them, against the declining sun, suds of dark clouds were climbing. Even the rare views opening out at certain bends in the twisting road were lost to them, for sight seemed blocked by that dense mass of potential thunder.

Diana Treadwell slipped off her hat and leaned her blond head wearily against a leather cushion. Slumping rather far down in her low seat in the roadster, she offered a picture of boyish slender grace. Out of the tail of his eye, George Trench noted her perfection without pleasure. In his present state of parboiled discomfort her cool crispness irritated him. He actually wished that for once she would look hot, or awkward, or dishevcled.

Aloud he said grumpily, "Not a bit cooler here. Thought it was going to be."

"Oh, well, it looks so, anyway," she replied. "The water sounds nice. If I'd smelt those Washington pavements another minute, I'd have developed hydrophobia and run around in circles, barking and trying to get a cop to shoot me."

Trench laughed. He was a cheery soul at bottom.

"Bad as that, eh? What say we run over to the Lock Club for dinner after we get through with this? That's within earshot of Great Falls and bound to be a few shades fresher after dark than town will be."

She accepted as casually as he invited, but deep down in the heart of each was the same disappointing knowledge that the mock-orange-scented darkness of the old place where you dined by candle-light and the rush of unseen waters would prove, as so often before, merely a wasted setting.

Their friends claimed it an outrage that they did not marry. By birth and tastes they were well mated already—he a Trench of Albany and the engineering member of a prominent firm of Washington architects, she a Virginia Treadwell and an interior decorator who, in spite of her youth, was already making herself felt in the artistic world. They had played together as school-children when Trench's father was serving two terms as senator and Diana's family represented the venerated "cave dwellers" in an ugly but dignified house on Capitol Hill. When Trench took a job in Washington after the war and renewed the old friendship, it was natural for their mutual acquaintances to take an interest in the affair.

But somehow Nature, for reasons of her own, mislikes these heaven-made marriages. It almost seems as though, in her matings, she counts on the clash and shock of the unexpected to strike a new spark of life into the world. And so, in the face of reason and perhaps because of it, Nature had restrained Diana and Trent to no more than the best of friendships, which, to be sure, wore a trifle thin at times, since they were both young and in their separate ways impetuous.

"Who'd you say had bought the place?" Diana inquired listlessly. "Good of you to throw the decorating my way, old son. Thanks a lot, if I haven't mentioned it before."

"Bender—Congressman Milo P. Bender—bought it. Wants it for a Summer place when the House is in session. He picked you himself."

She wrinkled her white brows, from which waves of gold hair swept backward, crisp and flat. "What're you doing with it? Remodeling?"

"Bathroom or two, I believe, and seeing if some badly placed doors can be changed without weakening the structure. I haven't seen the house myself yet."

THEY rumbled over a tall iron bridge paved with rattling wooden boards, after which the Leesburg road obliqued slightly from the course of the river on an ascending grade. The heat fell closer, moister. Under its clammy hand they relapsed once more into a silence until Trench snapped the car into a rutted lane running back to the edge of the bluff now far above the level of the river. Many grunts and moans had been shaken from the two of them by the time Trench jerked his maltreated roadster to a standstill before a low brick wall backed by a line of cedars.

"Sweet approach!" Diana vouchsafed, patting her waved hair into place and casting a morose eye on the cow-path they had just traversed.

"Money in little Georgie's jeans," that gentleman remarked with somber exultation. "I'm supposed to do the road over for him. And he has kale to burn."

"He'll need it," she growled, wrestling with a once white gate. "Just look at that lawn! I hate these American cedars, anyway. Graveyardy."

By way of revenge one of the branches caught at the fair head and pulled a strand of well-kept hair over the aristocratic little nose—and Diana, I very much fear, uttered a monosyllable ending with L.

Trench chortled. "Got even with you that time—nice old cedar! I never saw you mussed up before. Does my soul good. Come on—let's see the outside of the house first."

They skirted a grove partially concealing a square Colonial house of medium size, and, guided by a little wind-break of the eternal cedars, made their way to the rear. Here a surprise awaited them, for only a ledge, barely twenty feet wide, separated the house from a deep gorge at the foot of which the river ran muttering over its bed of sharp rocks.

"Well, of all stupid things—" Trench wondered.

"There must have been a landslide or something," Diana assured him. "Nobody in a sane mind would deliberately build a house as near the edge as that. Why, if the earth cut away the least bit more——"

Trench approached the gorge and peered over.

"There's a big boulder jutting out a couple o' dozen feet below us. Think I'll go down and give it a look."

He took off his coat and eased himself over the stark edge. At such moments it annoyed him that Diana did not follow him with little feminine, useless admonitions.

He did not realize that it was her point of honor to be as cool about the minor dangers of life as any man, but that she was waiting with clenched teeth for his reappearance.

He climbed back to safety after an interminable time, and her "Find anything?" was as casually cold as a mountain brook.

"The boulder's certainly what's holding us up, though whether it's an isolated one or the spur of a whole supporting ledge of rock I can't say. And the river's cut under it badly, too. Think I'll recommend some shoring up down there—Milo P. can stand it!"

"I think you're perfectly vulgar about that poor man's money!" Diana attacked unexpectedly. It was the heat, and nervous relief that George had actually returned unharmed.

He was hot too. "What can you expect of a damn

Love lost — and found

THE STORY THUS FAR

SIMON was the youngest and gayest of the three Paris brothers—gay, that is, until the war crashed upon Europe. He fought through the thickest horrors of it for four terrible years, and terrible were its effects upon his sunny, unquestioning disposition. Friends, fellow officers, his men fell by thousands. Yet he, Simon, was spared. Why? Why? Suddenly, one desperate night, came a wordless answer to him as if from his dear dead mother. He was being spared—she comforted him—for a purpose. This knowledge sustained him. But after the war it began to fill him with a restless wondering and loneliness. Where was some one to whom he could bare his troubled soul? Where was Elizabeth? But he could not find the girl whose understanding letters had cheered him at the front. Groping for some further knowledge of his purpose, Sim gave up his job (he was a major in the regular British army) and went for a time to visit his brother Charles. Charles Paris, with his wife Alice, lived on the outskirts of London in a vast old house, the home of their tyrannical great-uncle, old Gand, now speechless and paralyzed. This household was a volcano covering suppressed rumblings and storms. Charles's discontent with his dull business life and Alice's discontent with dull Charles were fast reaching a crisis—a crisis of illicit love between Alice and Conrad Bryne, old Gand's doctor, who came to the house each day. Only one person suspected Alice—not Sim, who affectionately humored her when she begged him to go to Charles if ever he was in trouble—but old Gand's male nurse, a Swiss named Jule, who was spying upon her and her secret lover.

PART TWO

SIM, after eight days, moved on from his stay with Charles to stay with Andrew.

"Well, we don't seem to have done much in your visit," was Charles's opening of their farewell exchanges together.

This was at Cannon Street Station. Sim had come up by Charles's usual morning train, and the brothers stood waiting for the taxi that was to carry Sim to Andrew's house in Mayfair Street.

"Oh, it's been jolly, Charles," Sim answered quickly, "jolly seeing you and Alice again. I've enjoyed it."

"I haven't done much toward getting you fixed in any plans," Charles went on, "even toward discussing them. What are you going to do, Sim?"

Sim's gay, careless laugh, "I'm dashed if I know," and the instant defeat in Charles of an impulse to be kind.

"You've never even told me what means you've got," he growled. "What's your retired pay, Sim?"

"Far as I can make out, a hundred and fifty."

The careless estimate, as the careless attitude toward so meager a sum, annoyed Charles.

"Far as you can make out? Sim, surely you must know?"

"Not exactly, yet. There are odds and ends, some off, some on. When all's done, I reckon I can count on a hundred and fifty pounds cold."

Charles bit a lip. "You're likely to find it cold, I should imagine, on that."

Sim laughed. "That's rather witty, Charles. Feel the draft, you mean?"

"Nowadays and with your tastes, yes."

A pensive look replaced the laughter in Sim's eyes.

"As to the tastes," he said, "I can cut them out. In fact, I have. They've slipped away, somehow."

His voice had changed with his expression. He spoke it slowly as though he wondered why or how they had slipped away.

Charles regarded him. "There's something up with you, Sim. I can't think what it is. You've changed somehow."

"They're all telling me that."

"Well, what is it?"

"I don't know."

"This was madness, this chucking the service. Don't go away saying I haven't offered to help you. I've suggested the business. I offer it definitely now. Will you come into the business?"

Sim shook his head. "It's jolly good of you, Charles. No. I've thought it over. It's not what I want. It's not what I'm looking for."

"What are you looking for?"

"I don't know."

Charles gave a short whistle, expressive of, and meant to express, his irritation. "Whew-ew! Well, here's your taxi."

The cab drew up. Sim followed his baggage aboard. Through the window the brothers exchanged goodbys. But as the engine of the taxi began to work up, Charles could not restrain the shaft of his irritated whistle.

"I'll just tell you one thing, Sim," he said, "if you don't mind. You said coming up in the train that you wondered what all those people, up and down every day, thought they were doing with their lives. I submit to you that, working at jobs, they might with a good deal more reason ask you what you think you are doing with yours."

The cab moved away. Trouble now was in the eyes that regarded Charles from it.

"I know, old man," Sim said.

ANDREW'S house in Mayfair Street, where now Sim came, was No. 26. Twelve houses stood on each side of it. The position thus held the distinction (according to the real-estate agent who rented the place to Andrew Paris) of being within a few feet of the precise center of the exclusive Mayfair district of London.

But Andrew disregarded the proud boast.

"It suits me," he said in his stern way, no response whatsoever in his manner to the agent's amiable fawnings. "It suits me. I will take it. Give me a pen, will you?"

The lovely creature, exquisitely dressed, who sat at the table beside him—Linda, his newly-married bride—smote together the palms of her white-kidded hands in silent clapping and radiantly beamed upon him. The agent, who was awed by Andrew and ravished by Linda, thought he had never seen so swift a change in a face as the responsive smile with which Andrew replied to Linda. His thought was (he was a slangy man) "Talk about worship! I reckon that flyaway bit could have the eyes out of that stiff for the asking." He was right.

The rent, in common with all the houses in Mayfair Street, was very high, but Andrew could well afford it. He then had been only a few years with Lord Staverton as his financial secretary, but his salary was commensurate to his services. And Lord Staverton, multi-millionaire chairman of a great banking corporation, of a great insurance corporation, of a great railway corporation, of the great firm of engineering contractors which was the foundation of his family's fortune, with shipping interests, newspaper interests, oil interests, mining interests, counted Andrew Paris the most valuable thing he had touched in his career.

Andrew's proud and cold face was his fortune. Immediately Lord Staverton saw it, it won for him the position which he sought. Not right-hand man but another right hand to the magnate he became.

He was by virtue of his position immensely sought after. To "get Paris" was considered by those who desired to "get Staverton" as good as, or indeed better than, getting Lord Staverton himself. But the attitude he set himself in this regard was that where he had accepted smiles he would be expected to give smiles; and as his master's servant he felt that smiles, being his master's smiles, were not to be given. To instance a very small point, and yet a point well illustrative of the absurd lengths to which he carried his attitude, he found himself, directly his position and his influence became known, receiving passes to every kind of social show, theatrical first-nights, exhibitions, meetings and the like.

He returned them.

But when he married his wife he found all this not so easy to maintain.

LINDA, Andrew's wife, always made Sim catch his breath whenever after an interval he first saw her again. It was her beauty that caused it. Her loveliness, and an extraordinary radiance her loveliness had (as if her spirit shone through her lovely flesh), came to him always like a sudden and delicious perfume. And this impression was not singular to him alone. All men, and even many women, who met her declared to it. Her beauty dazzled them.

Her toilettes themselves were dazzling. On any one else her frocks, her whole get up, would have been (people said) striking to the point of being "too well dressed." On Linda, however, and for whatever occasion she was costumed, it was the lovely creature's natural plumage, natural to her as its astounding blue to the kingfisher, shot by in a gleam that none who has not seen it knows what blue can be. Even men, who normally never can remember a woman's dress, often would tell one another what Linda Paris (as every one called her) was wearing when last seen. And with the description invariably would go the old joke to the effect that if you had not seen the dress of Linda Paris now under discussion you never were likely to—she never had worn it before—she probably never would wear it again.

But dress, and even such as Linda's, is but the wrapping. It was to see herself, the simply lovely thing she was, that caused that catching of the breath in Sim and in beholders all. By day from her enchanting face, in the evening from arms and breasts and shoulders, there positively was a gleam, an aura that one would think a finger must pass through, and yet feel nothing, before it touched the living lovely flesh. It was not white. Her hue, her radiance was deeper and more gleaming than white can go or gleam. Her hue was golden.

It was while Sim, still in the first business of arrival, was bantering with this golden creature, renewing the affectionate fun there always was between them, that Andrew appeared. Andrew, that black Paris, stood beside this radiant thing, his wife—and there was presented to Sim the striking contrast in the pair. Andrew so vivid black, she so gleaming golden.

It was a contrast that everybody noticed, but it was a contrast never so vivid as when, with no eye there to see, it first had been made. That was when, plighting their troth. Andrew first held her in his arms, caught her to his breast within a shadowed room, her face to his. It was then as though he held a lamp of burning gold against his face, as though within the dimness of that room, her father's rather shabby study, Andrew's face, passionate in triumph and in adoration, was illuminated by some glow of hidden source.

That was their contrast physical. But their contrast lay much deeper than that. They were in every sense shaped at the poles of Nature's plans. Andrew ran slow, Linda quick. He was purposeful, she purposeless. He was grave, sober, an intense and silent man; she light, gay, a careless and a gleeful sprite. They were extremes—and on that night of their betrothal at the point of their extremes they protested their affection. His voice was terrible in its intensity as he declared his love; her voice, her eyes, her lips, her heart were laughing.

But not so all the time.

She first was laughing—then the deep passion of his voice reverberated in his breast and it was felt by her in all her body (pressed to his) and she was breathing then in sharp, quick catches of her breath, and kissing him with lips that now laughed not, but consumed his own.

They call it love.

It is not love. Such passions, Andrew's for Linda, Linda's (at that and at such moments) for Andrew, are passions only, gusts of appetite, inflamed desires, and nothing have to do with love. It is the sex attraction, nothing more. Love is not blind, it is all-seeing. Passion is blind, its appetite its only guide. Love is a helping and a sharing, a giving and forgiving, and in the process welding two indissolubly one. This sex attraction is all-taking—a thing that hunts its prey, whose zest depends on chase and on denial until it wearies of the hunt and then is staled. It holds—while it attracts. While it attracts it holds as bindingly as love. It then repels.

It had held Andrew Paris to Linda for more than eleven years. This was the chase, this pretty dance that she led Andrew. She is likely, for that matter, to lead him a pretty dance for all time, as things go. Her nimble feet are weariless. She still, after eleven years of it, tantalizes him, still draws him ravished on. Her danger is when, for him, her lovely beauty fades or stales.

Already now, he sometimes halts in his pursuit, and ponders—then dashes on again.

SIM, more observant on this visit, more susceptible to secret emotions in those about him, sometimes noticed these halted, brooding moments in his brother. One occasion was that of a little dinner-party in the house, another at a little private dance in the house following a dinner. He noticed during his stay how frequent were these little parties. He noticed also on the nights when no guests were entertained how very rarely was an evening spent at home—invariably there was a show of some kind to be attended. And he noticed, further, all the costly, carelessly luxurious style in which the house was run—two men servants, two chauffeurs, three cars—things like that—all strikingly different from the régime of Charles's house; all slightly surprising in the Andrew of Sim's accustomed imagination.

But what he had particularly noticed at the dinner-party, as at the dance, was the look, suddenly caught, on Andrew's face.

Across the costly table, Linda, supreme, superb, holding all her guests in rattling banter; across the gleaming dancing-floor, Linda, exquisitely gowned, exquisitely dancing—across all that glowing life and color, Sim had glanced up and seen Andrew, withdrawn into himself, gloomily regarding them.

Those moments in which he thus caught Andrew were Andrew halted in the chase, conning the lovely creature who has led him on thus far.

How? he brooded. How was it possible that a girl, taken out of the dull, almost straitened surroundings from which he had taken that gleaming creature there, could have sprung into the extravagant, pleasure-seeking child of joy that she at once, on their very honeymoon, became?

How?

Andrew desired place and power, and it was characteristic of his temperament so to desire them, not for what they brought, but for what in themselves they were. Linda was precisely opposite.

They had been married less than one year when came an evening when Linda told that she had been dashing round fruitlessly all the day to secure seats for the first night of a play which was expected to be the event of the theatrical season. "And they're not to be had for love or money," Linda declared. "Sickening!"

Andrew laughed. "That's all you know. I've not an hour ago returned a box."

"Returned a box!" Linda extravagantly gestured mock amazement. "Returned a box! You never have! You wouldn't! Who sent it?"

Andrew named a man. "And I wasn't taking any," he said. "not from that quarter."

She had a trick, done for the amusement of others and always amusing Andrew, of exaggerating trifles into crises and acting them with ludicrous theatricality. They were standing together in the drawing-room and she threw herself into his arms. "Knight of my soul, for goodness sake, why not?"

He laughed and hugged her. "Because he's out to get in on a big combine Staverton is negotiating."

"Light of my life, why shouldn't the man?"

"No reason at all—if he can and at the right time. But not by any early doors."

"Star of my night, explain!"

Andrew caressed her again and fondly looked down upon the lovely laughing face. "Why, idiot, he wants information in advance."

"Well?"

"Well, he doesn't get it. No one does, from me."

"Well?"

"Well, he wants to try to—he wants to stand in well with me. Hence the box."

She now had lowered her face from his and with her head bent, was twisting a button of his waistcoat. "Well?"

"Well, Linda. I can't afford to let any one stand in well with me. I'm always being offered things I can't take."

"You know, Andrew," she said thoughtfully, "I think that you carry that idea a bit too far. It spoils heaps of fun."

Here she lifted her head and beamed at him. "You wait till they send 'em to me!"

It was a challenge—of the kind done for amorous sport—and Andrew accepted it, kiss and lively hug the form of his acceptance.

"You wait till they send 'em to me!" she had threatened. Very soon that was what people began to do.

The next occasion was much the same—a favor—cards to a Gold-Cup Day party at the races, presented by some one from whom Andrew would take no favor. He could not in any case go himself, and he ordered Linda that she should not go in that particular company.

She laughed mischievously. "Well, I'm going to!"

He also laughed, fondly. "You bet you're not!"

"You bet I am. Dare me to?" and enticingly her eyes dared him.

He loved this. "I dare you to!"

She went.

She did not come down to breakfast that morning and he was occupied in his study till shortly before eleven when suddenly she presented herself to him, in a new Ascot frock, radiant, a vision.

After exchanges—on his side first of admiration of her, then when he heard with whom she was going, of surprised disbelief; on her side of mischief-mounting glee—after these, "But look here," he said, "this is serious. I absolutely don't want it done. I told you why, Linda. I absolutely forb——"

She was in highest spirits. She waved the long gloves she carried and trod a little jig of mischief. "You dared me to! You dared me to!" and she came to rest within a pace of him, a nymph, a Circe.
